Dear Mr. Via:

Upon my return to Washington I found your letter of December 4, 1968, concerning the recent conference on Civil Rights and the Construction Industry held at the University of Kentucky.

I regret to advise that I did not have a formal text when I addressed the conference. I spoke from notes. I do understand, however, that the proceedings were taped, and I am, therefore, making inquiry to ascertain whether my information is correct and, if so, whether a transcript can be secured.

If the answers are in the affirmative, I shall try to respond in this way to your request for a copy of my remarks.

Best wishes.

A LOW-COST HOUSING PROGRAM FOR THE ROYAL KNIGHTS FOUNDATION

About the Royal Knights:

The Royal Knights Foundation, of which John W. Brown is president, is a small organization of young Negro men who have worked in the Vine City area for about three years, fostering and managing recreational, tutorial, employment and other programs. The Royal Knights members are mostly in their thirties. They do not live in Vine City, though some previously did. Their interest is in helping people less fortunate than themselves. They have received help from various quarters and have had grants from time to time from such sources as the Office of Economic Opportunity and Trinity Presbyterian Church and assistance from the Atlanta Crime Commission and the Southern Council on International and Public Affairs.

The Royal Knights now has undertaken a low-cost housing program. In connection with this, a board of friends of the Royal Knights is being established which will be, in effect, a building and planning committee for the housing development.

About the Program:

Under the federal "turnkey" public housing program, private organizations propose particular housing developments; have the plans accepted by the local housing authority (in this case, the Atlanta Housing Authority); construct the project; and sell it then to the housing authority, which subsequently operates it.

Under the particular section of the "turnkey" housing program which the Royal Knights are interested in, the units built would be rented to occupants for perhaps $80 or $85 a month under a rental-purchase arrangement. Most probably would be three-bedroom units. Thus, the units would not be the "lowest of the low" in low-cost housing. But they would be relatively low and would help meet the current shortage of low-cost housing in Atlanta, to which Mayor Ivan Allen has addressed much of his attention during the past two years.

Further, under the "turnkey" arrangement the Royal Knights would stand to make a profit on each unit when it sells to the Atlanta Housing Authority. This profit would become seed money for further economic development of benefit to residents of ghetto areas of the city. For instance, the seed money might capitalize further such housing developments, or it might finance small business starts in the vicinity of the first housing.

Thus, what is proposed is not simply a low-cost housing development but a community development program. So far, no such program has proceeded in Atlanta, and whatever comes of this one might be a model for this city and for others.

About the Particular Project:

The Royal Knights and the Citizens & Southern National Bank, have purchased two and a half acres near Westview Cemetery. The bank has provided an opportunity for the Royal Knights to begin capitalizing the project with the proceeds from sale of a house which the bank has given to the Royal Knights. With perhaps $10,000 thus gained as a starter, the Royal Knights would obtain a like amount from the C & S in the form of a loan. Some of this basic fund would be used to pay the salary of John Brown as full-time director of the project being undertaken.

Mr. Brown has satisfactorily worked out some of the details of this arrangement with Mr. Bob Clayton and Mr. Bill Van Landingham, both of whom are working on community development affairs for C & S.

Professional assistance has been provided by Paul Muldawer, of Muldawer and Patterson, architects, and by Urban East, a planning and development firm which has worked successfully in similar projects elsewhere. These experts have provided their time on a voluntary basis. Further work probably would necessitate contractual arrangement.

On the ground which has been purchased, it is anticipated that 22 units would be built. The current plan is that residents of Vine City would have first choice on occupancy, and that Vine City people will be engaged to the extent possible in the construction. Thus a subsidiary benefit from the project might be the training of untrained people for certain kinds of construction work. Further, there are possibilities for innovation in the construction which might test new methods in reducing the cost of such housing. Mr. Muldawer has explored some of these possibilities and believes this project could have pioneering value for Atlanta.

About the Board:

The board being established to work with the Royal Knights on this project would be a working board of less than a dozen members, perhaps meeting once a month, or as often as the members deem necessary. It would be structured so that its members would bring to it a variety of specialized knowledge applicable to this kind of undertaking.

About the Potential Value of This Undertaking:

It could show the way for Atlanta and perhaps for other cities through its demonstration of: (1) innovative approaches to the production of lower-cost housing; (2) new understanding of how ghetto dwellers may be brought into construction projects serving them; (3) ways in which a community organization such as the Royal Knights may work with a church, a bank, and business and professional people from outside the poverty area to solve some of the problems of the area. The provision of 22 new units of occupant-owned housing would be in itself, of course, a significant social contribution at this time in Atlanta.

First 'Turnkey' Families Move In Here

By JOSEPH P. FRIED

For 66 low-income families, a new six-story apartment building in East Harlem is providing highly welcome living quarters that are in sharp contrast to the deteriorated slum apartments that the families previously occupied.

For city housing officials and for the two large corporations that sponsored the structure, the brown-and-red-brick building represents what they hope to be able to look back upon someday as a milestone in the battle to overcome the city's housing crisis.

The building is the first to be completed here under the so-called "turnkey" approach to erecting low-income public housing, a procedure under which a local housing authority purchases a housing development put up by a private builder.

The turnkey method is advocated in many quarters as superior to construction of developments by housing authorities themselves — the most common method of building public housing in the United States—because private builders, unhampered by many bureaucratic restrictions, can usually get the job done faster.

With construction and financing costs steadily rising, putting housing up more rapidly often means putting it up more cheaply as well.

The East Harlem structure, at First Avenue and 111th Street, was built under what Albert A. Walsh, the chairman of the City Housing Authority, has called "an experimental variation on the turnkey method."

Instead of contracting in advance of construction to buy the completed building —the normal type of turnkey arrangement—the Housing Authority merely entered into a "gentleman's agreement," not legally binding, to purchase the finished building provided that, upon completion, it met the authority's construction and price requirements.

For the developer — Construction for Progress, Inc., an organization formed by the Celanese Corporation and American Standard, Inc.— the handshake agreement meant that the job was being undertaken on speculation. There was always the possibility that the Housing Authority would not buy the completed structure, or that it would buy it at a price that would not permit what the companies considered a reasonable return on their investment.

The latter outcome would not have permitted the project to be considered a success. For the purpose of the undertaking, according to Leonard G. Sucsy, vice president and general manager of Construction for Progress, was to "demonstrate that private enterprise can apply its financial and managerial resources to help solve the slum housing problem and at the same time provide a reasonable return to its shareholders."

As far as Construction for Progress is concerned, the East Harlem undertaking proved precisely that—so convincingly, in fact, that the organization has begun construction of three more public housing structures under the same gentleman's agreement with the Housing Authority, and has entered into various planning and site-selection stages on four additional projects. The seven projects would contain a total of more than 700 apartments.

"We think we got a favorable price, and the building was put up much faster than we could have put up a building of the same size on the same kind of site," Grace Bliss, assistant to Mr. Walsh, the authority chairman, explained last week.

The Housing Authority paid $1.2-million for the structure, and it assumed additional administrative and appraisal costs of $56,000 in connection with the purchase.

The $1.2-million price represented a return to the developers of between 3 and 4 per cent before taxes when measured against the construction cost of about $1-million and the developer's added cost for site acquisition and architectural, financing and other expenses, Mr. Sucsy said.

Eighty per cent of the construction cost was financed with a loan from the Chase Manhattan Bank at 8 per cent annual interest, plus a one-and-a-half-point service charge, bringing the effective cost of the loan up to 9½ per cent.

Regarding the construction time, Miss Bliss noted that slightly over 12 months had elapsed from the time Construction for Progress proposed an acceptable site to the time it had the building up and ready for occupancy two months ago.

Miss Bliss estimated that if the Housing Authority itself had put up a similar building on the same site under its usual procedures, the job would have taken about 30 months, or two and a half times as long, because of required approval and contract bidding methods.

Had the same job been done under the more usual turnkey procedure — that is, with a binding contract rather than a handshake agreement to buy the finished product — it would have taken 21 to 24 months, or nearly twice as long as under the gentleman's agreement, she said.

'Turnkey' Housing Opened in E. Harlem

The reason is that even under the more common turnkey procedure, a fair amount of approval and evaluation by public officials is required before a local housing authority can enter a binding contract to buy a project upon its completion by a private builder.

While the intricacies of construction timetables and financing were major concerns of the builders and the Housing Authority, apartment sizes and rents were uppermost in the minds of the tenants.

The rents average about $18 a room a month and the 66 apartments comprise 17 three-room efficiencies, all reserved for the elderly; 22 one-bedroom apartments, 15 two-bedroom, six three-bedroom and six four-bedroom units. The efficiencies rent for between $49 and $57 a month while, at the higher end of the rent scale, the four-bedroom units, each having a total of six and a half rooms, rent for between $88 and $90 each.

A community group was formed to aid in recommending tenants for the building, Mr. Sucsy said, and the Architects Renewal Committee in Harlem acted as design consultants to the architects, Wechsler & Schimenti. The Valridge Construction Company was the contractor.

Columbia University's Division of Urban Planning provided guidance on the project and on establishment of the joint construction venture by Celanese, a diversified chemical company, and American Standard, which produces a wide line of building and industrial products.

Within a few weeks, the Housing Authority expects a second low-income apartment building to be ready for final purchase consideration after construction under the same kind of gentleman's agreement that resulted in the 111th Street building.

The second structure, whose 48 apartments are nearing completion on 123d Street between Park and Lexington Avenues, was built by a joint development corporation formed by the Bowery Savings Bank and the New York Bank for Savings.

The banks had claimed that their 123d Street building, for which ground was broken last July, would be "New York City's first privately built, low-income public housing project." However, the 111th Street structure was completed first.

Also being considered for Housing Authority purchase is a 380-apartment development that a builder is planning at Cassidy Place and Lafayette Avenue along the north shore of Staten Island.

Although increased use of turnkey arrangements has been championed by many—including several Government commissions — as an effective way to provide desperately needed low-income housing, there has also been criticism of the turnkey philosophy.

Jane Benedict, chairman of the Metropolitan Council on Housing, a tenant-oriented group that has been vocal in demanding speeded-up construction procedures for public housing, contended last week that removing restrictions that hamper quick construction by public agencies was preferable to increasing the role of private corporations in creating public housing.

STATEMENT OF POLICY

ON

EQUAL EMPLOYMENT OPPORTUNITY

ADOPTED BY THE

55TH CONVENTION

OF THE

BUILDING AND CONSTRUCTION TRADES DEPARTMENT (AFL-CIO)

SEPTEMBER 22, 1969

AT

ATLANTIC CITY, NEW JERSEY

Statement of Policy of the Building and Construction Trades Department (AFL-CIO) on Equal Employment Opportunity

In these times of heated and emotional controversy over the issue of Negro employment in the building and construction industry, which is carried on under the barely concealed threat of violence, The Building and Construction Trades Department deems it appropriate to present a factual review of the union side of the controversy. Fair minded people in and out of the labor movement will want to hear both sides before forming any judgments.

The Building and Construction Trades Department and its affiliates have not contented themselves with so-called passive non-discrimination programs. Whether or not legally required, the Department and its affiliates have undertaken affirmative action to increase Negro employment in the building and construction trades. At its 1967 Convention, the Building and Construction Trades Department adopted a resolution stating that it "endorses generally the principle of affirmative action to assist Negroes and other minority group persons in finding suitable employment and improving their economic and social status." In a later communication from the President of the Department to the Secretary of Labor, the Department proposed to implement the resolution, among other things, by fostering "with the cooperation of appropriate management organizations programs of recruitment of qualified applicants for apprenticeship from the Negro population and other minority groups."

The Kerner Commission (The National Advisory Commission on Civil Disorders) commended the Department for its action in this regard and recommended that this commitment be intensified and implemented (at page 25).

We believe this recommendation has been heeded. The Apprenticeship Outreach Programs recorded a six month high of 1,537 minority youths accepted as apprentices in the skilled trades from January 1 to June 30, 1969. The total number accepted as apprentices through Outreach since the commencement of the Federally funded program in 1967 is 3,862. Ninety-three percent of the total number were indentured in the building and construction trades although these trades represent 56% of the total registered apprentices in all industries. To get 3,862 apprentices indentured, Apprenticeship Outreach sponsors recruited 27,494 interested candidates.

Citing the six-month achievement, Secretary of Labor Shultz said: "This is but one example of what can be done in attacking a manpower problem, if we study the problem together, devise a workable plan to resolve it, establish attainable goals, and stick to timetables."

Apprenticeship Outreach Programs operate with the cooperation or direct sponsorship of local Building and Construction Trades Councils in more than fifty cities. Among these cities are: Atlanta, Dallas, Knoxville, Miami, San Antonio, Jacksonville, Nashville and Tampa. As of April 1969, Federal funds budgeted for the Outreach Programs amounted to $3,885,287.

To gain an understanding of the Apprenticeship Outreach Programs, it is necessary to turn back to 1963 when it was thought that removal of the race bar and the provision of equal competitive conditions would result in a significant increase in Negro and other minority participation in the apprenticeable trades. The Regulations of the Department of Labor on nondiscrimination in apprenticeship and training provided, among other things, for the proper dissemination of full information about the availability of apprenticeship opportunities, the posting of such information at the normal place of application for apprenticeship, and dissemination of such information to the local employment service and the local schools. It was found, however, that minority group youngsters were not applying for existing apprenticeship programs for a variety of reasons, including the fact that high school counselors seldom advised youngsters to enter what was generally considered a blue collar field. Apprenticeship Information Centers (now operating in thirty-five cities) were established to provide all available information on apprenticeship opportunities in the community in which the particular Center operates and give all necessary support and assistance to young people who wish to become apprentices in the skilled trades. Although the Department of Labor claims that nearly 1,600 minority applicants were indentured during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1969, through the Apprenticeship Information Centers, it appears that many of these persons were also processed through the Apprenticeship Outreach Programs.

Apparently, the provision of information and other assistance through Apprenticeship Information Centers was not sufficient. More intensive effort was required by paid personnel to recruit, train and place minority youth. The pilot Outreach programs in this regard were established by the Workers Defense League—A. Philip Randolph Education Fund in cooperation with the building and construction trades. Most of the WDL apprenticeship candidates came from academic high schools. WDL staff found early that the vocational high schools produced youngsters less able to compete in this job market. They also recognized the need for intensive tutoring before the examination. The tutoring concentrates on mathematics and reading comprehension. Tutorial programs frequently require six to twelve weeks. WDL staff members frequently provide transportation from home to union hall for the applicants checking on why they may have missed a tutoring class and counseling them on personal problems. Practice interviews are held and when birth certificates, high school diplomas, and health records are needed, WDL staff help applicants to secure them. It is apparent that these and other services provided by substantial Federal funds and the cooperative efforts of the Building and Construction Trades Councils together with the Urban League, the Workers Defense League and other organizations constitute affirmative action to satisfy a significant social need.

Some idea of the overall improvement of the racial situation with respect to apprentices is provided by comparing the statistics of 1960 and 1968. The 1960 census statistics show that nonwhites made up 2.5% of the total 85,682 apprentices in the United States. In the first half of 1968 of the 26,156 apprentices newly enrolled, approximately 9.4% came from minority groups.

The following statistics show that the construction industry compares favorably with manufacturing industry insofar as ethnic ratios are concerned:

Apprentices in Federally Serviced Workload as of December 31, 1968

	No. Active	% Minority	% Negro
Construction Industry	91,177	7.2	4.0
Metal Mfg. Industry	39,686	4.3	3.0
Mfg. Non-Metal	10,747	5.3	3.2

The building and construction trades have not limited their efforts to apprenticeship. They have developed plans and procedures for bringing into the industry older minority workers. In July 1968, after an unsuccessful effort to secure an agreement with employer trade associations for the employment of area residents under the Model Cities Program, the General Presidents of the seventeen National and International Unions affiliated with the Building and Construction Trades Department adopted their own policy statement and guidelines on this subject. The General Presidents' program covered three groups: (a) those fully qualified to be laborers or mechanics; (b) those with appreciable construction work experience but not qualified to be mechanics or laborers; and (c) those with little or no construction work experience.

It was recommended that "the agreement provide for additional instruction and basic education for such residents of the area who may benefit from such instruction under Government or industry financed programs. These programs, for a period of time, may result in the work week for such employees being divided between on-site work and specified classroom instruction."

Four experimental programs for the upgrading of journeymen have been initiated in Oakland, California; Buffalo, New York; Boston, Massachusetts; and St. Louis, Missouri. The goals of these programs in the four cities involve the training of 365 minority workers. The Federal budget for the four programs totals $968,-634. Negotiations are under way for other programs in twelve of the fifty-two cities involved in the Outreach programs. These programs present many complex problems and are obviously in a trial and error stage.

The record of effort and concrete results, including the allocation and expenditure of millions of Federal dollars, does not justify the attempt to cast the building and construction trades unions in the roles of scapegoat or whipping boy for all the current ills on the racial scene. The detractors of the building and construction trades unions—the sneerers and the scoffers—use a statistical device to accomplish their end. They elbow aside substantial overall ratios of Negro employment in the building and construction trades by saying, "Oh, that's the laborers." They elbow aside substantial ratios of Negro employment in highly paid occupations in the building and construction trades by saying, "Oh, that's the trowel trades." They confine public attention to trades such as the mechanical trades where lesser ratios of Negro participation may be attributable to higher educational requirements and other cultural factors not related to employment discrimination. They then seek to use these lesser ratios of Negro participation in particular trades as proof that the industry is "lily white."

Even Government officers have fallen for this tactic. The Assistant Secretary of Labor in charge of the Office of Federal Contract Compliance issued the Philadelphia Revised Plan, establishing a quota system, without consultation or hearing on the basis of a figure of 1.6% minority group membership in seven so-called "critical trades." The Plan was ruled illegal by the Comptroller General of the United States on August 5, 1969. It became the subject of a hearing on August 27, 1969, for the purpose of determining so-called rate ranges. At this hearing representatives of the Building and Construction Trades Council of Philadelphia testified that more than 30% of the members employed on unionized jobs within its jurisdiction are black. It was also testified that the following high paying trades had locals with substantial Negro membership: Boilermakers—20%, Carpenters—20%, Cement Masons—37%, Lathers—20%, Operating Engineers—10%, Painters—10%, and Reinforced Rod Setters—30%.

Even with the deduction of the laborers (who received hourly wages and fringe benefits ranging from $4.25 to $4.65 per hour or from $170 to $186 for a 40-hour workweek) from the calculation, the ratio of black participation among the remaining crafts was 12%. It may be noted that even the accuracy of the figure with respect to the "critical trades" was vigorously disputed by the Philadelphia Building and Construction Trades Council.

It is interesting to observe the effect of the application of this technique of selecting arithmetic ratios in particular occupational brackets in other industries. At hearings before the United States Equal Employment Opportunity Commission in New York City, January 1968, the executives of a prominent and highly regarded newspaper testified they had three Negro reporters out of a total of 200; and one Negro out of 220 officials and managers. When asked for an explanation about the lack of equitable representation of Negroes among its reporters, the newspaper executive testified as follows:

> "I do not think there is—at the journeymen level, there is not a large number of people to come in and start off as staff members who have the qualifications in large numbers to start therein."

When advised that the Commission was not talking about "very large numbers," the executive testified "we're not very happy with two." These hearings disclosed that the situation described is not confined to this New York newspaper. A National Associated Press survey of 300 daily newspapers, October 24, 1967, revealed that 119 Negro reporters and no Negro editors were employed by those newspapers. The 1967 EEOC research report on communications industry in New York City shows the following:

	% Negro officials and managers	% Negro professionals
Radio-TV	0.9	1.9
Periodical publishing	0.7	1.0
Newspaper publishing	less than 0.1	1.2

The same unwarranted accusation which has been made against the building and construction trades is now being leveled against the United States Government in a major lawsuit against every member of the Cabinet which has been filed by Julius Hobson (who initiated the important landmark school case resulting in the Skelly Wright decision). It is alleged that, although the Negro ratio of Federal employees is 14% on an overall basis (roughly equivalent to the 14% ratio of blacks in the population), the ratio of black employees in Grades 13 and above is only 1.5%. On the basis of this allegation and other recitals in the complaint, the plaintiffs are asking the Federal court in the District of Columbia to direct the defendants to adopt necessary procedures to achieve "equitable" representation in every unit of the Federal departments or agencies containing fifty or more persons in regard to composition by race. The departments or agencies will be allowed to vary from this standard in those areas in which the department or agency can demonstrate that the population percentage of plaintiff's classes is lower than the national average. The "equitable" representation requirement applies to all classification grade and step increase levels.

The statistical pattern of concentration of Negro employment in lower grade jobs and the declining ratio of such participation in higher grade positions is typical of many industries other than communications and Government.

The Building and Construction Trades Department is of the considered view that the failure of the communications industry and the Government to maintain an objective attitude is inflammatory and prejudicial to the sound and proper solution of the racial issue in the building and construction industry and other segments of American life. We support the right of the Negro to justice. But we cannot accept the simplistic idea that the arithmetic of a population ratio shall become the standard for selection and entry into employment in the building and construction industry.

We favor the acceleration and extension of the Apprenticeship Outreach Programs which have proved successful in actual operation.

We make the flat and unqualified recommendation to local unions throughout the United States that for a stated period of time they should invite the application of qualified minority journeymen for membership in their respective local unions and should accept all such qualified minority journeymen provided they meet the ordinary and equally administered requirements for membership.

We also recommend that the local unions and the local council explore and vigorously pursue training programs for the upgrading of minority workers who are not of apprenticeable age. Such programs should be developed in such manner as to prevent undercutting the established apprenticeship programs. The recommendations which have been previously made on Model Cities should furnish an appropriate guideline for development of these journeymen training programs.

In carrying forward these programs to make effective the rights of Negroes and other minority workers, it must also be recognized that there is a correlative right in the existing members of the organized work force regardless of their color or race. Many of them have fought during their working lives to preserve and advance their unions against the attack of strong anti-labor forces. They have organized in the teeth of the anti-labor provisions of the Taft-Hartley and Landrum-Griffin Acts. They have endured strikes and the picket line to preserve their wage standards. They have played a large part in creating the favorable labor standards of the present time and deserve to have their status in the industry protected and not to lose their rightful share of employment opportunities.

We are convinced that the goal of increasing Negro and other minority worker participation in the building and construction trades can be accomplished with due regard to the rights of the existing organized work force. We think such an approach is preferable to unthinking actions which tend to pit one part of the population against the other.

We also wish to make it clear that we do not favor acceptance of unreasonable demands. The mere assertion of a proposal by a minority group does not necessarily mean that it is in the interest of the black worker, other workers, or the industry.

For example, a militant group involved in a current dispute with the building and construction trades in Pittsburgh has proposed that "There shall be forty percent (40%) black membership in each of the several craft unions to be gained over the next two years" and "No training program in pursuit of [this objective] will exceed eight (8) months in length, irrespective of the craft."

The extravagance of the percentage is self evident. It should also be obvious that a stroke of the pen will not transform the learning process so as to graduate a qualified, skilled craftsman in 8 months when the existing system of apprenticeship has required 4 years. This proposal and others like it compare with the current efforts to establish special curriculums for minority college students. There have been strong expressions from responsible sources that such educational proposals cheat the black student because they will fit him for a "sheltered work shop occupation" rather than competition in the open market. It has been our approach through the Apprenticeship Outreach Program and the experimental development of journeymen training programs to raise less qualified applicants to meet industry standards rather than to lower the standards to meet the lack of qualifications. We do not believe that it is in the interest of the nation, the industry, or the black worker to take "the easy way."

We shall also continue to oppose unsound or unlawful Government measures. The Building and Construction Trades Department objected vigorously to the original "Philadelphia Plan" which was abandoned by the Government after the Comptroller General of the United States ruled it illegal. The Department takes equally strong objection to the "Philadelphia Revised Plan" which is a quota system no matter how it may be dressed up in legal verbiage. We are unalterably opposed to the quota system. The Comptroller General, who certainly cannot be accused of partiality to the Building and Construction Trades unions, has ruled that the "Philadelphia Revised Plan" is also illegal. His basic position is that the "Philadelphia Revised Plan" violates the provisions of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 which provide that nothing in the law shall be authorized to grant preferential treatment to any group because of racial imbalance. He has also stated that: . . . "we believe there is a material difference between the situation in those cases, where enforcement of the rights of the minority individuals to vote or to have unsegregated educational or housing facilities does not deprive any member of a majority group of his rights, and the situation in the employment field, where the hiring of a minority worker, as one of a group whose number is limited by the employer's needs, in preference to one of the majority group precludes the employment of the latter. In other words, in those cases there is present no element of reverse discrimination, but only the correction of the illegal denial of minority rights, leaving the majority in the full exercise and employment of their corresponding rights."

It would have been better, in our judgment, if the hearing on the "Philadelphia Revised Plan" had been held before, rather than after, the Plan was adopted. We trust that the deliberative and consultative procedures of the Government in similar matters will not be abandoned because of activist pressures or the desire for hasty or untimely action.

Dear Emory:

I have been asked by John W. Brown of the Royal Knights Foundation to convene a meeting of a group of persons who have expressed interest in a low cost housing program (see enclosed description sheet). You have indicated a desire to be further informed about this and to possibly serve on a steering committee for this project.

We will meet on Tuesday evening, November 25, 8 P.M. at the Trinity Presbyterian Church, 3003 Howell Mill Road NW (Corner of Howell Mill and Moores Mill Roads). The meeting will be held in the church parlor which is located through the main sanctuary front doors and to the right. I hope that you will be able to attend and that, being briefed on the particulars of this project, you will agree to serve on the steering committee.

Most sincerely,

Allison Williams

Subject: Advisory Board for the Royal Knights Housing Project

The Advisory Board for the Royal Knights Housing Project will meet Tuesday, December 9, 1969 at 8:00 P.M. in the Lounge of the Business Administration Building* at Atlanta University.

A primary purpose of the meeting is to consider the purpose of the Board and its relationship to John Brown and the Royal Knights.

Our agenda might be:

Elect Chm

1. The purpose of the Board
2. The relationship of the Board to John Brown
3. Who will make decisions on the Project
4. Consideration of short-run goals of the Project
5. Consideration of long-run goals of Project
6. Present financial arrangements
7. Future and alternative financial sources

If we follow this agenda, we should be through by 9:15.

PROMOTION SYSTEMS AND EQUAL EMPLOYMENT OPPORTUNITY [1]

I. INTRODUCTION

One factor contributing to the inclusion of Title VII in the Civil Rights Act of 1964 was the growing concern among civil rights advocates about the disadvantaged position of the Negro in the labor market. Testimony before various federal, state, and local fair employment practices commissions had provided ample evidence that the disparity between Negro and white experience in both employment and earnings was attributable, in part, to the systematic exclusion of Negroes from many employment opportunities.[2]

The prohibitions of Title VII against employment discrimination are comprehensive in scope, covering hiring, discharges, promotions, compensation, conditions of work, and the like. The procedures for remedying employment discrimination which it outlines emphasize voluntary compliance. When a complaint is filed with the federal Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, it is referred to a state or local fair employment practices commission for action wherever possible. When a settlement is not obtained at the state or local level, the complaint is then investigated by the EEOC. If the EEOC finds that there is reasonable cause to believe that a complaint has merit, it attempts to induce the respondents voluntarily to develop a remedy, with the assistance of a conciliator. This effort may be followed, if necessary, however, by de novo proceedings in the Federal courts initiated by the complainant, or in some instances by the Justice Department.

The formulation of standards for compliance with Title VII poses challenging problems for the EEOC and the courts, perhaps the most formidable and sensitive being the elimination of racially discriminatory promotion systems.[3] Within the confines of the statute a wide range of competing remedies for this problem are being proffered by legal theorists. Those at one end of the spectrum would protect all existing promotion expectations and would permit Negro employees to fill only those promotion vacancies for which no white employees hold prior claims.[4] Those at the opposite pole feel that such remedies fail to provide Negro employees with full equality of promotion opportunity. Advocates of the latter position suggest that some form of plant-wide seniority should govern promotions, and that the appropriateness of job progression sequences should be reappraised if they inhibit the utilization of such plant-wide seniority.[5]

[1] The Civil Rights Act of 1964 prohibits discrimination because of race, color, religion, sex, or national origin. This paper will deal exclusively with problems of racial discrimination in manufacturing plants.

[2] See 1961 Commission on Civil Rights Report, Vol. 3, Employment, pp. 128–150; Michael I. Sovern, Legal Restraints On Racial Discrimination In Employment (New York: The Twentieth Century Fund, 1966), pp. 15–17, 48–55, 105–140; and Ray Marshall, The Negro and Organized Labor (New York: John Wiley & Sons, Inc., 1965).

While the courts are not strangers to the problem of discriminatory promotion systems, having dealt with them in a limited fashion in the context of the duty of fair representation, Title VII creates a new avenue for relief from discrimination.[6] The standards which will emerge from EEOC and court involvement in defining compliance with Title VII and in fashioning appropriate remedies to promotion discrimination will presumably have considerable impact upon the substantive provisions concerning promotions, layoffs, and on-the-job training sequences contained in collective bargaining agreements, particularly those covering Southern plants.[7]

II. THE DESIGN AND FUNCTION OF PROMOTION SYSTEMS

Analytically, a promotion system consists of four components: (1) the promotion unit or primary group of job classifications within

[3] According to figures released by the Commission for the first six months of its operation, roughly one third of the complaints were related to the operation of the promotion system. (Cited by the Bureau of National Affairs in 61 LRR 61, January 31, 1966.) This figure probably overstates the volume of promotion cases because of some double counting.

[4] This is essentially the form of relief approved by the courts in a recent promotion system case arising under the NLRA doctrine of fair representation. See Whitfield v. United Steelworkers of America 263 F. 2d. 546 cert. denied 360 U.S. 902 (1959).

[5] See, for example, William B. Gould, "The Negro Revolution and the Law of Collective Bargaining," 34 Fordham Law Review 207, pp. 216–26.

[6] See, for example, the treatment of discriminatory promotion systems in Steele v. Louisville & Nashville RR Co. 323 U.S. 192 (1944) and Whitfield v. United Steelworkers of America, op. cit.

[7] While the legal requirements of Title VII are the same for all plants, organized and unorganized, the unorganized plants lack the collective bargaining mechanism, including an arbitration procedure, for developing and implementing remedies.

which an employee makes vertical and lateral inter-job transfers,[8] (2) the job classifications through which he enters or leaves the promotion unit, (3) the criteria, such as ability or seniority, governing movements within the promotion unit and into or out of the unit, and (4) the procedures by which job vacancies are offered to employees (job posting systems) and by which employees indicate a willingness to accept job changes (job bidding or assignment systems). The more detailed elements of promotion systems which are critical in determining patterns of labor allocation within the plant include the weights assigned to ability and seniority criteria for promotions, the placement of job classifications into particular units, the extent of bidding or bumping rights, the seniority rights which an employee retains when transferring between job classifications or promotion units, and the like.

There is a wide diversity in the design and operation of promotion systems among the plants in a locality, industry, and even within a multi-plant company, which is attributable to the diverse economic and social contexts within which they function. In organized plants, and in many which are unorganized, the rules governing formal promotion systems establish some measure of the employees' job rights, job security, and promotion opportunities. For the employer, these rules provide a means of reconciling the human relations problems of job competition among the employees, especially in plants where there are static or declining opportunities for employment and advancement. Such systems also provide an orderly administrative mechanism for allocating work opportunities and for developing job skills and experience through on-the-job training sequences.[9] While these formal promotion arrangements typically constrain management's freedom to assign workers solely on the basis of ability or convenience, they have usually been designed so that efficiency has not been significantly impeded.[10]

[8] The scope of the unit will often vary with the type of movement (i.e. layoff, promotion, transfer, and the like) and will typically depend on whether the movement is temporary or permanent. It may consist of a single job classification, as in some textile, apparel, and shoe plants; a multi-classification progression line embodying formally defined interconnections among job classifications; or broader agglomerations of job classifications which are department or plant-wide.

[9] See Sumner H. Slichter, James J. Healy, and E. Robert Livernash, The Impact of Collective Bargaining on Management (Washington: The Brookings Institution, 1960), pp. 104–210.

[10] See James J. Healy, "The Factor of Ability in Labor Relations," Arbitration Today, Proceedings of the Eighth Annual Meeting of the National Academy of Arbitrators, 1955.

In general, these systems recognize both the daily and the long run economic needs of employers and employees. These needs are controlled largely by the type of skills needed, the prospects for the growth or decline of employment in the plant and in the locality, the seasonal or cyclical fluctuations which occur in the production process, the characteristics of the local labor supply, and the economic commitments of the workers in the plant.[11] Since these factors will vary considerably, both among different plants and in the same plant over time, promotion systems are typically negotiated locally or as local supplements to national agreements.

Changes in any of the above variables can radically alter both the employer's and the employee's perception of the type of promotion system required in the plant. The local establishment of these systems permits the parties to modify them as local conditions change. This flexibility is always tempered, however, by employment expectations created during the previous operation of the system.[12] Thus the promotion system is often the product of an evolving series of accommodations to both economic forces and custom.

Most formal promotion systems may be said to operate discriminatorily as they favor some groups of workers over others. In those promotion systems which are based, at least in part, upon length of service, and in which promotion units are broad, the employment position of the older workers is generally enhanced. In enterprises where promotion units are narrower, the employment advantage lies with the more senior workers in each unit, but workers within units experiencing stable or growing employment will fare better, on the whole, than those in declining units, regardless of the absolue value of their seniority. While such non-racial discrimination cannot be eliminated, its incidence can be justfied by reference to the balance which it achieves: (1) between management's objectives of efficiency and the union's concern for employment security for its senior mem-

[11] For a further description of the contribution of economic forces to the development of promotion systems see Peter B. Doeringer, "The Determinants of the Structure of Industrial Type Internal Labor Markets," Industrial and Labor Relations Review, Vol. 20, No. 2, January 1967.

[12] The status of these expectations, both as a pragmatic industrial relations problem and as a legal question, is critical to the development of appropriate remedies to promotion systems which are racially discriminatory. As Cox noted, "From a practical standpoint seniority confers a status more important than a bare contractual undertaking. In practice seniority clauses are usually carried forward from year to year. Contract and custom create expectations. Expectations create reliance." Archibald Cox, "The Duty of Fair Representation," 2 Villanova Law Review 151, p. 164.

Negotiated modifications of promotion systems are typically precipitated by unforeseen economic events such as corporate mergers, plant expansion, prolonged periods of employment contraction limited to particular units, skill scarcities, or radical changes in technology with which the existing system was unable to deal.[14] These modifications often rearrange job equities and require the establishment of a new balance among the competing interests within the plant. When plant employment is expanding rapidly this balance is more easily achieved, since the economic opportunities of some groups need not be improved entirely at the expense of others. When employment is contracting, however, substantial discontent, leading sometimes to wildcat strikes, sabotage, or increased labor turnover, may be generated among workers who are disadvantaged by the modification of the promotion system.[15]

III. TYPES OF DISCRIMINATORY PROMOTION SYSTEMS

Most collective agreements governing racially discriminatory promotion systems do not contain provisions which explicity disadvantage Negroes. Instead, the definition of promotion units, transfer rights between units, promotion criteria, and patterns of hiring and assigning employees to units are used to limit the Negro's advancement opportunity.[16]

The patterns of racial discrimination in promotion systems can, for the most part, be divided into three broad categories. The least common type consists of two functionally identical progression lines

[13] The courts have recognized that a union typically represents groups within its membership which are actively competitive on issues such as seniority where one group tends to benefit only at the expense of another. See, for example, Ford Motor Co. v. Huffman, 345 U.S. 330 (1953), and Humphrey v. Moore 375 U.S. 335 (1964).

[14] For a discussion of seniority problems during business mergers, see Thomas Kennedy, "Merging Seniority Lists," in Labor Arbitration and Industrial Change. Proceedings of the Sixteenth Annual Meeting of the National Academy of Arbitrators (Washington: BNA Inc., 1963), and Mark L. Kahn, "Seniority Problems in Business Mergers," Industrial and Labor Relations Review, April 1955.

[15] Sayles and Strauss point out, for example, that typically about one third of employee grievances are related to the operation of the promotion system. Leonard R. Sayles and George Strauss, The Local Union: Its Place in the Industrial Plant (New York: Harper & Brothers, 1953), pp. 51–52. See also Kennedy, op. cit., and Kahn, op. cit.

[16] As a legal problem the identification of a racially discriminatory promotion system must be inferred from circumstantial evidence. There is no generally applicable standard for determining the lawfulness of a system.

within a single department, one Negro and the other white. A more typical arrangement involves restricting Negroes to the lower paying job classifications and progression lines within a department. In some instances these progression lines may be functionally related to those occupied by white employees, so that job experience acquired in the Negro progression lines can be utilized in the white progression lines. The third type of discriminatory promotion system restricts Negroes to separate units such as labor pools, less desirable production departments, or unskilled job classifications which are not connected to other promotion units. Here the functional relationships between the Negro and white promotion units are less clear or nonexistent. Discrimination of the latter type may also be reinforced by bargaining unit boundaries, as when different promotion units are represented by different unions or when certain groups—laborers, janitors, and the like—are not included within any bargaining unit.

Such segregated promotion units may either be formally established or may exist informally through tacit arrangements which permit only white employees to transfer permanently into the more desirable job classifications. The net result of these systems has been to reduce the past economic opportunities of Negroes and also to limit their opportunities to acquire either the requisite in-plant training or the seniority credits to enable them to compete for future promotions on an equal basis with white employees.

IV. REMEDYING DISCRIMINATORY PROMOTION SYSTEMS

Remedies for discriminatory promotion systems may involve changes in both the scope of the promotion unit and the rules governing the priorities for inter-unit and intra-unit promotions and transfers. The former type of remedy includes arrangements such as:

1. Dovetailing functionally identical Negro and white progression lines by merging similar job classifications.
2. Broadening the scope of the promotion unit through the merger of white and Negro units by job grade, seniority date, or other objective criteria.
3. Removing barriers to transfer between Negro and white promotion units.
4. Merging less skilled Negro and white job classifications to form multi-department pools or "pans" for the exercise of promotion or transfer rights among the lower skilled, more easily learned jobs, combined with a narrow promotion unit structure for higher skilled job classifications.

The latter type of remedy, changing the rules governing priorities for promotions, transfers, and layoffs, includes:

1. Modifications in job bidding and posting procedures to give Negro employees a systematic mechanism for gaining access to previously white job classifications.
2. Modifications in the promotion clause to relax the ability criterion by providing trial periods for promotions, instituting longer training periods to test ability to perform a job, and recognizing an employee's potential for training as well as his job experience.
3. Establishment of programs for upgrading the skills of the lower paid employees in the plant, to enhance their promotion qualifications within the existing rules system.

Such remedies can be combined in a variety of ways to suit the particular conditions surrounding each discriminatory promotion system. While they can all be implemented voluntarily through collective bargaining procedures, distinctions may be drawn among them on the basis of (1) the distribution of the costs of the remedy among the parties, and (2) the degree to which they are required by Title VII.

Consider, for example, the type of remedy in which white and Negro promotion units are merged in a manner which permits Negro employees to move into only those vacancies in the previously white job classifications for which white employees hold no prior promotion expectations. Such remedies do not create any significant additional training costs for the employer, nor do the white employees bear any costs of reduced promotion opportunities. By permitting the white employees to exercise training and seniority previously acquired under the discriminatory system, however, a period of transition is established during which Negro employees continue to bear the implicit costs of reduced promotion opportunities.

An alternative remedy which recognizes these transition costs, is to permit Negroes to advance into job vacancies for which whites held priority rights under the previous promotion system. This would include, for example, broadening the scope of the promotion unit in which length of service credits can be exercised in job bidding, and relaxing the ability criteria to be used in evaluating an employee's qualifications for promotion. When ability qualifications are maintained while the scope of the unit in which seniority rights are exercised is broadened, any increase in the advancement rates of Negro employees will come entirely at the expense of reduced promotion opportunities for the white employees with no costs being incurred by the employer. If ability standards are relaxed, however, the employer also shares some of the remedy costs by providing additional training with each promotion. In the extreme case, in which senior Negroes are allowed to displace junior white job incumbents, regardless of ability, the cost of the remedy is borne exclusively by the employer and the white employees.

The implication of this analysis is not that an appropriate remedy should be defined by some cost formula, but rather that the acceptability to the parties of a particular remedy is conditioned by the distribution of its costs. The final form which a voluntary remedy will assume in each case, however, will also be considerably influenced by the attitude of the courts toward discriminatory promotion systems, especially in their determination of the amount of protection accorded to the ability and seniority rights acquired by white employees in promotion units or job classifications, which were previously closed to Negroes.

Neither the language of Title VII nor its legislative history provide definite guidance in this area. It seems clear from the Senate debate that ability standards and formal job qualifications are largely protected [17] and that, at least in some instances, Title VII cannot require that incumbents be displaced.[18] One might also argue that the same principle which protects job incumbency can logically be extended to protect downgrading and layoff rights, but the legislative history is not explicit on this point.

The Senate debate is even less certain as to whether seniority or ability rights to promotion vacancies open previously only to white employees are also protected. There is considerable evidence, for example, that the Senate did not consider the seniority issue except in the limited context of a plant-wide promotion unit.[19] Moreover, much of the debate focused upon the seniority problem in all-white plants or in plants which had only recently begun to hire Negroes.[20] While Senators Case and Clark, the floor managers of the legislation, stated clearly that "seniority rights are in no way affected,"[21] they also asserted that if seniority rules are discriminatory they are unlawful, that future job vacancies (without distinguishing between hiring and promotion vacancies) must be filled on a non-discriminatory basis, and that only "established seniority rights" are protected.[22]

By protecting a limited set of established rights and standards within promotion systems, the legislative history constrains, to some degree, the types of remedies which the courts can require. Any such solution, moreover, is likely to have certain practical disadvantages in its application.

Remedies which permit Negro employees to transfer into only those vacancies in previously white job classifications to which white employees hold no prior claims will continue to restrict, for some period, the Negroes' promotion opportunities. If the courts recognize this inequity and endorse some form of remedy which rearranges promotion rights or job security, the following disadvantages accrue. (1) The remedy will be meaningless if Negroes lack the qualifications required for upgrading. (2) The distribution of the costs of the remedy between the respondents seems excessively imbalanced. Given the ability qualification in most promotion agreements and the apparent protection accorded such clauses under Title VII, the employer would not bear any additional training costs. Moreover, while the remedy imposes a cost on the white employees, it is not collected from them as a class, but rather from particular individuals who are denied promotions which they would have received under the previous system. (3) The discretionary latitude inherent in the application of the ability clause, when determining the qualification of an employee for promotion, may make the remedy technically difficult to enforce if the employer and the union are not firmly committed to accepting it.

These disadvantages, in my view, indicate that the types of solutions which the courts can require are likely to be less effective than those which are available through voluntary negotiation. This suggests that in order to encourage the broader range of remedies which are within the purview of voluntary compliance but which the courts cannot require, the courts might well adopt, where necessary, a position which would impose some moderate costs upon the respondents, as, for example, requiring forms of promotion system reorganization which would permit qualified Negroes to exercise previously acquired seniority rights for bidding into job vacancies in broad promotion units encompassing both Negro and white job classifications. Such remedies seem preferable, not as a rigid standard for compliance with the Act, but rather as an incentive to the parties to develop more suitable alternatives.

One alternative might be to expand the scope of the promotion unit to encompass both Negro and white job classifications, combined with a broadening of the criteria governing promotions to include an employee's training potential as well as his ability and seniority.[23] This remedy would increase the likelihood of promotion for the more capable Negro employees by recognizing a wider range of relevant considerations in determining eligibility for promotion.

A second, and in the long run perhaps more satisfactory, alternative is to have the employees currently in Negro promotion units be given preferential access rights to the entry jobs in the previously white units. This promotion system reorganization would be maximally compatible with the existing collective bargaining relationships and would provide the non-discriminatory promotion framework of which the employer and the union are most likely to ensure the success. Since it does not provide Negro employees with any opportunities to acquire non-entry jobs in the white unit commensurate with their seniority or ability, however, it should be considered as only a partial fulfillment of the obligation of the union and the employer to provide appropriate affirmative action to eliminate the discrimination.

The quid pro quo for the waiver by the Negro employees of the potential promotion rights available under a court remedy such as that suggested above, should be that they receive additional compensation, such as bump-back rights into their previous unit during reductions in forces, and, most important, additional training to ensure their qualification for promotion when job vacancies occur or to develop more general skills.

Such a solution will provide fewer immediate economic advantages for particularly well qualified Negro employees than can perhaps be required by the Act. It recognizes the diversity of competing needs and preferences in the plant, however, and will more effectively serve the long run interests of the Negro employees, as a class, by ensuring that more of them will be qualified for advancement and that such advancement will not require the sacrifice of income or job security. Moreover, it provides a mechanism through which the employer and the union can share the costs rather than penalizing specific individuals who may not have been responsible for the discrimination. Perhaps more important, this solution permits the parties to the complaint to exercise wider discretion in fashioning remedies through a collective bargaining process which recognizes the diversity of competing needs and preferences within the plant.

V. FACILITATING THE PROCESS OF COMPLIANCE

In conclusion, there are two areas which warrant further exploration by the parties and the Commission in order to increase the likelihood of securing voluntary compliance with the Act: (1) expanding the promotion opportunities for the employees in the plant, and (2) creating additional machinery for dealing with impasses during conciliation.

As indicated above, equal employment opportunity objectives are most readily achieved during periods of economic expansion. While the overall rate of economic growth is a micro parameter, the employer has available certain instruments for influencing the expansion of promotion opportunities within the plant. When racially discriminatory promotion systems exist in a plant which is part of a multiplant corporation, corporate management might be urged by the Commission or the respondents to increase the available jobs in the plant by diverting additional production orders, and even funds for capital expansion, into those plants which are attempting to comply with Title VII.

In addition, there are desirable jobs within the bargaining unit which are normally filled by hiring (some maintenance and production craft occupations, for example) which potentially represent additional promotion opportunities, provided that appropriate training arrangements are established. This same procedure can also be extended to include craft, clerical, and technical positions outside of the bargaining unit. In plants with declining employment, where such arrangements cannot provide significant expansion in promotion opportunities, a more ambitious program could be developed to provide employees in the lower paying, and typically Negro, jobs with training in basic English and mathematics, vocational skills, and clerical or technical skills which could then qualify them for a broader range of jobs with other employers in the community. While the training required for these jobs will typically be substantial, assistance may be available from local school systems and from the federal government under the Vocational Education Act and the MDTA.

Finally, since not all complaints will be resolved voluntarily, the Commission might wish to consider the possibility of interposing additional procedural steps between conciliation and litigation in the courts. In view of the willingness of Congress and the courts to encourage fact finding and arbitration in private industrial disputes, modified forms of these techniques might also be appropriate in correcting discriminatory employment arrangements.[24] The Commission, with the assistance of groups such as the National Academy of Arbitrators or the American Arbitration Association, could establish a panel of recognized private arbitrators and mediators to handle those cases in which conciliation was not completely successful. If a complaint under Title VII could not be resolved through conciliation, the employer, the labor organization, and the complaining party could be given the option of continuing the case in the courts or of agreeing to submit the unresolved issues to an intermediate step involving either fact finding with recommendations or binding arbitration subject to Commission and Court review. The costs incurred in these procedures could be shared by the respondents, as they are in conventional arbitrations.

These additional options allow the parties to preserve some of the initiative and flexibility of voluntary compliance by voluntarily delegating the responsibility for developing a remedy to a mutually acceptable neutral. Moreover, such neutrals can presumably bring more expertise to the resolution of these difficult issues than can the courts.

Employment: The Neglected Indicator

W-S-J 2/3/78

By GEOFFREY H. MOORE

Ask any newspaper reader what the unemployment rate today is and he will probably know it is about 6%. Ask him whether employment is rising, or falling or remaining about the same and he probably won't have the foggiest idea. If he has thought about it at all, he may reason that employment and unemployment are just reverse sides of the same coin, and if you know what is happening to one, the opposite must be happening to the other. Unfortunately, he would be wrong.

In general, a great deal more is said about the unemployment rate and its movements than about the level of employment and its movements. This is understandable because of our public concern about the hardships suffered by many who can't find work. But, as an indicator of the economic situation, employment deserves at least equal attention. Three principal reasons underlie this assertion.

First, the concept of employment is firmer than the concept of unemployment. Having a job and being paid for it is, for the most part, an observable experience. True, there are some fuzzy situations—as when a person is on strike, or when he has accepted a job but has not yet started to work, or when he is on vacation without pay, or when he is working only a few hours a week. But most of these situations can be objectively identified and decided by rules set up for the purpose.

The concept of unemployment is quite different. For those who have had a job and have just been laid off, the situation may be clear. Nevertheless, unless the worker is doing something to seek work, he will not be counted as unemployed according to the definition used for many years in the U.S. Those who are unemployed because they have been laid off constitute only 40% to 50% of the unemployed. The rest have either quit their jobs voluntarily or have not recently (or ever) had a job. Now they are seeking one.

The Job Seekers

Seeking a job is not as clear-cut a condition as having a job. One can seek half-heartedly or energetically. One can seek a job yet turn down one or more offers. One can set realistic or unrealistic standards for pay, hours, type of work or location. Furthermore, one can accept a job without having sought it, in which case one will become employed without having been unemployed. Or one can seek a job and at the same time have another full-time activity, such as being a student. Or one can have given up seeking a job because none was to be found, yet be quite ready to take one if the opportunity comes along.

In short, for a sizable number of the jobless, whether one is unemployed or not is to some degree a matter of opinion. In the household survey from which estimates of total employment and unemployment are derived, questions are answered by the respondent—often the housewife who happens to be at home and who answers for the entire family. Hence there is bound to be some variability in opinion from one household to another, or from the same household at different times. This is one reason for paying close attention to unemployment rates for those whose unemployed status is not likely to be in doubt—married men or heads of household, those who have lost their job or those who are seeking full-time work. It is also a reason for focusing on employment trends, since variability of opinion is likely to be much less important when the individual is employed.

A second reason for watching the trend of employment is statistical. Because only a small fraction of the labor force is unemployed, the numbers are subject to a much larger relative sampling error than the numbers of employed. Moreover, seasonal variations are easier to eliminate in employment than in unemployment, so the results are less subject to revision. Hence one can be more confident with respect to a developing trend in the employment than in the unemployment data.

A third reason that employment deserves equal consideration with unemployment as an index of the economic health of the nation has to do with their cyclical behavior. Ordinarily the total labor force of the country—those at work and seeking work—grows fairly steadily year in and year out with the growth of population. The business cycle has some effect on the rate of growth of labor force, especially on those workers who are not the family breadwinners, but the influence is relatively small. What the business cycle does affect in a substantial way is employment, and these effects take time to spread across the entire economy. Not all companies or establishments or industries begin to expand at once when an economic recovery begins, nor do they all contract at once when a recession hits.

As a result, at the beginning of a recovery the expansion of aggregate employment usually starts off at a slow pace, less than the continuing growth of the labor force. Indeed, the growth of the labor force may be stimulated to some degree by the improving employment situation. Unemployment continues to rise, therefore, despite the rise in employment.

But the rise in unemployment under these conditions is not a sign that the economy is deteriorating. On the contrary, the economy is gaining strength. Moreover, the outlook is improving even for many of those who are unemployed, because the prospects for finding a job improve when employment is rising—since that means more workers are being hired than are being fired.

In short, at a time of economic recovery unemployment is typically a lagging indicator relative to employment. Not until the expansion of employment catches up with and surpasses the growth in the labor force is there any decline in unemployment.

It is equally true, of course, and for similar reasons, that at the time of an economic downturn unemployment tends to be a leading indicator relative to employment. The slowing in the rate of increase in total employment, while the labor force continues to grow at about the same pace as before, usually brings about a rise in unemployment before employment begins to decline. This underlines the importance of considering the movements of both employment and unemployment.

Indeed, none of the points made above denigrate the importance of the unemployment data. What they do suggest is that just as close attention should be paid to the trend of employment in appraising the economic scene.

UNITED STATES CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION

VOLUME 4 NUMBER 6 APRIL-MAY 1972

MRS. SARAH JENKINS, Certification Clerk in the Detroit CSC Area Office and mother of 10 children, discusses her work with Area Manager Ronald Martens. (See story on page 2.)

NIH Launches Major Drive For Minorities

The Office of Health Manpower Education, part of the National Institutes of Health Bureau of Health Manpower Education, will lead a major new effort to recruit members of minority groups into health careers.

Dr. George Blue Spruce, an Indian dentist, is heading the newly organized office. The new office will identify disadvantaged young people with potential for health careers and assist them in enrolling in health professional schools or other health training.

Special concern will be directed toward assisting black Americans, American Indians, Spanish Americans, women, and students.

A consolidation of the Bureau's current activities in recruiting minority groups, the office will also administer grant programs designed to improve the distribution and supply of health manpower.

Five million dollars will be available in the current fiscal year for this effort.

CSC Fills 2 Key EEO Posts

Two key appointments have been made in the Civil Service Commission's equal employment opportunity program.

Gerald K. Hinch, former Labor Relations Officer in the CSC Chicago Regional Office, has been assigned as Director of Federal Equal Employment Opportunity. He succeeds James Frazier who recently accepted a position with the U.S. Department of Transportation.

Higinio Costales, former Civil James Rights Officer with the Department of Transportation, has been named Director of the Commission's program for the Spanish-speaking, wiht responsibility for carrying out the President's 16-point program.

The two new appointees, along with Federal Women's Program director Helene Markoff, will provide leadership for a strengthened Commission role in EEO under the Equal Employment Opportunity Act of 1972.

The EEO Act, signed by President Nixon on March 24, includes Federal agencies and employees under the equal employment opportunity provisions of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 for the first time. It gives the Civil Service Commission additional enforcement powers, and gives the Commission direct authority to see that all personnel actions in Government are free from discrimination.

Mr. Hinch joined the Commission's Labor Relations staff in Chicago in February 1970. Earlier he held positions in the supervision, personnel

Mother's Desire To Avoid Welfare Leads To Personnel Career

The social worker had told the Detroit mother who was estranged from her unemployed husband that she would be better off taking care of her children at home and receiving a welfare check, rather than going to work.

But the mother was determined that she wanted to set the proper example for her children, so she took a job as a cleaning woman with the Detroit Board of Education at $1.98 an hour.

Mrs. Sarah Jenkins is presently a GS-5 Certification Clerk with the Detroit Area Office of the U.S. Civil Service Commission, where she is in charge of 2 other clerks. She also serves as Equal Employment Opportunity Counselor for the Area Office.

Regarded by her supervisor, August Childress who is Chief, Examining and Certification Section, as his "right arm," Mrs. Jenkins aspires to become a Personnel Staffing Specialist.

She has completed the Equal Employment Opportunity Counselor course, a correspondence course in Personnel Management, and is currently enrolled in a Personnel Clerk Functions course.

The road has not been an easy one for Mrs. Jenkins. Her educational background prior to going to work for the Detroit Board of Education, included a high school diploma and attendance at Lewis Business College, and no work experience.

In 1966, she took a year's leave of absence from the Detroit Board of Education to enter a work-study program for Aid to Dependent Children mothers, sponsored by the Wayne County Social Services Department. Upon completion of the training program, Mrs. Jenkins passed the Clerk-Typist examination and was employed as a GS-2 Clerk-Typist with the CSC Area Office in November of 1966.

"When she first joined the staff, I wasn't sure she would make it," said Mr. Childress. "But she performed over and beyond the call of duty."

Commenting on Mrs. Jenkins' desire to become a Personnel Staffing Specialist, Mr. Childress says, "I think she has the determination, intelligence and ability. In short, she'll make it."

Ronald Martens, Detroit Area Manager, is also very complimentary of Mrs. Jenkins' performance. "She is the contact between the agencies and the Detroit Area Office," explains Martens, and "is the first contact if an agency has a problem with a certificate. She is also the person who can expedite emergency requests from installations."

"Installations are most complimentary of the services that Mrs. Jenkins provides," Mr. Martens says.

Five of the Jenkins children were graduated from high school and are no longer at home. Two of her daughters have worked as Clerk-Typists for the Internal Revenue Service. A daughter, one of the five children at home, will be graduated from high school in June and would like to attend college.

Outside of work, Mrs. Jenkins is very active in activities at Detroit Unity Baptist Church. She is church clerk, president of the church choir, and spends several evenings a week at rehearsal. Her children are also involved in church activities.

"Although it has been rather difficult, being the sole breadwinner in the home, I've never regretted my decision regarding welfare," Mrs. Jenkins says.

Tillman to Speed Complaints Process

Lisbon U. Tillman has been named head of a new Discrimination Complaint Processing Branch in the Civil Service Commission's Office of Equal Employment Opportunity.

He will monitor agency actions in the handling of discrimination complaints based on race, color, religion, sex, or national origin, and will provide technical guidance to the Commission staff of Equal Employment Opportunity appeals examiners who hold hearings on complaints arising in Federal agencies.

A graduate of Harvard Law School with private law practice before entering Government, Tillman was serving with NLRB as an attorney and advisor to a Board member when selected for his new assignment.

Job Opportunities Improved For Vets

Civil Service regulations have been changed to improve Federal job opportunities for returning veterans.

Under the new procedures a Vietnam-era veteran discharged within the past year with not more than 14 years of schooling may be given a temporary appointment up to grade GS-5 or its equivalent if he meets the qualifications of the job being filled. He need not compete with others for relative standing on a list of eligibles.

If a written test is included in the qualification requirement the veteran must pass it, but a passing mark is sufficient. Military service alone is qualifying for any appointment up through grade GS-3 provided the employing agency determines the veteran can perform the duties in a satisfactory manner.

The new authority to hire returning veterans noncompetitively for temporary jobs is similar in many respects to the Veterans Readjustment Appointment (VRA) authority for placing veterans in continuing jobs, but it differs in two respects. The veterans appointed noncompetitively to a temporary job is not required to agree to training, and the appointment does not lead to career status.

OIC CITES CSC CHAIRMAN—Dr. Leon H. Sullivan (right), chairman and founder of Opportunities Industrialization Centers, (OIC) Inc., presents the Government Executive Award to Robert E. Hampton, Chairman of the U.S. Civil Service Commission, for his leadership in providing employment and training opportunities for the disadvantaged in Government. The presentation was a highlight of Government Day at the recent OIC national convention in Washington, D.C. Calling Mr. Hampton "one of the greatest civil servants in the country," Dr. Sullivan recalled meeting Mr. Hampton in 1969, soon after he became CSC Chairman, and discussing how the public and private sectors could work together to make America great. "Robert Hampton has kept his side of the bargain," Dr. Sullivan declared. The Commission has leadership responsibility for the Government-wide equal employment opportunity program, and under Mr. Hampton's direction has emphasized upward mobility for lower-level employees and opportunities for the disadvantaged. Since 1969, nearly 50,000 persons with minimal skills have been hired by Federal agencies through the Worker-trainee examination, and about 300,000 employees in lower grades have received training to help improve their job skills and prepare them for advancement. At the same time, the number of minority-group employees has increased (to 503,608 or 19.5%), despite an overall decrease in the Federal work force, and increasing numbers of minority employees have been advancing into middle and higher grades through the Government.

Booklet Out On EEO Investigations

A revised pamphlet on investigating complaints of discrimination in federal employment has been published by the U.S. Civil Service Commission.

The publication entitled, "Investigating Complaints of Discrimination in Federal Employment," Personnel Methods Series No. 17 (Revised Edition, October 1971), offers guidelines to assist persons who carry out investigations of complaints of discrimination on grounds of race, color, religion, sex or national origin in Federal employment.

Covered in the publication are such topics as origins of discrimination cases, roles of the investigator, scope of investigation, steps in conducting the investigation, and points to be included in certain types of complaints.

Qualities and conduct required of investigators are also outlined in the booklet.

The publication is available through the Superintendent of Documents, U.S. Government Printing Office, Washington, D.C. 20402. at 25¢ per copy.

Federal Women's Program Booklet Out

A new booklet on the Federal Women's Program has been released by the U.S. Civil Service Commission.

The booklet entitled "The Federal Women's Program: A Point of View" is designed to acquaint women in the Federal workforce as well as women outside Government with the Federal Women's Program, and to encourage Federal managers and supervisors to support affirmative action to assure equal opportunity for women in all aspects of employment.

management, and training and development at the Hines (Illinois) Veterans Administration Hospital.

He has also been active in the field of equal employment opportunity with local organizations in the Chicago area, and is a member of the DuPage County (Illinois) Human Relations Advisory Commission.

In announcing Hinch's appointment, CSC Chairman Robert E. Hampton said: "Mr. Hinch brings to this key position a rich and varied background in equal opportunity, personnel management, labor relations, education, and community service."

Mr. Costales, who succeeded Fernando E. C. DeBaca upon the latter's transfer to the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare as Regional Director in San Francisco, has had wide experience in both personnel management and equal opportunity work in the Federal Government.

In addition to his service as a civil rights officer in Transportation, he served as a personnel officer for the Internal Revenue Service in Washington and Albuquerque, and immediately prior to joining the Department of Transportation, was equal employment opportunity officer for Kirtland Air Force Base in New Mexico. His experience also includes a tour of duty as personnel officer with the Agency for International Development in Turkey.

He has been active in the League of United Latin American Citizens.

Federal Woman's Award To 6

Six outstanding Government career women received the 12th annual Federal Woman's Award during ceremonies in Washington, D.C., recently.

The winners, nominated by their agencies and chosen by an independent panel of judges, were honored for their outstanding contributions to the quality and efficiency of the career service of the Federal Government, for their influence on major Government programs, and for personal qualities of leadership, judgment, integrity, and dedication.

The six women selected to receive the 1972 Award are:

Dr. Lois Albro Chatham, Chief, Narcotic Addict Rehabilitation Branch, Division of Narcotic Addiction and Drug Abuse, National Institute of Mental Health, Department of Health, Education and Welfare, Rockville, Md.

Mrs. Phyllis Dixon Clemmons, RN, Director, Suicide Prevention and Emergency Mental Health Consultation Service, Mental Health Administration, Department of Human Resources, Government of the District of Columbia.

Dr. Ruth Margaret Davis, Director, Center for Computer Sciences and Technology, National Bureau of Standards, Department of Commerce, Gaithersburg, Md.

Mrs. Mary Harrover Ferguson, Comptroller, Office of Naval Research, and Special Assistant (Financial Management) to the Assistant Secretary for Research and Development, Department of the Navy, Arlington, Va.

Dr. Ruth Mandeville Leverton, Science Advisory (Nutrition), Office of the Administrator, Agricultural Research Service, Department of Agriculture.

Dr. Patricia Ann McCreedy, Public Health Physician, Project Manager of Village Health Program, Agency for International Development, Vientiane, Laos.

As a public service, Woodward and Lothrop, Inc., of Washington, defrays all expenses connected with the Federal Woman's Award.

These are merely fragmentary notes, derived from a search of our files. They do not represent a full picture of any of the cities mentioned. We have simply noted instances of non-traditional employment which we had record of in our files. (All of this group of cities employ Negro policemen.)

Charlotte	-	billing clerk (employed July 1963, apparently first white-collar Negro in municipal employment).
Greensboro	-	cashier in tax assessor's office
Houston	-	4 process servers 6 clerical workers in county clerk's office* (hired 1963) 3 probation officers in juvenile court assistant pumper, 2 foremen in Water Department (hired 1963) 3 beauty shop inspectors in Health Department (hired 1963)
Knoxville	-	clerk in Registrar of Deeds office (hired October 1962)
Memphis	-	Assistant Public Defender 3 sheriff's deputies clerk at City Hall
Nashville	-	firemen supervisor in Welfare Department deputy tax assessor clerical personnel at Housing Commission
New Orleans	-	police sergeant
Richmond	-	6 of 28 fire companies are integrated; in July 1963 the all-Negro company was disbanded and re-assigned.

HOTEL AND RESTAURANT SERVICE

	Hotel and Motel	Restaurant
Richmond	4 leading hotels - the John Marshall, Jefferson Richmond, and Byrd - open. At least 5 motels - 2 Howard Johnsons, 2 Holiday Inns, and the Executive - open.	Most leading restaurants are open. About 25 were so before demonstrations summer 1963; approximately 90 have opened since.
Norfolk	Our information is that all, or virtually all, hotels and motels now open. Most of these changed policies in July 1963 or later; a few (e.g., the Golden Triangle) opened much earlier.	A few only open; these include some of best. All department store dining rooms open (until September 1963 there had been one hold-out).
Greensboro	5 motels -- two Holiday Inns, Howard Johnson, Town House, Kent Court - open. Hotels still segregated, except for dining for some mixed meetings.	37 eating places open; this includes dining room of desegregated motels, department stores; and 6 first-class restaurants, as well as national and regional chains.
Charlotte	5 leading hotels -- Manger, Queen Charlotte, Sheraton-Barringer, Heart of Charlotte, Downtowner -- and 3 leading motels -- Coliseum, James Lee, Alamo Plaza -- open; maybe others.	As of July 1963, 110 of the 286 restaurants regarded before then as all-white were opened.
Knoxville	2 leading hotels -- Andrew Johnson and Farragut - open; 4 others -- the Park, Atkin, Arnold, and St. James -- still segregated. 2 motels -- a Holiday Inn and the White City -- open; others apparently not.	More than 50 open, spread all over city. Practically speaking, all restaurants are open.

Hotel and Restaurant Service - 2.

	Hotel and Motel	Restaurant
Nashville	12 open; the Albert Pick, Hermitage, Andres Jackson, two Holiday Inns, Noel, Downtowner, Allen House, Anchor House, Howard Johnson, and Alamo Plaza. The latter 6 of these opened October 1963; the former in May 1963.	Nearly all restaurants in city are open. The only notable exceptions are the Krystals, two hamburger shops, and one good restaurant.
Chattanooga	2 leading hotels -- Patton and Reed House -- and one motel -- Holiday Inn -- are open.	Most of the better restaurants are open, since July 1963
Memphis	All leading hotel and motels open since May 1963.	Confused picture. Apparently, only 1 first-class restaurant, hotel dining rooms, and department store dining rooms are open.
New Orleans	All apparently segregated, except the airport Hilton Inn. 3 downtown hotels -- the Sheraton-Charles, Jung, and Royal Orleans -- agreed September 1963 to accept conventions with limited numbers of Negro delegates	All apparently segregated (except airport Hilton Inn.)
Dallas	All leading hotels and motels now completely open. A few small motels still segregated.	An estimated 75 - 85% open.
Houston	All leading hotels, except the 250 room Ben Milam, now open. About 6 motels are open; others did not go along with hotel agreement of February 1963.	Of 105 in restaurant association, all but 5 went along with desegregation agreement Spring 1963; some evidence that about 15 have since re-segregated.

PUBLIC SCHOOL DESEGREGATION: NUMBER OF NEGROES IN SCHOOL WITH WHITES

(Unless otherwise noted, desegregation data is from various publications of the Southern Education Reporting Service. School census data is from various official sources. For each city, the first figure given indicates the first year of school desegregation. Cities desegregated in the late 1950's moved very slowly during the first years, and since have picked up momentum. Atlanta's present total is, among all the cities, whether starting earlier or later, the lowest, except for much smaller Greensboro.)

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT
BUREAU OF PERSONNEL
WASHINGTON, D.C. 20260

APR 4 1966

Mr. Emory Via
Southern Regional Council
5 Forsythe Street, N. W.
Atlanta, Georgia 30303

Dear Mr. Via:

The Post Office Department is embarking on a major educational program for key personnel people in our larger post offices to give full meaning to Executive Order 11246. In five separate locations in the United States, we will be conducting 2-day programs which will deal with the problems faced by minorities, recognition of the nature of prejudice and the affirmative steps that the Department is demanding its post offices take to insure equality. Our training conferences will involve the 200 largest post offices in the United States which represent almost 80% of the total postal personnel. Our conferences will be held at sites near Chicago, New York City, Philadelphia, Mobile and San Francisco. We purposely selected sites just outside the major metropolitan areas so that while travel is not difficult, we do keep our people in a study rather than an amusement atmosphere.

We want the first day of our program to be a meaningful educational experience and we are therefore turning to experts in the field of intergroup relations for assistance. In the first day we want to cover such subject matter as:

1. The nature of prejudice.
2. The problem of acceptance.
3. The education problem.
4. The difficulties in obtaining adequate housing
5. The problems of finance.
6. The difficulties in obtaining meaningful employment and promotions within employment.

Wage differential
Underemployment
Motivation in Seeking employment
Positive Mgt. Action
Testing, Unemployment rates
Training

It would be sincerely appreciated if you would have the time to talk with our postal people about the problems of employment for the American minorities on May 19 at approximately 3:30 p.m. at a site to be named near Mobile, Alabama. It would be appreciated if your remarks would be for a period of approximately 45 minutes plus an allowance of some 10 - 20 minutes for questions. The Department will pay $50.00 for the day in which you are involved, as well as pay the cost of your transportation from your home city to the site of the conference and return.

To be certain that our people are absorbing the information which is the most critical for them to have on the subject you would be presenting, would you please prepare five questions on the subject matter which would be in your presentation so that on the second day the conferees will have an opportunity to show whether or not they gained the information which we want them to have on this subject of employment. Because it will be necessary to duplicate the questions in advance of these conferences, may I have your five questions, if you can accept the invitation, by not later than Thursday, May 5.

I am very hopeful that you can join with us and would you please let me know of your availability as soon as is possible. A great many people can benefit from your help.

Sincerely yours,

Hollis B. Bach

REGIONAL LETTER

Date: 4/6/66

Subject: Equal Employment Opportunity Program

I. Action Office

Directors, Personnel Division

II. Purpose

To inform Regional Personnel Directors of conferences scheduled on the Equal Employment Opportunity Program for the fourth quarter, Fiscal Year 1966, and to identify the post offices to be represented at these conferences.

III. Objectives

Five (5) area conferences will be conducted to educate and instruct Personnel Officers of the larger post offices in their obligations and responsibilities under Executive Order 11246. This Executive Order reemphasizes the policy of the federal government to provide equal employment opportunity and reaffirms the direct responsibility of each Department to establish and maintain a positive program of equal opportunity.

These area conferences are being held to provide the necessary education, guidance, and direction to field personnel officials to insure that postal officials not only practice nondiscrimination, but use imagination and initiative in maintaining an affirmative Equal Employment Opportunity Program.

IV. Area Conferences

The area conferences will be held in the following regions on the dates shown:

Memorandum • POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

SUBJECT: Postmasters' Program for Progress

DATE: April 18, 1966

FROM: Director, Employment and Placement Division
Bureau of Personnel
Post Office Department
Washington, D. C. 20260

IN REPLY REFER TO: P:EP:HBB:fs

TO: Director, Personnel Division
Post Office Department

At present three items are involved in the EEO reporting system:

1. A narrative report
2. Form 1789 statistical report
3. The minutes of the Postmaster's Advisory Committee

All three reports originate monthly in some 300 3P post offices. Since May, 1965, the narrative report and the 1789 report have been consolidated at the regional level and submitted to the EEO Office, Bureau of Personnel. The minutes of the EEO Advisory Committee have been sent to the regional office only.

Beginning in April, 1966, the narrative report and the 1789 report will be put on a staggered quarterly basis. Both will be prepared in triplicate, with two copies going to the region, who will forward one copy to the Bureau. The staggered system is illustrated as follows: Reports will be due in April from: Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Washington, and Atlanta; in May from: Minneapolis, Chicago, Cincinnati, St. Louis, and Memphis; in June from: Wichita, Denver, Dallas, Seattle, and San Francisco.

The minutes of the Advisory Committee meetings will continue to be prepared monthly and forwarded to the regions. Regions are responsible for follow-up with Postmasters where EEO Advisory Committees are inactive to insure that the Postmaster is carrying out his role in achieving equal opportunity.

RESPONSIBILITIES OF THE POSTMASTER

The Postmaster shall be responsible for:

1. Being a participant in community action programs which will identify the post office as an equal employer and an advocate of full rights for all minorities. This includes personal appearances of the Postmaster himself as well as the designation of other postal personnel (ex. Personnel Officer) who can speak and act effectively in this public function. In this activity, Postmasters must be involved in programs that urge and/or provide for educational opportunities for minorities.

2. Analysis of the head count information for his office and development of plans based on the head count for:

   (a) Effective recruiting of minority groups.

   (b) Individual counseling and evaluation of all employees during and after probation is completed to make sure that they understand avenues of advancement and how to pursue them inside and outside the postal service and that they know that management is interested in their personal development.

   (c) The inclusion of minority group employees in 204b details and informal details so that there will be representative opportunity for minority group individuals in the job structure.

   (e) Making sure that promotions reflect fully a result of equal opportunity.

3. The adequate training of supervisors to deal with all employees on a basis that will be fair to the person as an individual, offer the employee encouragement in self-improvement, and promote fair and equal relations with fellow employees.

4. Insure the appointment and operation of an EEO Advisory Committee in accordance with current directives.
5. Post an EEO policy statement and the complaint procedures so that employees do know how to file when such action is necessary.
6. Submission of periodic 3P reports to the regional office.

MECHANICS OF ADVISORY COMMITTEE

The EEO Advisory Committee is a committee established by the postmaster to assist him in insuring equitable personnel management in his office. It should be representative of the racial (and religious where religious minorities are a known factor) groups in the office and should include individuals who can make real contributions. Women are to be included in the selections for committee members.

There will be five members of the committee and one member must be appointed and one retired at the end of each four months. An individual is not eligible for election to the office of Chairman in either the first four months he serves or in the last four months.

Other elective offices are those of Vice-chairman and Secretary.

The committee may establish its own rules of procedure.

The committee should meet monthly on official time and their unedited minutes should be given to the postmaster and a copy sent to the Regional Director.

EEO ADVISORY COMMITTEE RESPONSIBILITIES

The EEO Advisory Committee should:

1. Periodically review the employment pattern of the post office to determine the
   (a) Extensiveness of minority group employment and representation in each activity.
   (b) Progression of minority group people by level.
   (c) Relation to employment pattern of community.
2. Suggest to the postmaster methods for bringing minority group people into all areas of postal employment such as is possible through
   (a) Recruitment
   (b) Training
   (c) Reassignments
3. Serve as a channel of communication between the post office and the minority group community to
   (a) Project the image of the post office fairly.
   (b) Report to the postmaster on the community attitude toward postal employment practices.
   (c) Advocate continuing education for minorities.
4. Serve as a collecting point within the post office for employee views on equal employment.
   (a) The committee should inform the postmaster on the effectiveness of communications between management and employees.
   (b) It should suggest to the postmaster any steps needed to install supervisory relationships which contribute to equal employment.

5. Prepare and make available for employee and community gatherings informational material and at times speakers in the field of race relations drawing on local and national history and current events so that equal employment can be viewed logically, realistically, and intelligently. The Committee should prepare a monthly article for the house organ on some facet of the total equal employment opportunity program.
6. Incorporate its recommendations to the postmaster into its minutes so that they may become a matter of record.
7. The Committee shall not accept grievances or complaints, but will direct an employee to the published procedures for proper handling.

WASHINGTON, D.C. 20260

APR 29 1966

Mr. Emory Via, Director
Labor Program
Southern Regional Council
5 Forsythe Street, N. W.
Atlanta, Georgia 30303

Dear Mr. Via:

To confirm our plans for the Post Office Department's educational conference on the aspects and meaning of Executive Order 11246, we are writing to inform you of arrangements made to date.

The list of participants is now complete and they include, in addition to yourself, the following:

Mr. K. B. M. Crooks, Assistant Director, National Urban League, Atlanta

Mr. Edwin Stanfield, Director, Field Activities, Southern Regional Council, Atlanta

* Dr. Charles Willis, Florida State University, Tallahassee

Mr. Robert Thompson, Intergroup Relations Officer, Department of Housing and Urban Development, Atlanta

Mr. Robert R. Moton, Jr., Division Manager, Waddell and Reed, Inc., Atlanta

* Tentative

The conference will be held at Brookley Air Force Base on May 19th and 20th, with the resource speakers participating on the first day. Any who would like to stay over for the second day to participate with the post office personnel in their discussions will be most welcome, although honorariums cannot be paid for the second day. Conference participants will be housed at Brookley Air Force Base.

Because air travel to Mobile is somewhat infrequent, I hope that you will be able to leave Atlanta in the afternoon or evening of May 18. If I receive your flight schedule, I will try to make an arrangement for your pick-up at the airport. Otherwise, you would simply have to taxi to the base at the main entrance gate. There will be an identification pass waiting for you so that you may have admission to the base. Arrangements will also be made to return you to the airport for the return flight to Atlanta.

As you will be reimbursed for your travel expenses, please keep a record of taxi fares. In addition to the $50 for your presentation, you are authorized $4 per quarter (a six-hour period) for food and lodging expenses during this period.. I am enclosing a government transportation request for your travel to and from Mobile.

Please send me a brief experience resume for introductory purposes. Also, if you have not already done so, please furnish us with five suggested questions to use to determine if our conferees have gotten the real meat of your presentation.

I look forward to making your acquaintance.

Sincerely yours,

W B Patterson

Dear Mr. Bach:

I will be coming into Mobile on May 18 at 8:00 p.m. on Eastern's flight 757. If you are unable to arrange transportation to Brookley Air Force Base, I will simply take a cab.

The five questions which you requested are listed below.

1. In what ways does past earning power affect the present ability to find better employment?
2. What resources are available to a minority group member who has been discriminated against in employment?
3. In what ways are minority group members less secure economically than are whites?
4. What are the changes in our economy that affect the employment opportunities for minority group persons?
5. What are some of the forms of discrimination in employment that operate against minority group members?

I trust that these will serve your purposes.

I look forward to meeting you and participating in your program.

Sincerely,

STANDARD FORM 50
Revised December 1961

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEE

KEEP THIS DOCUMENT FOR YOUR RECORDS. IT IS YOUR COPY OF THE OFFICIAL RECORD OF A PERSONNEL ACTION AFFECTING YOUR EMPLOYMENT. PROMPTLY CALL ANY ERROR TO THE ATTENTION OF YOUR SUPERVISOR OR YOUR PERSONNEL OFFICE.

I. Conditions Pertinent To All Types of Personnel Action

The personnel action identified on the face of this form is subject to all applicable laws, rules, and regulations governing Federal employment and may be subject to investigation and approval by the Civil Service Commission. The action may be corrected or canceled if not in accordance with all legal requirements, or if based upon your misrepresentation or fraud.

In addition, the grade of the position to which you are officially assigned may be reviewed and corrected by your agency personnel office, or by the Civil Service Commission.

Your performance rating upon entrance into a new position is "satisfactory" unless or until you are notified otherwise.

Items 9 and 10 show the common types of payroll deductions; "FEGLI" for Federal Employees Group Life Insurance, "CS" for Civil Service Retirement, "FICA" for Social Security, and "FS" for Foreign Service. Additional deductions may be made under the Federal Employees Health Benefit program, and for income taxes, bonds, and other purposes authorized by law.

II. Information About Appointments

Appointment to positions in the competitive service. The Civil Service Act places most positions in the "competitive service." The Civil Service Commission sets qualification requirements and controls recruitment for such positions. As a general rule, persons selected from civil service registers to fill continuing jobs in the competitive service are given career-conditional appointments. Such appointments are secured through direct competition with other members of the general public seeking similar work in Government agencies, and permit qualified employees to be assigned without further competitive examination to other jobs in the competitive service. Career-conditional appointments become career appointments upon completion of 3 years of substantially continuous creditable service.

The first year following a nontemporary competitive appointment generally is a probationary period, during which period an appointee must demonstrate his full competence and fitness for Federal employment. Reinstatements are also subject to a probationary period unless one was previously completed. Transfers, promotions, changes to lower grade, and reassignments during a probationary period are subject to completion of probation.

Temporary appointments do not confer a civil service status and do not lead to a career or career-conditional appointment without some further examination or qualification. Limited temporary appointments are made when there is no continuing need for a person's service, regardless of the manner in which he qualified for appointment; acceptance of such appointment will not remove a person's name from a civil service register on which he may later be reached for career-conditional appointment.

Appointments to positions in the excepted service. Excepted appointments are made to positions which are excepted from the competitive service by law or other special authority. Generally the employing agency sets qualification requirements and conducts recruitment for such positions. Such appointments do not confer a competitive civil service status or eligibility for movement to jobs in the competitive service; they may be made without restrictions on tenure, with a conditional or indefinite limitation, or with a definite time limitation. A trial period may be required at the discretion of the employing office.

III. Information About Tenure Groups

Employees are ranked in tenure groups according to the nature of their appointment; those with unrestricted tenure are placed in Group I, those serving under conditional appointments which automatically lead to full tenure after a prescribed time and without further qualification are placed in Group II, and those serving under temporary or indefinite appointments not limited to an exact time or date are placed in Group III. Within each tenure group, ranking is determined by veteran preference, performance rating, and total Federal service. If it should become necessary to reduce force, employees are selected for separation or change to lower grade according to this general ranking. Employees serving under competitive appointments and those serving under excepted appointments are ranked separately for reduction in force purposes.

IV. Information About Your Status After Separation

If you are separated or placed in a nonpay status for an extended period, your employing agency will furnish you with Standard Form 8 explaining your rights for unemployment insurance benefits. If you were covered by the civil service retirement system or Federal employees' group life insurance, you have previously been furnished certificates describing these programs; you can refer to such certificates for information regarding your rights and possible benefits after separation.

If you are separated from a career or career-conditional appointment, you may have reinstatement eligibility and can apply directly to any Federal activity and may be employed without further competitive examination; if you are a nonveteran and you are separated from a career-conditional appointment your eligibility for reinstatement is generally limited to 3 years from the date of separation. If you are separated from a temporary or excepted appointment, you have no reinstatement privileges based upon such service.

You will be given any lump sum payment that may be due you for annual leave at the time of separation. Refund of an appropriate portion of this payment will be required if you are reemployed in a Federal agency in a position under the same leave system during the period covered by such payment.

V. Availability of Further Information

Consult your supervisor if you have questions about the above statements or the entries on the front of this form, or about other matters concerning your employment. This is particularly important on questions involving granting of leave, assignment of duties, and hours of work which are generally under his control. If your questions are technical, your supervisor may refer you to your personnel office, which will have copies of controlling civil service regulations, as well as your individual records, and so can best explain how they apply in your case.

1. PRINCIPAL DUTIES—RESPONSIBILITIES

Describe below as briefly as you can—in simple language and in a way that will be easiest for you, the principal duties and responsibilities of the position. Your purpose is to inform the reader clearly and specifically as to what is being done in the position and what the responsibilities may be. Very general or vague statements (Such as: "Does cost work.") will not do this. Specific statements like the following, will: "Figures mail transportation costs by simple arithmetic done on a calculating machine." Enter per cent of time spent on each principal duty to right of duty statement.

One of six consultants to the Assistant Postmaster General, Bureau of Personnel, to furnish expert advice regarding the instruction of Personnel Officers of the larger post offices in their obligations and responsibilities under Executive Order 11246. This Executive Order reemphasizes the policy of the federal government to provide equal employment opportunity and reaffirm the direct responsibility of each Department to establish and maintain a positive program of equal opportunity.

APPOINTMENT AFFIDAVITS

INFORMATION FOR APPOINTEE

NOTE.—Before he can be appointed, an applicant for a Federal position must meet certain requirements over and above the requirements that he be able to do the work he is employed to do. On the attached form you are to swear (or affirm) that you meet those requirements. In addition, there are certain general restrictions upon your conduct as a Federal employee. They are set forth on this sheet. You should familiarize yourself with these restrictions and be guided by them. Detach this portion of the form and retain it for your information and guidance.

I. MEMBERS-OF-FAMILY RESTRICTION

Except for persons entitled to veteran preference, no person may receive a career or career-conditional appointment to a position in the competitive service if there are two or more members of his family already serving in the competitive service under career or career-conditional appointments. A family is defined by the Attorney General as persons who live under the same roof with the head of the family and form part of his fireside. When they branch out and become heads of new establishments, they cease to be part of the old family. Minors do not establish another family merely by living at an address different from that of their parents. An appointment is illegal if the appointee is disqualified by the members-of-family restriction.

II. APPOINTMENTS ARE SUBJECT TO INVESTIGATION

Section 3(a) of Executive Order No. 10450 of April 27, 1953, provides in part that: "The appointment of each civilian officer or employee in any department or agency of the Government shall be made subject to investigation."

Civil Service Rule V authorizes the Commission to issue instructions as to discipline or separation whenever it finds "that an appointment has been made in violation of the Civil Service Act, Rules or Regulations, or that any employee subject thereto has violated such Act, Rules or Regulations, or is holding a position in violation thereof."

An employing agency may remove an employee for such cause as will promote the efficiency of the service or where the employee's retention in employment is inconsistent with the interests of the national security (see section III).

III. SUBVERSIVE ACTIVITY AND NATIONAL SECURITY

Section 1 of Public Law 330, 84th Congress, approved August 9, 1955, provides that "no person shall accept or hold office or employment in the Government of the United States or any agency thereof, including wholly owned Government corporations, who—

"(1) advocates the overthrow of our constitutional form of government in the United States;

"(2) is a member of an organization that advocates the overthrow of our constitutional form of government in the United States, knowing that such organization so advocates."

Except for persons employed by the Government of the United States for less than 60 days for sudden emergency work involving the loss of human life or the destruction of property, Public Law 330 provides that everyone entering Federal employment must execute an affidavit to the effect that his employment does not and will not constitute a violation of section 1 thereof. Regardless of whether he has executed such an affidavit, any officer or employee of the United States Government or any agency thereof who advocates the overthrow of our constitutional form of Government or knowingly belongs to an organization which so advocates is guilty of a felony and subject to a fine of not more than $1,000 or imprisonment for not more than one year and a day, or both.

Section 8(a) of Executive Order No. 10450 of April 27, 1953, as amended, provides:

"The investigations conducted pursuant to this order shall be designed to develop information as to whether the employment or retention in employment in the Federal service of the person being investigated is clearly consistent with the interests of the national security. Such information shall relate, but shall not be limited, to the following:

"(1) Depending on the relation of the Government employment to the national security:

(i) Any behavior, activities, or associations which tend to show that the individual is not reliable or trustworthy.

(ii) Any deliberate misrepresentations, falsifications, or omission of material facts.

(iii) Any criminal, infamous, dishonest, immoral, or notoriously disgraceful conduct, habitual use of intoxicants to excess, drug addiction, or sexual perversion.

(iv) Any illness, including any mental condition, of a nature which in the opinion of competent medical authority may cause significant defect in the judgment or reliability of the employee, with due regard to the transient or continuing effect of the illness and the medical findings in such case.

(v) Any facts which furnish reason to believe that the individual may be subjected to coercion, influence, or pressure which may cause him to act contrary to the best interests of the national security.

"(2) Commission of any act of sabotage, espionage, treason, or sedition, or attempts thereat or preparation therefor, or conspiring with, or aiding or abetting, another to commit or attempt to commit any act of sabotage, espionage, treason, or sedition.

"(3) Establishing or continuing a sympathetic association with a saboteur, spy, traitor, seditionist, anarchist, or revolutionist, or with an espionage or other secret agent or representative of a foreign nation, or any representative of a foreign nation whose interests may be inimical to the interests of the United States, or with any person who advocates the use of force or violence to overthrow the Government of the United States or the alteration of the form of government of the United States by unconstitutional means.

"(4) Advocacy of use of force or violence to overthrow the Government of the United States, or of the alteration of the form of government of the United States by unconstitutional means.

"(5) Membership in, or affiliation or sympathetic association with, any foreign or domestic organization, association, movement, group, or combination of persons which is totalitarian, Fascist, Communist, or subversive, or which has adopted, or shows, a policy of advocating or approving the commission of acts of force or violence to deny other persons their rights under the Constitution of the United States, or which seeks to alter the form of government of the United States by unconstitutional means.

"(6) Intentional, unauthorized disclosure to any person of security information, or of other information disclosure of which is prohibited by law, or willful violation or disregard of security regulations.

"(7) Performing or attempting to perform his duties, or otherwise acting, so as to serve the interests of another government in preference to the interests of the United States.

"(8) Refusal by the individual, upon the ground of constitutional privilege against self-incrimination, to testify before a congressional committee regarding charges of his alleged disloyalty or other misconduct."

Affidavit B on the attached page, to which you are required to swear (or affirm), covers the provisions of Items (1) and (2) of Section 1 of Public Law 330 and of Executive Order 10450.

IV. STRIKING AGAINST THE FEDERAL GOVERNMENT

Section 1 of Public Law 330, 84th Congress, approved August 9, 1955, provides that "no person shall accept or hold office or employment in the Government of the United States, or any agency thereof, including wholly owned Government corporations, who—

"(3) participates in any strike or asserts the right to strike against the Government of the United States or such agency; or

"(4) is a member of an organization of Government employees that asserts the right to strike against the Government of the United States or such agencies, knowing that such organization asserts such right."

Except for persons employed by the Government of the United States for less than 60 days for sudden emergency work involving the loss of human life or the destruction of property, Public Law 330 provides that everyone entering Federal employment must execute an affidavit to the effect that his employment does not and will not constitute a violation of section 1 thereof. Regardless of whether he has executed such an affidavit, any officer or employee of the United States Government or any agency thereof who violates the provisions of Section 1 (3) and (4) of Public Law 330 is guilty of a felony and subject to a fine of not more than $1,000 or imprisonment for not more than a year and a day, or both.

Affidavit C on the attached page, to which you are required to swear (or affirm), pertains to these provisions against striking against the Government.

V. HOLDING STATE OR LOCAL OFFICE

Federal employees are prohibited from accepting or holding an office or position under State, territorial, county, or municipal governments. There are certain specific exceptions. They are published in Civil Service Commission Pamphlet 20. Before any person appointed to the Federal service accepts or continues to hold any office or position under a State or local government, the matter should be presented to the agency in which he is employed for a decision as to whether he properly may accept or continue to hold such office or position.

VI. POLITICAL ACTIVITY

The terms of the act of August 2, 1939 ("Hatch Act"), as amended, prohibit officers and employees in the executive branch of the Federal Government from using official authority or influence for the purpose of interfering with an election or affecting the result thereof. Further, such officers and employees are prohibited from taking any active part in political management or in political campaigns. These prohibitions apply not only to permanent employees, but also to temporary employees, substitute employees, and employees on leave of absence with or without compensation. Political activity identified with any political party in any election is prohibited.

Some of the forms of forbidden political activity are:

1. Serving on or for any political committee, party, or other similar organization, or serving as a delegate or alternate to a caucus or party convention.

2. Soliciting or handling political contributions.

3. Soliciting sale of or selling political party dinner tickets.

4. Serving as officer of a political club, as member or officer of any of its committees, addressing such a club or being active in organizing it.

5. Serving in connection with preparation for, organizing, or conducting a political meeting or rally, addressing such a meeting, or taking any other active part therein except as a spectator.

6. Engaging in activity at the polls (at primary or regular elections), such as soliciting votes, assisting voters to mark ballots, or transporting or helping to get out the voters on registration or election days.

7. Acting as recorder, checker, watcher, or challenger of any party or faction.

8. Serving in any position of election officer in which partisanship or partisan political management may be shown.

9. Writing for publication or publishing any letter or article, signed or unsigned, soliciting votes in favor of or against any political party or candidate.

10. Becoming a candidate for nomination or election to office, Federal, State, county, or municipal, which is to be filled in an election in which party candidates are involved.

11. Distributing campaign literature or material.

12. Initiating or circulating political petitions, including nomination petitions.

13. Engaging in political conferences, or canvassing a district or soliciting political support for a party, faction, or candidate.

14. The law is designed to prohibit those subject to it from assuming political leadership or becoming prominently identified with any political movement, party, or faction, or with the success or failure of any candidate for election to public office in a partisan political campaign.

General statements as to certain activities which are considered as permissible on the part of Federal officers and employees:

1. Voting.—The direct language of the law specifically provides that all such persons retain the right to vote as they may choose.

2. Expression of opinions.—The right to express political opinions is reserved to all such persons.

NOTE: This reservation is subject to the prohibition that such persons may not take any active part in political management or in political campaigns.

3. Contributions.—It is lawful for any officer or employee to make a voluntary contribution to a regularly constituted political organization, provided such contributions are not made in a Federal building or to some other officer or employee within the scope of the act referred to above.

4. Political pictures.—It is lawful for any officer or employee to display a political picture in his home if he so desires.

5. Badges, buttons, and stickers.—While it is not unlawful for an officer or employee to wear a political badge or button or to display a political sticker on his private automobile (except where forbidden by local ordinance), it is felt that it is inappropriate for any public servant to make a partisan display of any kind while on duty, conducting the public business.

Persons appointed to positions in the executive branch of the Federal Government are warned that the penalty for an established violation of the above-mentioned political activity prohibitions is immediate removal from the service or suspension without pay for not less than 90 days.

VII. OTHER OFFENSES WHICH ARE PUNISHABLE BY FINE OR IMPRISONMENT

Certain other statutes prohibit Federal officers and employees from engaging in various activities under penalty of fine or imprisonment, or both. The activities prohibited by such statutes relate to such matters as political assessments, political coercion and discrimination, and purchase and sale of office. The text of these statutes is set forth in Civil Service Commission Pamphlet 20.

Some of the activities prohibited under penalty of fine or imprisonment, or both, are as follows:

1. Solicitation or receipt of political contributions by one officer or employee from another.

2. The giving or handing over of a political contribution by one employee to another.

3. Solicitation or receipt of political contributions in a Federal building by any person, whether or not an employee of the Government.

4. Solicitation or receipt by any person of political contributions from any person receiving any benefit under any act of Congress appropriating funds for relief.

5. Solicitation or receipt of anything of value, either for personal reward or as a political contribution, in return for the use of, or the promise to use, influence to secure an appointive office under the United States.

6. Payment, or the offer of payment, for the use of influence in securing appointive office under the United States.

7. Promising employment, compensation, or other benefit made possible by act of Congress as consideration or reward for political activity.

8. Discrimination by an officer or employee in favor of, or against, another officer or employee on account of political contributions.

9. Depriving any person on account of race, creed, or color, or political activity, of compensation or other benefit made possible by any act of Congress appropriating funds for relief.

10. Disclosure for political purposes of any list or names of persons receiving benefits under an act of Congress appropriating funds for relief and the receipt of such a list for political purposes.

VIII. PROHIBITION AGAINST DISCRIMINATION

Appointing officers are required to act on all personnel matters solely on the basis of merit and fitness and without regard to race, color, religion, national origin, marital status, or political affiliation.

IX. INSTRUCTION OF APPLICANTS

Officers and employees of the Government are prohibited from instructing or teaching with a view to the special preparation of any person for civil-service examinations.

EQUAL EMPLOYMENT OPPORTUNITY CONFERENCE

MOBILE, ALABAMA - MAY 19 & 20, 1966

1. Do educational problems of minorities reside exclusively within institutions of learning? If not, why not?

2. Name five ghetto characteristics and show how they are interrelated.

3. What basic factors determine acceptance or rejection of a minority?

4. Define the terms (1) assimilation, (2) amalgamation, and (3) cultural pluralism.

5. In what way does past earning power affect present ability to find better employment?

6. Give one example each of stereotypes which are based upon national origin, race and religion.

Mr. Emory Via, Director
Labor Program
Southern Regional Council
5 Forsythe Street, N. W.
Atlanta, Georgia 30303

Dear Mr. Via:

Our fingers are crossed but we are very hopeful that the program of understanding and education as a basis for developing an affirmative action approach to equal employment opportunity will be successful. We are sincerely indebted to you for the very major contribution made to our personnel officers.

The end of the conference feedback indicated genuine appreciation for the educational approach to the reasons for requesting each personnel officer to pursue an aggressive program internally and externally to achieve equality.

Our job now will be to give back-up, encouragement and support to those who begin a real program.

Your help has been tremendous and I thank you for the thoughtful presentation, the patient explanations and the manner in which you grasped and held your audiences' attention.

Enclosed is a blank travel voucher. If you will sign in the space marked with an "X", this office will complete and submit it so that you may be promptly reimbursed for your travel expenses.

Best wishes and fullest appreciation.

Sincerely yours,

Hollis B. Bach

Dear Hollis:

Thanks for the letter regarding my participation in your Mobile conference. I thought it was a good effort and you and your staff are to be congratulated for the time, energy and imaginatoon that went into it. I trust that the further conferences have gone well and that you will receive from them and your other efforts the success which you deserve.

I am returning the travel voucher with my signature for your office to fill out. If it helps, I had local transportation costs totaling $9.00 ($4.00, $2.50, $2.50). Do I understand correctly that the other costs will be covered by a per diem payment?

It was good to meet you and other members of your staff. Please let me know if either I or the Council can be of service to you.

Sincerely,

Emory F. Via

NEWPORT NEWS LANDMARK PACT

Shipyard Case Opens Many New Opportunities

The nation's largest shipbuilder has signed an agreement with the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission to provide broad new promotion opportunities for Negroes.

The Newport News Shipbuilding and Drydock Company signed the agreement after six days of intensive negotiations at Commission headquarters in Washington. Representatives of the Department of Defense and the Department of the Navy joined with Commission conciliators in shaping the agreement.

The agreement grew out of employment discrimination charges filed with the Commission by 41 Negro employees under Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. The Commission had determined reasonable cause to believe Newport News was violating Title VII. The Departments of Labor and Navy also had determined that Newport News was not in compliance with the Executive Order dealing with Federal contracts.

Under the agreement, an outside expert, approved by the Company and the Commission, will evaluate jobs and pay rates in the Newport News plant to determine whether Negroes are being paid the same rates as whites doing the same or substantially equivalent work. Where it is determined that Negroes are being paid discriminatory rates they will be immediately raised to equivalent levels with whites.

A survey of key departments will be made to determine the promotion pattern of whites over past years. The history of Negro promotions will be compared to the white promotion profile and where Negroes have not progressed accordingly, they will be promoted immediately.

At the time of the agreement, Commission Chairman Franklin D. Roosevelt, Jr., said:

"One effect of this agreement will be an increase in pay for hundreds of Negro employees at the Newport News plant. It will also mean widespread promotions for Negroes. An even more far reaching effect will be the application of this agreement as a model for the correction of discrimination in other industries by the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission. In this case, the government spoke with one voice."

The package of remedial programs which the company and the Commission developed was described by Roosevelt as being "not a grudging agreement to stop discriminating, but a model of comprehensive affirmative action to reach and counteract the effects of prior discriminations."

Secretary of Labor W. Willard Wirtz said: "The successful completion of these negotiations resulted from a concerted government effort to make equal employ-

SPECIAL ISSUE—The First Year—pages 2-11

EEOC

A SPECIAL ISSUE—THE FIRST YEAR

The Equal Employment Opportunity Commission has been pounding down the track ever since the starting gun was fired on July 2, 1965.

The breathing has been a little heavy at times and there has been some wide swinging on the turns, but this agency, created by Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, looks as if it might cross the first year finish line without serious injury.

This issue of the EEOC NEWSLETTER takes a look back—and a look ahead.

It sees more than 7000 employment discrimination charges received by EEOC in 10 months where only 2000 were anticipated for the whole first year.

It sees some dramatic landmarks along the way—such as the Bogalusa Dovetailing Principle and the Newport News Agreement.

It sees some of the complexity that was predicted in the part of Title VII which deals with sex discrimination—but none of the bunny girl frivolity that caught the early headlines.

It sees the tremendous reservoir of goodwill—the willingness to comply with the law—that exists in many segments of business, industry and labor . . .

And it ruefully sees the difficulties of getting at discrimination directed against the Mexican-American and Spanish-speaking minorities in the United States.

The nuts and bolts of the line operations are described briefly in this Newsletter.

The Commission lost its chairman to the New York Governor's race, but he left his mark of leadership on the first 10 months.

Each of the Commissioners expresses his feelings about the accomplishments, shortcomings, and future goals and needs of this agency's leading part in the battle to end discrimination in employment practices.

From a sudden and unrehearsed start, the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission has come a long, if sometimes bumpy way. It is on the threshhold of even tougher problems, more demanding challenges, and hopes to have a little better budget to keep it abreast of the vote of confidence given it by the public in all parts of the Nation. ■

7,000 COMPLAINTS FLOW IN

More than any other division of EEOC, the Office of Compliance has felt the strain of short budget and staff during the Commission's first 10 months.

"Compliance" is where the action starts—and keeps on and on and on.

Charges of employment discrimination arrive in the Office of Compliance. They are analyzed there. If they appear to have grounds, they are investigated from there.

When the investigation is completed, and the Commission finds cause, the charge comes back to Compliance and the Conciliation Section moves into action.

Picture a staff budgeted for on the basis of 2000 complaints in a year—confronted with more than 3000 charges in the first six months—and 7000 by the 10-month mark.

Compliance has operated with no more than 45 investigators—all but 20 on loan from other agencies—when it should have had almost 100 to keep ahead of the avalanche.

In spite of it, these figures show what has been done:

In the first 10 months, the Commission received 7,060 charges of discrimination in employment. These cases were analyzed as follows:

Probable jurisdiction (recommended for investigation)	3,074
Deferred for state or local FEP action	686
Returned for additional information	958
Rejected—no jurisdiction	1,809
Closed or withdrawn	533

Investigations have been completed on 1,220 of the 3,074 cases recommended.

The Commission has found cause to believe there is a violation of Title VII in 517 of these cases and sent them to the Conciliation Section. No cause has been found in 218 of the cases in which investigation is complete. Eighty-two cases have been closed during investigation and 403 are pending a finding before the Commission.

Of the cases where cause has been found, 70 have been successfully conciliated. Thirty more are nearing conciliation. In 25 cases, conciliations have been designated "unsuccessful," either because signed agreement was not achieved, or all of the counts charged were not resolved. But in most of these cases, substantial accomplishments have been made.

The Compliance Division is expanding its staff as rapidly as the supplemental appropriation will permit. It hopes to have 96 investigators on full-time staff soon. The Division hopes that this will enable it not only to catch up with the backlog, but to stay even with the flow of charges that continues to come to the Commission. ■

TECHNICAL ASSISTANCE

Working with Business and Labor

EEOC's Office of Technical Assistance is in business to put the Commission's complaint-handling departments out of business.

OTA offers business, industry and labor an assortment of Do-It-Yourself programs designed to accomplish compliance with Title VII and to open up new job opportunities at every level through voluntary affirmative action.

OTA operates on the principle that most business leaders want to comply with the law, not only as a matter of avoiding the costly and time-consuming complaint route – but also as a matter of good will and conscience. This reservoir of good will is demonstrated by community equal employment opportunity councils – many of which were established before Title VII became law. OTA tells leaders of business and industry how such councils can be set up and furnishes guidelines.

There is a widely-held opinion that equal employment opportunity is good business. OTA has compiled information from those who practice it and presents this in a booklet designed to show that it is, indeed, good business.

OTA's "How-To" program underlines the need for active recruiting, job training, and liaison and cooperation with civil rights groups.

Another OTA program is designed for new and expanding plants. It aims at giving minority groups employment opportunities before hiring patterns have been set.

In situations where EEOC's conciliation officers go to work on active charges, OTA offers educational and technical support for affirmative action beyond the resolution of those specific charges.

OTA works with a climate of cooperation and seeks to extend the beneficial effects of such a climate. Through personal contacts, speeches and seminars with employer groups, at business and trade association meetings and conventions, OTA spreads the word: "Equal Employment Opportunity is Good Business." The final word, of course, must be spoken by business, industry and labor. Technical Assistance can only tell them "How."

It is not too much to suggest that the technical assistance side of the Commission's operation consists largely of persuading laggard companies and unions to adopt the practices of the most progressive and successful employers and labor unions. ■

GENERAL COUNSEL

INTERPRETING THE LAW

The General Counsel is probably the most talked-to office in EEOC. The five attorneys measure just about every question that comes before the Commission—from specific charges all the way to broad policy decisions—by the yardstick of Title VII.

An unusual amount of time in the General Counsel's shop has been called for on matters relating to the sex provisions of Title VII. What became law with very little legislative history has moved through the opening forays of bunny-girl frivolity into the serious realm of seniority, retirement, bona fide occupational qualification, and other issues. Guidelines for solution of conflicts between state protective laws for women and the sex provisions of Title VII is a current and future project undertaken by General Counsel.

In the course of dealing with these and other questions, General Counsel has prepared some 150 memoranda and written some 750 opinion letters. The office also has published a digest of legal interpretations and one supplement. Another supplement is in preparation.

General Counsel reviews all private suits filed under Title VII to determine whether to file briefs or intervene; reviews cases for submission to the Attorney General for possible civil action; drafts Commission guidelines (i.e. help-wanted ads) and proposals for guidelines (i.e. religious discrimination).

General Counsel also has a big hand in: legislative proposals; conciliation agreements; and Commission hearings on broad issues such as seniority. A longer-range project is the publication of a detailed interpretive analysis of Title VII. ■

SEGAL SMILES—EEOC's Liaison Director, Ben Segal, wouldn't let a turned ankle keep him from the swift completion of his appointed rounds. Pressed for a statement, Segal said: "It happened on the tennis court."

LIAISON

FEDERAL, STATE AND LOCAL

Equal Employment Opportunity doesn't exist in a vacuum. Other vital issues such as housing, education, public accommodations, voting rights—all interact upon the problems of fair employment. Liaison with agencies concerned with these areas is an important part of EEOC's effort.

And on the specific issue, EEOC isn't the only agency in the business of assuring fair employment practices. There are other Federal agencies whose jurisdiction sometimes overlaps that of EEOC, such as the OFCC which covers government contractors. There are 31 states and two cities to which the EEOC has agreed to defer action on discrimination complaints. There are conflicts between state and Federal law and the problems of resolving such conflicts.

The EEOC's Office of Liaison undertakes to keep lines of communication open between these numerous jurisdictions and agencies, hoping that left hands will be kept aware as much as possible of what right hands are doing.

Steps in this direction include a Memorandum of Understanding (between EEOC and state FEP agencies); administration of grants for research projects through private organizations; exchanges of ideas about fair employment problems through regional meetings and through direct contact with state and local FEP's.

The Memorandum of Understanding was drafted by EEOC and is under consideration by state and local FEP organizations. It outlines standard agreements on procedure in connection with employment discrimination complaints and deferral by EEOC to state agencies.

EEOC played a leading role at regional meeting of state FEP agencies at Providence, R. I., which included representatives from New England and Middle Atlantic States.

Eleven state and municipal FEP agencies are sharing in a $165,000 grant provided by EEOC to Wayne State University to research patterns of discrimination in employment. The EEOC Liaison Office is working out a two-year program for promotion of common Federal, state and local fair employment projects for which $900,000 has been requested from Congress for Fiscal 1967.

EEOC policy decisions, news developments, legal opinions, and other information are sent regularly to state and local organizations and EEOC receives information in turn from the state groups. ■

LIAISON

CONGRESS AND THE PUBLIC

Telling the story of Title VII and the Commission is a responsibility shared by all the Commissioners and staff.

It is the particular assignment of the Liaison Office when it comes to inter-agency and federal-state communications. It is the particular assignment of the Congressional Relations office of EEOC in terms of keeping 100 Senators and 435 Congressmen advised of programs and needs of the EEOC.

And as a matter of general public information, the story of Title VII and the EEOC is a particular responsibility of the Public Affairs office of EEOC.

The Congressional Relations office has handled more than 1500 written and phone requests from Members of Congress, their staffs and committee personnel. Contact has been maintained with the appropriate legislative and appropriations committees on matters relating to EEOC activities.

The Commission's supplemental request for funds has been approved in the amount of $500,000, making a total appropriation of $3,250,000 for 1965-66. Legislation which would widen the Commission's jurisdiction over employers and unions and provide enforcement powers beyond the present conciliation authority has passed the House. Similar legislation is under consideration in the Senate.

Working with Public Affairs, Congressional Relations has arranged for the appearance of Commissioners and radio and television programs of Senators and Congressmen and numerous articles about the EEOC activities have appeared in Congressional newsletters.

Public Affairs has issued 117 general press releases on EEOC actions, guidelines and statistics. Public Service spot announcements about the Commission were prepared and recorded by Public Affairs and distributed to all radio and television stations in the United States. Return advice from more than 10 per cent of these stations show that the television spots have been used at least 56,659 times and the radio spots at least 54,707 times.

A general Fact Pamphlet about Title VII and the Commission and other information about Commission activities was prepared and distributed by Public Affairs to the general public, trade associations and press, radio and television.

Three Newsletters prior to this issue have been written, published and distributed by Public Affairs. ■

When it comes to Government Forms To Be Filled Out, it might be said the EEOC Research Division is the Businessman's Best Friend.

Replacing Standard Forms 38, 40, 40A, 41 and EEO-10 is the new joint reporting form for employers which will serve EEOC, the Office of Federal Contract Compliance and Plans for Progress.

JUST A FEW of the thousands of EEO-1 Employer Reporting Forms which have come into Washington are tackled by Herbert Hammerman, chairman of the Joint Reporting Committee, and Betty Reynolds of the EEOC research division.

The name of the new form is "Standard Form 100 Equal Employment Opportunity Employer Information Report EEO-1," which is a mouthful but at least employers can now tell it all in four pages.

More than 35,000 employers have done so as of the deadline of April 30 and some stragglers are expected to bring the total up. The data submitted on EEO-1 (there, you see it wasn't hard to say, was it?) will be processed by the Bureau of the Census. This information will be used by EEOC in technical studies of employment practices in selected geographical areas and industries.

The Office of Research has also pulled together a study of testing procedures used in employment and is looking for a full-time expert to add to the staff to work in this field. Meanwhile, a consultant from the Department of Labor is on detail to EEOC one-day a week for preliminaries.

Other study projects the Office of Research is undertaking include: a profile of the Mexican-American worker; dynamics of equal employment opportunity and the economic status of the Negro worker. ■

ADMINISTRATION

KEEPING HOUSE FOR EEOC

If there's a beef about the way the elevators are working at EEOC headquarters in Washington—it goes to the Office of Administration.

And when the Commission wants to beef up the budget request to take care of the flood of business—that's the business of the Office of Administration, too.

Administration takes on its big jobs and little jobs with plegmatic calm. If you want a typewriter or a typist, a desk or a directive, office space in Atlanta or an order for printing—just call Administration. They'll manage it.

During the first year of EEOC, here are some of the things that the Office of Administration has managed:

More than 7,500 employment applications were evaluated. By early May 157 employees were in headquarters and 17 were assigned to new field offices in Atlanta, Chicago and Dallas.

Off and on since last July, 75 investigators have been borrowed from 26 state and federal agencies until the supplemental appropriation enables EEOC to bring its own staff of investigators up to full strength.

The Fiscal 1967 budget request for $5,870,000 is now under Congressional review. Office of Administration put together the nuts and bolts of it to present to Congress.

In the months ahead, opening and staffing the remaining field offices is the biggest assignment of this office. ■

REGIONAL OFFICES

THE COMMISSION MOVES TO THE FIELD

Regional offices are operational in Atlanta, Dallas and Chicago. Recruitment for additional offices is underway. Additional regional offices will be located in Los Angeles, San Antonio, New Orleans and Kansas City. Target date for these offices is June 30.

These offices will employ 149 persons when fully staffed. At present 10 professionals are on detail from other agencies to investigate complaints now before EEOC.

A coordinated field program has been approved by the Commission. This program is now in effect where offices have been activated. It will continue under study and review for possible improvement.

Discrimination complaints, except in cases of special significance, will be investigated and conciliated by field staff under supervision of regional and area directors. Each field director will represent the Commission in the states under his jurisdiction and will report to the Deputy Executive Director in Washington.

In early April, staffs of the Dallas and Atlanta offices underwent one week of training. The program emphasized the Commission's philosophy and objectives in respect to Title VII; investigation and conciliation techniques; report requirements and special problems. These programs will be continued and revised as new problems occur. ■

HOW TO FILE A COMPLAINT

The Equal Employment Opportunity Commission was established by Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. The Commission's responsibility is to assure that all in the American labor pool will be considered for hiring, firing and promotion on the basis of their ability and qualifications, without regard to race, color, religion, sex or national origin.

If a person believes that he or she has been discriminated against by an employer, labor organization, employment agency or joint labor-management program, that person may file a complaint with the Commission.

Persons believing a pattern of practice of discrimination exists in their areas may call such pattern to the attention of the Commission. After investigation, the Commission will consider filing a Commissioner's Complaint.

Instructions and complaint forms are available at the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, 1800 G Street, N.W., Washington, D. C. 20506.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT, JR.

On May 11, Franklin D. Roosevelt, Jr. handed his resignation as chairman of the Equal Employmen Opportunity Commission to President Johnson and announced the next day as a candidate for the Democratic nomination for governor of New York. Stepping down from the helm after guiding the Commission in its first 10 months, Mr. Roosevelt expressed his impressions in the following statement:

I am proud of the progress that has been made by the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission in its first year.

We have helped to bring about new employment attitudes and practices in many areas throughout the South – in retail and department stores and taxicab companies, in famous New Orleans restaurants and in public service establishments – and in major industry after industry in all sections of the U. S.

The Newport News Shipbuilding Company settlement is probably the most comprehensive and far-reaching solution ever achieved in a job discrimination case. Thousands of Negro employees were brought up to the starting line – for promotion and for pay – to remedy past discrimination in the country's largest shipyard.

In Bogalusa, a strife-torn, Klan-ridden community, the principle of horizontal merging of segregated lines of promotion was established by the Commission, the Crown-Zellerbach Paper Company and the International Paperworkers and Papermakers Union. We sat down for three hours at a table and hammered it out. We not only settled a stubborn seniority problem; we improved the race relations climate in the community.

Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 did not create new responsibilities for the major employers in the nation, except, perhaps, in respect to sex discrimination. These employers have been subject to fair employment practice laws for years in many states. If they were Government contractors they were committed to avoid discrimination and, indeed, to engage in affirmative action to provide equal opportunity in employment.

But Title VII WAS the first Congressional declaration in the employment field. It followed a long and dramatic Civil Rights struggle that overcame fire hoses, police dogs and an 83-day filibuster. Thus it assumed an importance beyond the letter of its modest law.

Those who designed the Commission budget estimated that we would receive 2000 complaints in our first year. We stand today six weeks away from our first year in business and already the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission has been deluged with more than 7000 complaints.

This is striking testimony to the confidence minority persons have in this Commission. Title VII is an article of faith throughout the land, a bright light toward which the disadvantaged in every walk of our life have turned.

The Commission has conciliated 70 charges brought against 28 respondents and 30 more are nearing solution. In most of the 25 charges against eight respondents where we must say that our efforts were "unsuccessful" – because every count was not resolved or signed agreement was not accomplished – correction of many of the issues was nevertheless achieved.

In all 14 court cases which have been filed by charging parties to protect their rights to file, none has been brought to trial as we continue conciliation efforts.

For all sorts of reasons major segments of business, industry and labor have shown they are anxious to comply with the new law and the national policy it propounds – a fair chance for all at a job or a promotion, regardless of race, color, religion, sex or national origin. Business and labor are concerned about public image, but more than that, they are responding to the law because it is right and because there is in this country a basic reservoir of good will based upon that rightness. For those segments which persist in discriminating, we have asked for new laws with more powers. Happily, the House has already passed the Hawkins bill which I advocate and the President has asked the Senate to follow suit.

Discrimination in employment practices, of course, has not been wiped out by the Commission and Title VII. In many places discrimination is still deeply rooted in habit and custom. But the gates to opportunity have been opened by this new law and the momentum of positive accomplishment will keep Americans moving through these gates more and more and more as this Commission and this Administration continue to pursue their convictions with dedication and resolve. ■

First Year—And Ahead to the Future

The concept of affirmative action, which seeks through Title VII to urge employers, unions, and employment agencies to go beyond the letter of the law and grasp its spirit, is basic to my philosophy of equal employment opportunity.

If we are to build on the experience and achievements of government—both state and federal; management and labor as well as that of civil rights and civic leaders, we must exercise care not to retread steps that were taken a decade ago, or even last year. This means to me that the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission must not only take remedial action as evidenced by our complaint adjustments, but must "look ahead" if the word "progress" is to have meaning in the 1960s.

Faced with modern technological requirements, manpower skills of minority groups must be drastically upgraded. This means training and education, much of it on-the-job, to fill the present need for manpower.

Once we have reversed the spiral of futility of low income, poor health, low educational attainment and consequently low employability—we will then have attained the opportunity to be equal.

As we look into the future and at the expanding goals of the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, our affirmative action programs will have opened the doors for all qualified citizens to participate in the mainstream of American economic life. It is at this point that the combined efforts of government, business and labor to remove barriers to employment opportunities; of parents and civic groups to lift aspirational levels; and of educators and civil rights leaders to provide basic skills and stimulation, will begin to harvest the real fruits of equal opportunity. ■

RICHARD A. GRAHAM

The EEOC through key cases and through cooperative efforts with business and labor groups has made clear what is expected under Title VII and how to do it.

In its first year the Commission received four times the number of charges of discrimination that had been predicted—some 8,000 in all. It has set up field offices and a headquarters staff to handle them.

Often case work has been the trigger for affirmative action programs—the extra efforts needed to overcome the traditional discrimination that prevents true equality of job opportunity.

The Commission has brought together the nation's leading research authorities on racial discrimination for guidance. Top business and labor leaders have met with the Commission to work out revisions to bargaining agreements that have held captive the victims of past discrimination. The Justice Department has been requested to bring suit in the few cases where employees have resisted compliance and private suits have been brought where the Commission has been unable to conclude conciliation.

The Commission is now receiving reports on the work forces of all employees covered by the Act—reports that businessmen say are as important to management in assessing job equality performance as inspection reports are in controlling quality.

Though few jobs can be performed only by a man or only by a woman, hundreds of thousands of jobs are still classified by sex. Twenty per cent of Commission cases charge sex discrimination and employers and unions alike have generally accepted the idea that in a society where most women will work outside the home, equality of work opportunity is fair and is now required. ■

AILEEN C. HERNANDEZ

New techniques must be devised if "equal opportunity" is to be more than a pious pronouncement to America's disadvantaged. Too many years of too many rejections have made the victims of discrimination reluctant to apply and reluctant to complain. Disillusionment, fear, cultural patterns may limit the utilization of government agencies by those most in need of assistance. For example, few Mexican Americans, few women, few Jews, few American Indians have brought formal complaints before this Commission or any local Commission. Yet we know that individuals from all these groups have suffered discrimination. And actually, even though more Negroes have brought complaints, relatively few have, in proportion to the problem.

This Commission has a unique opportunity to put President Johnson's concept of "creative federalism" to the test:

1. We can demonstrate that by developing a meaningful, working relationship with state and local FEP agencies, together we can set guidelines, raise standards, and move imaginatively as partners to fulfill our mutual responsibility to end employment discrimination.

2. We can devise a comprehensive rather than a piecemeal attack on job bias—incorporating complaint processing, but going beyond to include affirmative actions to overcome the effects of past barriers.

3. We can plan ahead rather than wait passively to react to the results of discrimination—a Watt's explosion. ■

SAMUEL D. JACKSON

It has become more and more clear since the implementation of the various provisions of the 1964 Civil Rights Act that employment is the vital factor in the struggle for equal opportunity.

The Equal Employment Opportunity Commission is acutely conscious of its responsibility and role in the effort to overcome bias based on race, color, religion, sex or national origin.

Since July 2, 1965, Commission members and staff have tackled a variety of problems springing from unlawful practices. Many of these have been long-standing, deep-seated problems—cemented in tradition and surrounded by a wilderness of stubborn attitudes. Hiring, promotion, referral, testing, segregated facilities, and the extreme complexity of seniority systems are typical problems.

I feel that we have come far this first year toward long-sought goals, accomplishing some widely-known successes and others which also have deep significance although they may be less newsworthy. In the handling of more than 7000 discrimination charges, we have accomplished many gains for disadvantaged citizens. We must undertake more in the way of industry and community-wide programs to eliminate discrimination patterns which continue to throttle the Negro's full participation in the job market.

Positive compliance—incorporating bold, imaginative programs to implement affirmative action—will contribute much to closing the widening gap between the earnings of white and non-white Americans. The responsibility to make it possible for minority citizens to enjoy the full bounty of America is one we on the Commission hope every other American will share with us. ■

ment opportunity a fact at this major shipbuilding firm."

Newport News Shipbuilding and Drydock Company builds nuclear submarines, aircraft carriers and other ships for the United States Government. Its contracts with the Government run into billions of dollars. The company employs about 19,000 persons, about 5,000 of whom are Negroes. Its last report to the Government showed that only 32 out of 1997 persons employed in supervisory positions were Negroes. It showed that only 6 out of 506 apprentices enrolled were Negroes.

On March 16, Newport News came to the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission and requested assistance in conciliating the charges against it. Conciliation sessions began on March 22. On March 25, Secretary of Labor W. Willard Wirtz directed all Federal agencies not to award contracts to Newport News until the agencies and the Department of Labor were satisfied that the company was in compliance with the Executive Order requiring equal employment opportunity.

Principal architects of the agreement were Alfred W. Blumrosen, EEOC conciliation chief, and Kenneth Holbert, EEOC conciliator.

Participating in the sessions for the Departments of Defense and Navy were: Jerry Clark, Alan Reeves and Sam Schwartz.

Some of the charging parties have filed a civil suit under Title VII against Newport News through the NAACP Legal Defense and Educational Fund.

Other principal terms of the agreement include:

- immediate promotion of three Negroes who had filed charges to supervisory positions;
- rapid conciliation of the complaints of the other 38 charging parties;
- further opening of all job classifications to all employees without discrimination;
- complete elimination of segregated facilities;
- revision of promotion policies and practices to improve opportunities for qualified Negroes to and within supervisory levels;
- improvement of transfer procedure to other departments for Negroes;
- re-evaluation of Negro employee skills, institution of training programs to develop and improve Negro skills, promotion and pay adjustment on the basis of such evaluation and/or training;
- giving qualified Negroes equal opportunity to apprenticeship programs and actively recruiting for such programs in Negro schools.

The company also agreed to:

Post a non-discrimination policy statement, signed by the president, throughout the Yard and attach it to the paycheck of each full time employee within 30 days of the agreement signing;

Assemble all supervisory employees to read the policy statement to advise them of the terms of the agreement and to instruct them to advise employees in group meetings that a violation of such policy shall result in disciplinary action—including discharge where appropriate;

Make a detailed report to the Commission of actions taken to comply with the terms of the agreement 90 days after signing and each quarter for two years thereafter. ■

WALKER

Phillip Walker, NAACP attorney who represents the charging parties in the Newport News case said:

"This is a long fought for solution. We are grateful to the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission for its vigorous and successful handling of our cases."

HOLDEN

Donald A. Holden, president of the company, said:

"We are proud of our part in working out this agreement. It represents, in our view, an effective and responsible effort by the company and the Commission to further achieve genuine equality of opportunity for Negroes in our yard."

BELTON

Robert Belton, Assistant Counsel NAACP Legal Defense and Educational Fund, Inc., said:

"Exemplary—is our designation of the conciliation agreement between the Newport News Shipbuilding Company and the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission.

"Agreement to promote the Rev. J. C. Fauntleroy, president of the local NAACP chapter, and other complainants, shows the good intentions of the Newport News Shipbuilding Company.

"The firms's additional pledge to end discriminatory hiring and future promotion practices; and, its willingness to end segregated facilities in its plant, shows intention to comply with the spirit as well as the letter of the law . . ." ■

Industry Expert Asks: Do Tests Tell All?

Do psychological tests used in employee selection and upgrading discriminate unfairly against the culturally-deprived?

Dr. Philip Ash of Inland Steel makes some interesting observations on this question in a recent Chicago Merit Employment Committee Newsletter. Dr. Ash is research assistant to Inland's vice president for industrial and public relations. Excerpts of his article follow:

For whatever reason, Negro job applicants as a group consistently score significantly below white job applicants on most of the standardized paper and pencil tests used in selection. For example:

- In the administration of a junior-management civil-service examination to 5,000 white residents of an eastern state, forty per cent earned a qualifying score and were placed on the eligible list. But of 300 identifiable Negro applicants also taking the test, only three per cent made the eligible list;
- Of 100 whites and 100 Negroes taking the General Aptitude Test Battery which is widely used in state employment service offices, the whites made statistically significant better scores on all but one of the twelve tests in the battery even though the two groups were roughly comparable in age, educational attainment, and other personal characteristics;
- A large manufacturer of electronics equipment found that Negro college seniors scored consistently lower than white college seniors on general intelligence tests which the firm used to help select candidates for entry-level management jobs.

But for merit employers, differences in test scores are of value only to the extent that they predict differences in job performance. The central question is: Will an applicant with a low test score perform his job less satisfactorily than one with a significantly higher score? Or is it possible the low scorer can perform his work as competently as the candidate with the higher score?

Unfortunately, at the present time, only a handful of studies have addressed themselves to this key issue. But already the scattering of studies has turned up some interesting results:

- An electronics manufacturer who hired Negroes as programmers, despite their test scores, found they performed satisfactorily even though they did not score as well as the white applicants on the firm's programmer aptitude tests;
- A radio TV Appliance retailer who hired and then trained a group of Negroes deemed "unemployable" by standard aptitude and sales ability tests found that in fourteen out of the sixteen test cases the Negroes did better than had been predicted by the sales aptitude tests. Moreover, ten of the Negroes turned in actual job performances which were better than the expected performance level of all new employees;
- A study of Negro college students from culturally deprived environments revealed they did much better in college than would have been expected from their college entrance test scores;

- Of a group of sixty-six Negro students who were graduated with honors from a North Carolina college, fifty-eight would not even have been admitted to the school had the usual norms of college entrance tests been applied to them;
- A study of Negro and white highway toll collectors showed that the Negroes achieved supervisory performance ratings which were identical to those of the whites even though they had scored significantly lower on a mental-ability test used for selection.

Studies such as these—and others now underway—may well have profound implications for merit employers. True—a test may serve as an accurate predictor of job performance for an applicant who was born into and educated in the predominant, white, highly verbal culture in the United States. At the same time, it is becoming increasingly clear that these tests may not be as accurate an indicator of possible job success for an applicant who has not shared—or shared only partially—in this culture.

What is needed is more information about the relationship between test performance and cultural deprivation on the one hand and job performance on the other. This relationship must be studied both for non-white and white job applicants, and only those psychological tests used which validly predict job performance for both groups.

Right here allow me to caution against setting cutoff test scores based only on the performance of present employees. Unless this employee group includes a fair representation of minority-group workers—and unless it can be demonstrated that there is a clear relationship between test performance and job performance for these employees—there is no assurance that the test will not screen out minority-group workers in some way not truly related to their possible job performance.

The Ford Foundation currently is supporting an extensive research program to study the relationship between test performance and race both for white and non-white applicants. Meanwhile, until more of the facts are in, personnel managers may well wish to use their tests with renewed discretion, realizing that the possibility exists that applicants who have not shared in the dominant, white, middle-class verbal culture may give a significantly false impression of their real job potential. ■

EEOC ADOPTS TESTING GUIDELINES

The Commission has adopted six testing guidelines designed to help employers establish objective standards for selection, screening and promotion of workers.

These recommendations were offered in a paper on testing prepared by Dr. Phyllis Wallace, Beverly Kissinger and Betty Reynolds of EEOC's Research Division. The guidelines are:

1. Job descriptions should be examined and their critical requirements established before tests are selected for screening applicants.

2. Tests used should be those developed by reputable psychologists. Such tests should be administered by professionally qualified personnel who have had training in occupational testing in an industrial setting.

3. Rigidly inflexible minimum scores should be re-examined in light of the considerable research underway on differential selection.

4. Test scores must be considered as only one source of information and must be combined with other available information on performance, such as motivation, leadership, organizational experience, self-sufficiency and dependability.

5. Tests should be validated within the setting where they will be used. Validation should be for as many separate groups as possible in preference to one large heterogeneous group.

6. It may be advisable for employers who deal with applicants from culturally-deprived backgrounds to offer re-tests to candidates who are unsuccessful on their first test, since these people are less familiar with the testing situation and may not do as well as they are able. ■

PROFILE

MRS. HERNANDEZ

Scholar, lecturer, union organizer, civil rights crusader, political scientist, traveler, and journalist is the versatile Mrs. Aileen C. Hernandez, Commissioner of the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission.

Born in New York City, raised in Brooklyn, N. Y., where she was a salutatorian of Bay Ridge High School, Mrs. Hernandez received her AB degree magna cum laude from Howard University.

In addition to being elected to the honor society at Howard, Mrs. Hernandez edited the college newspaper.

Upon graduation from Howard, Commissioner Hernandez travelled to Norway with the International Student Exchange program and spent the summer of 1947 in graduate study of comparative government. She returned to Howard as a research assistant in the Department of Government.

Her next job was with the International Ladies Garment Workers Union, where she first served as a Pacific Coast organizer and later worked as assistant educational director during her 11 years with the union.

While with ILGWU, Commissioner Hernandez took graduate work at UCLA and USC and received her master's degree in government at Los Angeles State College.

From union work, she was appointed by Gov. Edmund G. Brown as assistant chief of the California Fair Employment Practices Commission.

President Johnson appointed Mrs. Hernandez as Commissioner of the EEOC for a full five-year term in 1965.

Mrs. Hernandez toured six Latin American countries in 1960 as a labor specialist lecturing for the U. S. State Department. She spoke in Venezuela, Colombia, Chile, Peru, Argentina and Uruguay on conditions in American trade unions, the position of minority groups in the United States and the status of women.

Mrs. Hernandez believes the only successful approach to fair employment must be through a concerted effort in many fields. She feels, for example, that housing and education problems have a significant relationship to the problems of job opportunity.

Commissioner Hernandez has a busy speaking schedule. Since her July, 1965 duties began, she has criss-crossed the nation several times speaking to audiences about the function and programs of the EEOC. ■

Conciliator Assigned To North Carolina

EEOC has assigned a conciliation officer full time to Raleigh, North Carolina, to handle employment discrimination cases in that state.

The officer, Andrew Muse, began in April with 40 individual charges against nine different employers. These are the first cases in which the Commission found reasonable cause following an intensive investigation effort begun in North Carolina early this year. The Commission will forward additional cases to Muse for conciliation. Reasonable cause has been found in more than 30 percent of the North Carolina cases.

Muse, prior to joining the Commission staff, practiced law in Danville, Va. ■

Social Science Research Conference Sets Priorities

As a part of its program of stimulating and encouraging greater interest within the social science research community in the problems of discrimination in employment, the Office of Research convened a conference on February 2, 1966.

Thirteen eminent social scientists were asked to specify the priorities in research.

Recommendations for research were in five areas: (1) the Negro's perception of himself as it relates to economic mobility; (2) how the minority worker fits into the normal functioning of the labor market; (3) exploration of the relationship between hiring criteria (especially tests) and job requirements; (4) what shapes employers attitudes toward equal employment opportunity; and (5) evaluation of present manpower development programs.

Copies of the recommendations were sent to specialists on manpower problems in a number of government agencies. The response to the Commission's role as "an idea broker" has been enthusiastic.

In fact, several of the members of the ad hoc panel urged that the Commission assume the responsibility as a clearinghouse on equal employment matters.

It is hoped that government research operations will support some of the suggested research areas. The recommendations were also made available to interested university researchers.

The conference served to help mobilize the support of the research community and to establish close, collaborative communication with this important group.

It demonstrated that the Commission could, with limited resources, attempt to "direct and shape research in equal employment opportunity in the United States." ■

COFFEE, TEA— OR MEN?

Should positions as cabin attendants on the airlines be limited to young women?

Management of the nation's largest airlines, at a hearing before the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission said: "Yes!"

Officials of unions representing more than 17,000 cabin attendants on the major airlines argued that hiring of young women to the exclusion of males is a violation of sex discrimination provisions of Title VII.

The hearing developed out of 11 cases that have been filed with the Commission charging that certain airlines had violated Title VII by requiring stewardesses to resign when they married or be grounded after they reached a certain age.

The airlines argued that they had spent millions training young women as cabin attendants and that women not only attracted passengers but served them efficiently and in a pleasing manner.

The unions argued that there are no duites of a flight attendant that a man can't perform as well as a woman. The unions also argued that the airlines are discriminating by forcing women to resign when they get married, or grounding them when they reach a certain age—without applying the same requirements to men.

The Commission has left the record open for additional statements and will rule later on the question: "Is being a young woman a bona fide occupational qualification for the job of airline cabin attendant?"

New Policy Stated on Help-Wanted

The Equal Employment Opportunity Commission has revised its policy guidelines dealing with classified advertising.

The Commission's new policy on help-wanted ads, male and female, means:

1. That a disclaimer previously requested on help-wanted classified pages is no longer requested.

2. Ads for help may be placed in either column—male or female—and the advertiser is not requested to state specifically that both sexes may apply. However, if he asks for either sex specifically in his ad, the advertiser must be prepared to justify his preference as a bona fide occupational qualification.

The new policy, as it appears in the Federal Register, reads:

"Help wanted advertising may not indicate a preference based on sex unless a bona fide occupational qualification makes it lawful to specify male or female.

"Advertisers covered by the Civil Rights Act of 1964 may place advertisements for jobs open to both sexes in columns classified by publishers under 'Male' or 'Female' headings to indicate that some occupations are considered more attractive to persons of one sex than the other. In such cases, the Commission will consider only the advertising of the covered employer and not headings used by publishers." ■

Self-Enforcement In Missouri

A leading U. S. company with headquarters in Missouri has adopted a policy under which any discrimination in employment because of race, color, religion, sex, or national origin will be treated "as a firing offense." The company directive, distributed to its offices and branches throughout the U. S., was issued after three charges were filed with the Missouri Commission on Human Rights. The Commission's executive director, Peter C. Robinson, said: "Although there appeared to be no discrimination in these cases, there did appear to be some misunderstanding on the part of some company personnel concerning the terms of the Fair Employment Practices Act and the policy of the company on non-discrimination. This was the reason for the directive and this is the kind of self-enforcement by businessmen that we should like to see spread throughout the entire state of Missouri." ■

A TRAINING OPPORTUNITY

Humble's Earn and Learn Program, called HELP, provides a stenographic training course and temporary employment for a limited number of high school graduates in the Houston area. It is designed to help selected job applicants, including minority group members, to qualify for regular stenographic jobs with Humble. The program is intended to help young people who would like to have jobs as stenographers, but who otherwise would be unable to get the training they need to qualify.

RECRUITMENT OF HELP TRAINEES

The first HELP class was started soon after the close of the 1966 school year—on June 20. Future classes will be held when the need for stenographers justifies and when qualified applicants are available.

A number of local organizations and individuals were asked to refer prospective applicants to the Humble employment office. Those contacted included: Guidance Counselors at local high schools with predominantly Negro and Latin student populations, the Texas Employment Commission, the Job Corps, the League of United Latin American Citizens (LULAC), the Crescent Foundation, the Vocational Guidance Service, and Focus on Achievement.

Fifteen HELP trainees for the first class were selected from a total of about 100 applicants. In selecting the 15 trainees, Humble used the same criteria as in selecting regular stenographic employees, except that typing and shorthand skills were not required.

LEARN

TEMPORARY WORK ASSIGNMENTS

HELP trainees hold temporary nonstenographic jobs during the 12-week training program. From one to three trainees work in 10 units of the Humble Company performing productive work like filing, coding, distributing mail, and operating reproduction machines. Trainees work the same schedule as regular employees in the organizations to which they are assigned, except that they are excused from work to attend class for three hours per week. They receive pay at the local competitive rate for temporary general clerical work. Time spent in class counts as time worked.

Petra Carrizales, Employee Relations Department—Personnel Development

CLASSROOM INSTRUCTION

The program of instruction aims at providing trainees with adequate typing and shorthand skills. They receive Standard Gregg shorthand instruction. Although not included as separate subjects, the content of material used for typing and shorthand instruction is largely directed toward individual self-improvement. It includes hints on personal grooming, etiquette, and desirable secretarial traits.

A capable and experienced teacher from a local business college conducts the classroom instruction. The class meets from 3:00 to 4:30 PM on Tuesdays and Thursdays for 12 weeks. Humble pays for instruction, study materials, and all other costs associated with the program.

CLASSROOM FACILITIES AND EQUIPMENT

Humble outfitted a classroom in the Home Office Building especially for the HELP class. Equipment includes: desks and electric typewriters for typing instruction, two conference style tables, a blackboard, and a tape recorder for shorthand instruction.

QUALIFYING FOR REGULAR EMPLOYMENT

HELP trainees will be considered preferentially for regular stenographic jobs with Humble or one of its Houston affiliates at the end of the program if they have acquired the typing and shorthand skills normally required for stenographic employment.

No Hunting License For Union-Busters

Rep. Frank Thompson Jr. (D-N.J.) recently took the floor in the House and read the record of union-busting and flouting of the law on the part of J. P. Stevens & Co.

Noting that NLRB penalties assessed against the Stevens empire for labor law violations have amounted to little more than a slap on the wrist, Thompson proposed new and stiffer penalties.

Excerpted below from his floor speech are proposals which would help make a reality of the legal right of workers to organize.

By FRANK THOMPSON JR.

U.S. Representative, New Jersey

THE REMEDIES of the Labor Board are too little and come too late. This situation, however, can be changed. I would like to discuss just a few of the current proposals on how this can be done.

In 1947, this Congress recognized that the justice delayed by the due process procedures of the NLRB hearings was in fact no justice at all in many instances. Accordingly, we provided in section 10(l) of the Taft-Hartley amendments that the Labor Board must seek a temporary restraining order from the lower Federal courts whenever there is good cause to believe that a labor union has engaged in unlawful secondary boycott activities.

In the 1959 Landrum-Griffin amendments, we extended this requirement that the Labor Board must seek Federal court injunctions in "hot cargo" and "recognitional picketing" situations. In short, when an allegation is made against a labor union unfair labor practice, the Federal courts step in with immediate relief while the merits are slowly decided by the administrative processes.

In 1947, we also authorized the Labor Board to seek judicial injunctive relief—pending the administrative processes—when a complaint was issued alleging other violations of the Labor Act by unions or by management. Section 10(j) of the Taft-Hartley amendments authorizes the Labor Board in this situation to seek "appropriate temporary relief or restraining order."

We recognized, in the 1947 Taft-Hartley amendments, that there may be a local or regional prejudice for or against labor unions. Accordingly, we authorized the Labor Board to seek the judicial relief under both section 10(j) and under section 10(e) either "within any district wherein the unfair labor practice in question is alleged to have occurred," or, "wherein such person resides or transacts business."

I understand that the Labor Board has sought section 10(j) injunctions when a complaint was issued alleging unlawful discharges based on union activities. The Labor Board sought this judicial relief in the J. P. Stevens Co. case. I further understand that the Labor Board has obtained temporary court orders putting the discharged employee back on the job in other sections of the country, but never in the Southern textile mill states. It did not get this relief here in the J. P. Stevens case. Why has not the Labor Board sought a court injunction in the district "wherein such person resides or transacts business"? Specifically, why did not the Labor Board seek the 10(j) injunction in the Federal court in New York where the J. P. Stevens Co. has its headquarters? Why has not the Labor Board exhausted the possibilities for interim judicial relief which we set out in our 1947 Taft-Hartley amendments? I wish this had been tried.

In sections 10(j) and 10(l) we recognized the necessity for temporary judicial relief from the U.S. district courts pending the administrative adjudication by the Labor Board and its trial examiners. In section 10(e) of the act we recognized the necessity for temporary relief while the Labor Board decision was reviewed on appeal to the courts of appeal.

In section 10(e) we authorized the Labor Board—pending review of its decisions by the courts of appeals—to petition such reviewing courts for "appropriate temporary relief or restraining order." We also authorized the reviewing courts "to grant such temporary relief or restraining order as it deems just and proper."

I understand this is a dead letter, that the Labor Board seldom if ever asks for "temporary relief." This means judicial delay of a year or more compounds the damage caused by the administrative delay. Relief is in sight, but never in hand. I do not understand why the Labor Board does not utilize the Congressional authorization to seek "temporary relief" from the reviewing courts; especially, as here, where the board has found unlawful discharges, and the dischargees are obviously in financial straits.

Let me briefly review the situation.

The union here charged that a number of employees had been discharged because of union membership. The regional office of the NLRB investigated these charges, and found reason to issue a complaint against the company. Thereafter, a trial examiner heard days of evidence and,in a lengthy 117-page opinion, found that some of the employees had been discharged because of union activity and other employees for legitimate reason. There was an appeal to the Labor Board. Five members of the board—Republican and Democrat alike—reviewed the evidence and the findings, and thereafter affirmed the trial examiner in almost all particulars. The case now moves on to the court of appeals for review. In that forum, according to our statutory mandate in section 10(e) of the act:

The findings of the board with respect to questions of fact if supported by substantial evidence on the record considered as a whole shall be conclusive.

Statistically, there is very little likelihood that the reviewing court will reverse the Labor Board findings of fact concerning the reasons for the discharges. The only real issue in this appeal concerns an entirely different question: Whether the Labor Board has power to require the employer to read aloud the order which concedingly he must post upon the bulletin boards. Why must the discharged employees be denied their reinstatement pending the review of this unrelated issue? Why does not the Labor Board utilize the remedial weapons we enacted into law? I hope this is tried, if not in this case, at least soon in another.

I have been discussing remedies presently available but untried. I do not think the successful use of these techniques will solve the problem. Something further must be done.

The J. P. Stevens Co. has so far lost all the battles but has won the war. It has achieved its objective—to keep the union out. Its violations of the law, assuming the reviewing court upholds the Labor Board, will be punished by a wrist-slapping. The contest between the J.P. Stevens Co. and the U.S. Government is unequal.

We send the Labor Board with a slingshot to enforce our laws against an armored Goliath and the days of David are over. If we want the laws we pass to be enforced, we must equip the agencies we create with power to deter the law violators. There are several necessary legislative reforms which have been proposed to my subcommittee. I would like to present a few of them here:

First. Currently, the National Labor Relations Act authorizes the Labor Board to order the reinstatement of employees discharged for union affiliation with back pay. This back pay award does not compensate the employee for his financial loss; nor does it deter the wrongdoer. The back pay award has been called "nothing more than a hunting license for union-busters." I suggest that we give the Labor Board authority to assess double or treble damages against certain violators—those who have been deliberate or repeated or flagrant in their violations of our laws.

Second. The laws should be amended so a violation will hurt where it counts —in the pocketbook. Moreover, it does not make sense for the Federal Government to subsidize with lucrative contracts the individuals and companies which violate our laws. Accordingly, I propose amendments to the Davis-Bacon and Walsh-Healey Acts so as to give the contracting agencies of our Government power to withhold contracts from companies which the Labor Board finds to be in open, flagrant, knowing and purposeful violation of our laws. I made a similar proposal in connection with those who violate our antitrust laws, and I think the same rationale is applicable here.

Action, I say, is urgent if we are to demonstrate that the U.S. Government is larger that the total of its parts.

Let's Make Our Cities Fit To Live In

All over the United States the complaint is rising in a steady wave that our core cities are collapsing.

Great cities such as New York, Chicago and Los Angeles have become the center of bitter slum riots while thousands of their residents flee to the suburbs to escape the sometimes overwhelming problems that have faced the mayors of every great city in the nation.

For some years slum clearance, low-income housing and the rehabilitation of long-outdated areas have been slowing down. Added to these woes is the current depression in the construction of private residential housing due largely to "tight money" which has made it difficult to finance mortgages.

Nor are their problems only the physical ones such as slums, transportation needs, water and air pollution and health problems. In addition, there are the problems of providing adequate education for their children, training workers for productive jobs in an age of automation, bringing beauty and culture into the lives of their citizens.

Finally—and hopefully not too late—Congress has adopted the "Demonstration Cities" program proposed by the Johnson Administration and warmly supported by organized labor to meet many of these needs.

Calling for funds amounting to $1.3 billion, the program is far from answering the immense needs—Mayor Lindsay of New York, for example, estimated that his city would need $50 billion to do the job—but it represents a beginning that is of the utmost importance to every worker in the country.

The new program offers two major helps for hard hit cities:

- It provides for special grants to revitalize the center city and the people who live there, and
- It provides special grants to encourage metropolitan planning.

"The plain truth is that our cities and towns are bursting at the seams," Boris Shiskin of the AFL-CIO Housing Committee told a Senate committee last spring. "Yet our urban population is growing and will continue to grow, in the years ahead, by leaps and bounds. Modern America must assure the provision of modern living conditions for its people. The need is for better cities and towns, better neighborhoods, and above all, for more and better housing."

The Demonstration Cities Act of 1966 is designed to help achieve these goals. Two men largely deserve credit for bringing it about—Senator Paul Douglas, Illinois Democrat, who introduced it on behalf of the Johnson Administration, and Senator Edmund S. Muskie, Maine Democrat, who helped develop the measure in innumerable ways.

Their primary goal is to give new hope to America's cities, not merely in terms of their physical development, but in the quality of the life they can give their residents.

Basically, the measure seeks to encourage American cities, both large and small, to plan for the future and to carry out those plans with the aid of the federal government.

Congress has approved $1.3 billion which obviously is far from enough to do the job. The AFL-CIO has taken the position that nevertheless the legislation is "an important and auspicious step in the right direction."

Here are some of the vital facts that emphasize the importance of this step that has now been taken.

- From a largely rural country of fewer than 36,000,000 people less than a century ago, the United States is now a nation of 195,000,000 people.
- Approximately 70 percent of all Americans now live in 212 metropolitan areas that occupy less than 10 percent of the surface of the country. By 1985, the population is expected to reach 250,000,000 and about 80 percent will live in metropolitan areas.
- To meet the housing needs of today's population alone, residential construction should be maintained at a minimum of 2,500,000 units a year over 10 years.
- Yet in the first six years of the 1960's, the total of public and private housing starts (including farm) has been far below this minimum.
- Latest statistics show a worsening of the situation with housing starts declining to an alarming degree. In October, starts dropped to 848,000, as compared to 1.4 million in October 1965.

Modest as is the Demonstration Cities Bill at this point, it nevertheless offers hope that it will help provide many thousands of jobs in the construction and other industries that will be affected by it. In fact, one of the announced purposes of the act is "to expand job and income opportunities."

What We Must Do To Save Our Cities

By John Kenneth Galbraith

The modern city is one of the least planned parts of our economy. Our space voyages are planned. So are our weapons systems. So is our supersonic travel—and it is planned for us whether we want it or not. So is our telephone service. So is our automobile production. So are most of the other requisites of an industrial civilization. We have corporations large enough to embrace the tasks of planning. They assume control of the prices at which they buy and sell. And they exercise measurable influence over suppliers and customers. They do not leave things to the market; they would regard that as leaving it to chance.

This planning is successful because we have planning units with a size and power competent for their task. If one doubts the importance of this, he might reflect, for a moment, on the kind of telephone service we would have were the long lines system wholly separate, and without reliable interchange arrangements or equipment compatibility, from the local system. And were each local city system separate, in turn, from every other local system.

The successful defense and development of our urban and related living space requires progress on three broad fronts.

First: We must explicitly assert the claims of the community against those of economics. I have aesthetic claims especially in mind. If a structure, facility or design is cheaper, more convenient or more efficient, it is no longer decisively in its favor. If it is ugly or otherwise offensive, it is probable that it should be rejected. The airlines have no God-given right to the cheapest track if they keep ten thousand people awake.

So wires and poles must go underground, although this costs more and power and communications, as a result, will cost more. Industry should not be in the most efficient but in the most agreeable locations. Highways and streets are not primarily a business opportunity. They are primarily places for tranquil movement—and that means the streets on which one goes to where efficiency of movement is also weighed against charm. Air and water and landscape must, of course, be protected from pollution. It should not be claimed that the eventual cost of all this will be less—that it will pay in the long run. That is no longer the test. The test is what, in the end, people will enjoy most.

Second: Effective management of environment will require far more effective planning and control of land use. One reason is that we cannot go on wasting space, a scarce and important asset, as at present.

Third and finally, it must be evident from this discussion that the city or metropolis is the key unit in the management of environment. This means that city government must be stronger, by far, than in the past. This means that cities must be run by stronger, more imaginative, and, needless to say, intelligent and strictly honest men. They must have better and much better paid employees. And they will need to have much, much more money. They already have the most important tasks and the least money. This starvation cannot continue.

Expanding the President's Cabinet

The 89th Congress will go down in the history books for many achievements but one of the most intriguing is that it is the only Congress, since the founding of the Republic, which has created two cabinet-level departments.

During the first session it established the Department of Housing and Urban Affairs and during the second session it set up the Department of Transportation.

The fact that two such Executive Branch departments were created by one Congress is indicative of the fact that the 89th was made up of an unusually sensitive group of members, aware that constant revision of government is essential to cope with the rapidity of change we encounter today.

How far we have come since George Washington presided over his first cabinet which consisted of Thomas Jefferson as Secretary of State, Alexander Hamilton as Secretary of the Treasury and Henry Knox as Secretary of War!

The Attorney General did not enter the cabinet until 1814 and the Department of Justice was not established under him until 1870.

The office of Postmaster General has a long and fascinating history. Benjamin Franklin became Postmaster General in 1775 and created the Postal Service. However, he held the office for only one year because he was made ambassador to France. The Postmaster General did not enter the cabinet until 1829. The Post Office was a part of the Treasury until 1872 when it became a cabinet-level department.

The State Department was and is the senior department in the Executive Branch.

Prior to 1789 the foreign affairs of the country were conducted under the direction of the Continental Congress, first by the Committee of Secret Correspondence, later by the Committee of Foreign Affairs and from 1781 to 1789 by the Department of Foreign Affairs.

The vital role of the Secretary of State in the early days of the Republic is seen in the fact that many men who later became President held the post. They include Jefferson, Madison, Monroe, John Quincy Adams and Van Buren.

Until the Presidential Succession Act of 1947, the Secretary of State was in direct line of succession to the Presidency following the Vice President. Under the 1947 law, the Speaker of the House and President Pro Tem of the Senate are given priority to the Secretary of State in succession.

The growth of the President's cabinet through the years reflects the needs of a growing and developing nation. Originally it was a small group of Presidential advisers but today cabinet officers are administrators of vast areas of government.

Take the case of national defense.

The War Department was the third most important department in our original government. Today, the Department of Defense, which was established in 1947, is still the third highest cabinet department.

The original War Department included the Navy. The separate Department of the Navy and office of Secretary of the Navy was created in 1798 on a cabinet level. President John Adams offered the post to George Cabot of the Massachusetts Cabots but he turned it down. Benjamin Stoddert of Maryland was appointed the same day.

In the National Security Act of 1947 the Army, Navy and Air Force were all given sub-cabinet status under the cabinet-level Secretary of Defense.

The Department of Interior was created as a cabinet-level department in 1849. Originally it was a kind of Federal housekeeper. Its original bureaus included the General Land Office, the Office of Indian Affairs, the Pension Office and the Patent Office. However, with the rising concern over our natural resources, one of the main responsibilities of the department today is that of custodian of these vital resources.

In the latter part of the 19th Century ours was a growing industrial nation but agriculture was still dominant. Congress established the Department of Agriculture in 1862, headed by a commissioner, but it was not until 1889 that the commissioner was renamed Secretary and admitted to the cabinet.

Business and industry were becoming more and more a powerful factor in this country. The Department of Commerce and Labor was established in 1903 for the purpose of fostering, promoting and developing foreign and domestic commerce.

The Department, however, was largely a business department and labor was getting limited help from it. Originally, the Labor Bureau was in the Interior Department but being in Commerce did not resolve the problems, either.

Organized labor and many others pushed hard for a separate Department of Labor and this was set up in 1913 with William B. Wilson, a member of the United Mine Workers, as its first Secretary.

It was 40 years later in 1953 that the Department of Health, Education and Welfare was established. For years such a department was urged because the nation had developed a deepening concern for problems in these areas.

Indeed, these problems have grown so acute that pressure is now being exerted to establish a separate Department of Education.

The two new departments set up by the 89th Congress—HUD and Transportation—reflect the serious concern over what is happening to our central cities and the complexities of movement in the modern age.

The history of the President's cabinet, indeed, mirrors the history of the country.

Transportation: A Big New One

The mounting madness in getting from one city to another and in moving about within a city has led the 89th Congress to create a second cabinet-level agency—the Department of Transportation.

When it is fully organized it will have some 90,000 employees and be the fifth largest agency within the Executive Branch.

The measure, as finally agreed to by both houses of Congress, brings together 34 agencies such as the Bureau of Public Roads, the Federal Aviation Agency and important areas of the Interstate Commerce Commission and the Civil Aeronautics Board.

Deleted from the final bill was the inclusion of the Federal Maritime Administration. This was approved by the maritime unions, which felt that the problems of the merchant marine and the serious state of U.S. maritime policy would not get adequate attention.

In calling for support of the bill setting up the department, Rep. Chet Holifield (D., Calif.) told the House:

"We have a very good bill here. It is a bill that lays the basis and foundation for a very effective cabinet-level department and gives the Secretary tools to work with to plan and develop a national transportation policy and coordinate the modes of transportation contained in the bill."

As presently set up, the bill concentrates on highway and air transportation although it also covers railroad and pipeline safety authority.

Transportation accounts for one-sixth of our gross national product and is one of the largest employers in the nation. The new department will be expending something like $6 billion annually in federal funds.

Another great emphasis of the department will be on safety.

The Secretary will administer the Highway Safety Act and the Motor Vehicle Safety Act, work up a plan for national driver registration, exercise authority on railroad and pipeline safety, establish air traffic regulations, minimum standards for aircraft and so on.

"We should make no mistake about it," Holifield declared. "The Secretary of Transportation will be a very powerful figure in the national transportation picture and will be a leading cabinet member."

If you have difficulty in getting across the street, across town or across the country—he will be a new target for blame.

FROM THE EQUAL EMPLOYMENT OPPORTUNITY COMMISSION
1800 G STREET, N.W., WASHINGTON, D.C. 20506

FOR RELEASE PM's, WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 28, 1966 Phone: 343-5621

Significant employment opportunity gains for Negroes in the textile industry are disclosed in Dr. Donald D. Osburn's report, "Negro Employment in the Textile Industries of North and South Carolina".

The findings of this report will be discussed at the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission's public forum on minority employment trends in the textile industry, to be held January 12-13 at the Public Library in Charlotte, North Carolina. Dr. Osburn, who was with North Carolina State University in Raleigh and is now with the University of Missouri, will open the first session with a presentation of the paper.

Dr. Osburn says that the textile industry "may serve as a training ground for Negroes in the future as it has for whites in the past... providing a medium through which workers can move from an agricultural to an industrial way of life."

He continues: "The influx of new industry has created a tight labor market and whites have been moving from textiles to higher paying industries. As a result, the textile mill products industry has had to raise wages and hire Negroes to meet its labor needs."

Historically, Negroes were almost totally excluded from textiles, the report states. As late as 1960, non-whites in North and South Carolina represented 21.7% and 30% of the total employment, respectively, but only 3.9% and 5.2% of textile employment.

Dr. Osburn states that since 1960 there has been an evident shift to new employment practices in the textile industry. He points out that the ratio of non-white employment in textiles to non-white employment in all manufacturing in South Carolina moved from 38 in 1960 to 47 in 1965. The ratio in North Carolina, Dr. Osburn says, moved from 34 in 1960 to 61 in the same period of time.

These employment gains, Dr. Osburn points out, are made in an industry which is one of the lowest paying of any manufacturing industry. The average annual wage in textiles in North Carolina in 1964, for example, was $4,000 v. $6,000 for chemical workers.

"Negroes are moving into the vacuum left in a low wage industry by white workers leaving for higher paying industries", comments Dr. Osburn. This shows that "Negroes tend to advance most rapidly, then, when the general economic advances open up new positions for whites."

Dr. Osburn points out that the textile industry is the largest single industry in the Carolinas. Present expansion in textiles is due, in part, to increased military demands and increased civilian demands caused by general economic growth.

Dr. Osburn stresses the fact that it is important for Negroes to make employment gains in textiles even though it may not be a growth industry. The industry teaches skills to workers, previously engaged in agricultural production, and prepares them for higher skilled and higher paying jobs.

The Carolinas were selected for Dr. Osburn's study of minority employment in the textile industry because of the dominance of these two states in the industry. They accounted for almost 43% of all U. S. textile mill production, according to the latest available statistics, and within the two states, textiles provides almost 45% of all manufacturing jobs.

These points, and many others, will be presented and discussed at the EEOC public forum.

The 'Superior' Rise

LAbor- N.C.

The study by a former N. C. State professor which shows a sharp increase in the hiring of Negroes for textile industry jobs not only marks the moving edge of race prejudice in North Carolina; also it suggests two of the unfortunate reasons for the prejudice.

The economics of job competition always has been a strong element in racial conflict. If one group of workers can persuade itself of another group's lack of human worth, a whole category of competitors for the available jobs can be eliminated. This is not new with the textile industry, North Carolina's largest employer, but it is most dramatic here with whites moving to other, higher-paying industry jobs. The textile industry pays, and long has paid, the lowest average hourly wage of any sizable industry in the State. The wage level is actually below the State average, and the State average is 49th among the 50 states. Obviously it has not been the price of textile industry labor which kept Negroes out; white workers, by and large, created the atmosphere which discouraged them.

Reason number two is related and even sadder: White management, which knows better, has indulged the prejudice of white workers by refusing to hire Negroes. For decades most of the textile industry has prospered in this State by paying incredibly low wages to whites who were allowed and encouraged, ironically, to feel superior to Negroes. It probably has occurred to few of the more than 252,000 textile industry workers in North Carolina that their average wage, compared with national norms, mark them not as superior to workers of an other race, but as the least skilled, least productive and least worthy labor group in America. Those are not kind labels to put on good and simple North Carolinians. But the labels follow economic truth and the practice of race prejudice in this State.

Substantial advances in Negro blue-collar employment in the textile industry over the past two years have not been matched by Negro advances in white-collar employment, an Equal Employment Opportunity Commission research report reveals.

The report, "1966 Employment Survey in the Textile Industry of The Carolinas", will be presented by EEOC's Office of Research and Reports at the public forum on minority employment trends in the textile industry, to be held January 12-13 at the Public Library in Charlotte, North Carolina.

A major finding of the report is that Negroes remain in the lowest occupational jobs. Negroes make-up 8.6% of the workforce in 406 textile mills surveyed in North and South Carolina. Of these Negroes, 99% are blue-collar and service workers.

Negro women, the report points out, are especially found in low-ranking jobs, and represent only 3.7% of all females employed.

Improvements are taking place in Negro employment in textiles, the report indicates. In North Carolina, for example, of the 103 companies which reported both in 1964 and 1965, more than 3,000 employees were added to the payroll, with three-fifths of them being Negroes. Employment increased 55% for Negro men, and 312% for Negro women - up from 184 to 758 Negro women.

The EEOC report concludes that the position of Negroes could "be vastly improved in the textile industries...both on a head-count basis and on a job quality basis."

66-112 (OVER)

The report covers 406 textile mills in 73 counties in North and South Carolina and is representative of the industry there. Data comes from the EEO-1 Standard Form 100 report. Employers with 100 or more persons and subject to Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 must file the form, as well as government contractors and sub-contractors with 50 or more employers

The report and other documents on minority employment trends in the textile industry will be discussed at the public forum.

The Equal Employment Opportunity Commission has decided a Southern paper manufacturing plant used tests for employment and promotion that discriminate against Negroes, Chairman Stephen N. Shulman announced today.

The decision by the Commission was the first based upon Guidelines on Employment Testing Procedures adopted last August. The Guidelines state: "If the facts indicate that an employer has discriminated in the past on the basis of race... the use of tests in such circumstances will be scrutinized carefully..."

The Commission's investigation of a charge filed against the company and a union showed that only 6 per cent of the plant's 2,465 employees are Negro, while about 40 per cent of the local population are Negroes. Investigation also revealed that only 8 per cent of the Negroes employed in the plant are in "line of progression" jobs compared to 82 per cent for white employees. "Line of progression" jobs are those in which an employee moves up from lower-paying jobs to higher-paying jobs at the top of the classification, according to seniority and ability. Ninety-two per cent of the Negroes were in "dead end" jobs - those with no prospect for advancement.

Since 1964, the Commission found, 17 Negroes took tests to transfer from "dead-end" jobs to "line of progression" jobs. The only Negro who passed the test was outbid for the job he sought.

The Commission found that the tests were not "professionally developed" and that they discriminated and excluded Negroes from employment opportunities.

On the basis of this investigation, the Commission found reasonable cause to believe that the company was in violation of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. Title VII prohibits discrimination in hiring, upgrading and all other conditions of employment because of race, color, religion, sex or national origin.

The Commission will undertake conciliation to bring the company into compliance with Title VII.

UNITED TEXTILE WORKERS OF AMERICA, AFL-CIO

TEXTILE EMPLOYMENT FORUM

CHARLOTTE, N.C.

JANUARY 12, 13, 1967

First speaking for the United Textile Workers of America, AFL-CIO, we should state clearly what our policy is as far as it affects the negroes in the Carolinas.

Our policy is a very simple one. We believe the negro should be dealt with as a responsible member of a Southern Community. We want and expect him to be treated in all areas of community life, the same as you treat with any responsible citizens. These are community problems and should be treated as such. We are 100% for an economy that provides for full employment, using the skills of all of its' citizens and development of their potentials.

Our own limited survey of this problem reveals that during the years, 1966, the employment of negroes in the Carolinas have improved. This varies by degrees from mill to mill and town to town. It appears that the older production employees are less likely to migrate to other job opportunity, than his younger Brother. This does not hold true among the employees in the skilled trades. The textile industry have for some time been training employees in the various crafts of skills, only to have them move on to higher paying jobs.

We see the following examples at some of the mills we work with. For example - At one large mill in the Carolinas during an expansion program in 1966 in which its plant force was increased by one third - 75% of the employees hired were negroes. They are filling production jobs all through the plant.

At a similar plant, near the mill mentioned above, with a normal to high labor turnover the company hired forty three (43) negroes in 1966 - to non janitorial or warehouse jobs. Some time ago here the negroes were limited primarily to ware house laborers or janitorial jobs. In this mill now for example you would fine twelve (12) negroes working production jobs in the card room; thirteen (13) in the spinning room; fifteen (15) in the weave room; and ten (10) in the cloth room, all on production jobs.

At two Carolina Mills where employment remains at about 1000 employees, nearly 50% of the employees hired to production jobs in 1966, were negroes.

In one of our larger synethetic yarn producing plants, less than 5% of those hired in 1966 are negroes. The reasons we are given for such a low percentage is that negroes are just not applying for these jobs. The negro population of that county is in excess of 14000.

In some parts of the Carolinas labor is real tight, Textile Mills and Finishing Plants are experiencing difficulty in recruiting labor. In many instance, management tells us they couldn't care less what color his skin is, so long as he is willing and able to do the job. Management tells us and this is significant that there is little, if any training problems between the whites and non whites.

In the report submitted by Dr. Donald D. Osburn dealt at considerable length about the problems of employment for the negro. It does not take a genius to look back down the road to see where we've been, nor does it take one to determine where we are at the present time. It likely will take more than that to determine where we are going.

Commendation is due Dr. Osburn on his report. He points out the problems the negro is faced with in the textile field, and the many things for him to do, to qualify himself for future jobs in the textile industry.

The technological trends in the textile industry as it strugles to automate and computerize their plants, too was set forth by Dr. Osburn. This is a process that has been going on for several years and it is expected that the Textile Industry will continue to make advances in all of these areas. It likely will have profound effect on the future of all employees of the textile industry.

With reference to Dr. Osburn report one of the Asheville, N.C. newspaper commented editorially soon after report was released. The by line stated:

"TEXTILES OFFER RACIAL PROMISE"

The Editorial in part is as follows:

"Dr. Osburn points out that historically the textile industry has had low pay scales and that many white workers in recent years have left textile jobs for higher paying ones in chemical and other plants. As a result textile employers have had to seek more negroes to fill these openings."

According to Osburn, "negroes are moving into the vacuum left in a low wage industry by white workers leaving for higher-paying industries. This shows that negroes tend to advance more rapidly when general economic advances open new positions for whites."

Dr. Osburn holds that textile industry, which accounts for 43 per cent of the manufactoring jobs in North and South Carolina, can do the same things for negroes it has done for many whites - help them make the move from the farm to a job in a plant.

The Editorial went on to say that, the textile industry does appear to be peculiarly adapted to doing this job. If it does, it will help to solve one of the Carolinas' major economic problems." Thus ended the editorial.

The paper is widely read by thousands of people in Western North Carolina.

The research report 1966-11. Released for publication January 4, 1967, shows serious lack of negro employment among the skilled and white collar workers.

For example tables 3, 5 and 6 on pages 10, 12, and 14, respectively table 3, shows only slightly more than 1% of the total white collar force are negroes, which means they likely are not being given very serious consideration for these jobs. This should be better. Tables 5 and 6 are mute evidence that there is little movement, by the negro workers into the Technical professionals, white collar workers jobs. We frankly do not know why this appears to be the facts.

Our Union has no quarrel with the textile industry in its program of recruiting negroes. We have no stones to cast or condemnations to make for the past. We all are aware of the road we have traveled. It is not a pleasant thing to reflect on. The negro in the past has endured discrimination in many areas of his life. This whole problem cannot be laid on the back of this industry. All our citizens must accept their share of responsibility for all discriminatory acts of the past. The time is now come, however, to move ahead in making jobs available in all levels where employees are needed for the negro. The textile industry now has the opportunity to be the training ground for all who wish employment in this field.

Conclusions

There are two basic problems that is the primary cause of the unusually large labor turn over in the textile industry. That is (1) the textile industry is stuck with a national reputation of a low wage industry. Dr. Osburn quoted a $2000. difference in the annual wage between the textile employees and chemical employees. This reputation is a real problem for the textile industry in its effort to recruit a work force. The (2) thing is the lack of labor unions. It would seem to us that with their problems, the textile industry would establish its own training program and establish its' program of communication to reach the people who are looking for jobs.

In addition establish a joint program of the Federal and State Government, utilizing trade schools or other facilities that may be available. Most high schools in the country has equipment that could be used for training. This equipment stands idle every night during the week.

Mr. Chairman, Commissioners, ladies and gentlemen: It is a pleasure to have this opportunity to share with you some past experiences in the field of equal employment opportunity, especially as it relates to the textile industry in North Carolina.

Having worked in the field of equal employment opportunity for ten years with the American Friends Service Committee, and two years in State Government, I am very conscious of employment policies and practices of North Carolina employers. With primary responsibilities for encouraging employers to hire on the basis of merit, regardless of race, I talked with approximately 300 employers. As they would agree to adopt these policies and practices, I would, upon their request refer applicants to them. I must say, however, that during this period when I worked with AFSC, the textile industry was one of the last to utilize the services of our program.

It is encouraging to have theEEOC here in Charlotte for what we hope will be the beginning of a series of forums o n the employment practices of various industries. As has already been said, the textile industry forms the very core of our state's economy and its influence is woven into the social and cultural life of practically every North Carolinian. For this reason it is mandatory that equal employment opportunity is provided every individual. However, even if this is done in the textile industry, it will do little to make a significant change in our economy, for the average hourly wage in North Carolina textiles is $1.78 . This is not only below the average hourly wage for total manufacturing in N. C., which is $1.82, but also below the national average for textiles, which is $1.87.

And speaking of wages - I'd like to cite a specific case of discrimination in a North Carolina textile plant. An individual whom I know personally was employed for 30 years in a particular firm; 20 of those years, head man in the Dye Dept. Wages? $1.39 per hour. There was very little opportunity for over-time and during the 20 year period, he trained several white employees who subsequently were promoted to bigger and better jobs. One in particular is now Production Manager.

According to the American Textile Manufacturers Institute, "rewarding career opportunities are unparalleled in the textile industry. Careers are available in such fields as manufacturing and production, engineering administration, finance, accounting, transportation, designing, styling, research, sales, advertising, chemistry, quality control, personnel and industrial relations, public relations, research and development, marketing and merchandising."

Yet EEOC's recent report indicates that in North Carolina there are only

74	Negroes out of	6693	in office and clerical jobs
6	"	5299	in managerial
4	"	1021	as technicians
3	"	1143	in professional jobs
and NO	"	404	in sales

Where are the Negroes in the textile industry? Concentrated in the lowest ocuupational categories. In order to change the current situation, there must be affirmative action on the part of the industry.

Perhaps the most frustrating experience in referring prospective employees has been two-fold: 1) requests for the "super" Negro, never any requests for the average office clerk, but always one who knows shorthand and has all the personal qualities for a private secretary, and 2) shocking ~~xxqxxxx~~ requests for "light-skinned" Negroes. This is now beginning to change somewhat because many want to have a show case placement so they can say, "Oh, we have one!"

Talking with textile employees, I find that their biggest complaints include: 1) no opportunity for upgrading like their white counterparts; 2) whites get promoted with less seniority; 3) difference in pay, even when they are doing the same jobs; and 4) there is no one to whom they can turn to correct these problems. There is fear of intimidation and job reprisal - and rightfully so, because they have seen many lose their jobs when some efforts are made to correct the situation.

I see a need for two kinds of action. I admit I do not know how this should be accomplished. However, 1) we need assurance that subsequent ~~xx~~ forums like this do more than add to the frustrations of minorities who feel the brunt of discriminatory practices - that this does not raise the hopes of people and then let them down flat; and 2) there is a need for some kind of action which gives minorities the steam to ~~xxxxx~~ obtain jobs on their own. There is a need to eliminate the psychological barriers and obstacles which prevent minorities from having the self confidence and sense of well-being necessary to be a whole individual. If this is accomplished, there will be no need for a "middle man" to speak for the Negro. He can speak for himself and will have reasonable expectation that his requests will be heard.

STATEMENT

TEXTILE WORKERS UNION OF AMERICA, AFL-CIO

This was re-phrased

TEXTILE EMPLOYMENT FORUM

EQUAL EMPLOYMENT OPPORTUNITY COMMISSION
Charlotte, North Carolina
January 12-13, 1967

The Textile Workers Union of America, AFL-CIO, welcomes this opportunity to appear before the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission and present its views on one of the most pressing problems facing the industry at this time. It is our hope that out of this forum will come some really useful programs to enable the textile industry to open new vistas for employment to minority groups who have too long been shut out of real participation in it on an equal basis with other workers.

Before the problem can be realistically attacked it must be put in its true perspective. To do that we must speak honestly and frankly about the nature of the Southern textile industry in which our union has labored so diligently for more than a generation. Nothing is gained by concealing what, for us, have become the day to day facts of industrial life -- facts which this Commission may not be fully aware of.

In spite of the highly profitable character of textile operations in recent years, the southern textile industry has persisted in its traditional role as the lowest-wage manufacturing industry in the nation. The average straight-time hourly earnings of southern textile production workers in June 1965 amounted to $1.59, 36% below the average for all manufacturing workers ($2.50) and the lowest of all the manufacturing industries in the country (Appendix I).

The substandard nature of southern textile wages is evident from the fact that in June 1965, 40% of the nonsupervisory employees in this industry were earning less than the amount necessary to lift a family out of the poverty class ($3,000 a year, or $1.50 per hour). In two major sectors of the industry more than half of the workers were earning less than the poverty wage of $1.50 per hour as of the latest date for which information is available (March 1964). In southern knitting mills, employing a total of 113,900 workers, 54.1% earned less than $1.50 and in southern yarn and thread mills, with a total of 85,700 workers, 58.5% earned less than $1.50.

In addition to suffering from substandard wages, southern textile workers have been deprived of virtually all of the supplementary economic benefits achieved by organized workers in other industries: guaranteed company-paid pensions; company-paid insurance; 6 or more paid holidays; supplementary unemployment benefits; company-financed automation funds to provide severance pay and retraining in case of technological displacement.

The low-wage policy pursued by the southern textile industry has depressed the living standards of the workers and has acted as a drag on the entire economy of the South. The expansion of the textile industry cannot serve to correct the retarded economic development of the South as long as it is based on substandard wages.

The average per capita income in the United States was $2,746 in 1965. In North Carolina, the leading textile state, per capita income was $2,041, some $705, or 26% below the U. S. average. In South Carolina, the state with the highest proportion of manufacturing workers accounted for by textiles (48%), the per capita income was $1,846, some $900 or 33% below the U. S. average. It is no coincidence that the two leading textile states rank among the lowest in per capita income of all the states in the union: North Carolina is 45th and South Carolina, 48th.

These conditions have been brought about by the industry itself. In order to maintain the substandard wages and working conditions just described it has moved ruthlessly to crush any opposition to the entrenched system and has acted vigorously to manipulate the social forces in the community in order to maintain the status quo.

For many years the industry was characterized by family owned mills located primarily in small towns where the mill offered the only source of factory employment in a generally agricultural area. Management was personal; strict loyalty was demanded of supervisors and workers alike. Workers often lived in "mill villages" where the houses were company owned and the occupants were permitted to remain only as long as they were employed by the company. In recent decades this pattern has broken down. Corporate mergers have tended to create large industrial complexes in which the mill village was an anachronism.

Nevertheless, management still dominates the town, controls the credit policies of the banks, dictates the editorial policies of the newspapers -- at least with regard to economic matters -- and, by virtue of its special position as chief em-of its banks, dictates the editorial policies of its newspapers -- at least with regard to economic matters -- and, by virtue of its special position as chief employer, is able to compel submission to its will in a whole host of economic and social matters.

Accordingly it is in a position to rigidly control access to jobs in the mill and this has meant discrimination - both because of membership in or sympathy with unionism and because of race.

The position of the industry with regard to union organization has been and continues to be one of implacable and total opposition to any form of organization and collective bargaining among the workers. This policy has been so fiercely and relentlessly pursued that the sad fact is that only about 10% of the workers in the industry in North and South Carolina are members of any union.

The methods by which the employers have suppressed unionism are heartless, cynical and frequently in open defiance of the law.

In plant after plant we have encountered virtually the identical pattern of opposition, including threats to close the mill if the union came in, interrogation of employees concerning their union sentiments, threats and promises designed to compel employees to withdraw from organizing activities, mobilization of the business community to withdraw credit from union adherents, surveillance of union meetings and many other devices designed to harass workers to give up their union sympathies.

The most brazen tactic, however, is the repeated and illegal discharge of union supporters or suspected supporters and the blacklisting of such discharged workers in the community and the surrounding area. Indeed, the employers exert such a rigid control over employment that they have been able to hound discharged union adherents to the point where even skilled operators have been forced to leave areas in which they have been born and brought up in order to get work, even at a time when the industry was experiencing an acute shortage of skilled workers.

Furthermore, we have come to learn over the years that the employer's campaign of anti-unionism would almost inevitably be accompanied by a disgraceful appeal to racial prejudice in addition to the other devices used. Again, this tactic follows a pattern. Workers are first informed about our union's forthright stand in favor of civil rights and equal job rights for all. This is tied in with a fear campaign that a vote for the union in an NLRB election is a vote for forced racial mixing on a social basis at union meetings and other functions. At the same time a spectre is raised that the union will see to it that white workers will be replaced by Negroes. Indeed, this very same theme greeted the Commission's announcement of the holding of this forum in the press of Greeneville, S.C., one of the centers of industry strength.

This pattern was repeated over and over again in one organizing campaign after another. Despite repeated attempts by many trade unions to have such propaganda declared an impermissible form of campaigning the NLRB refused to rule it out until the trend of events in favor of increased rights for Negroes compelled a change. Finally, in 1962 the board ruled in two companion cases, Sewell Manufacturing Company, 138 NLRB No. 12 and Allen-Morrison Sign Co., 138 NLRB No. 11 (the latter brought by our union), that appeals calculated to inflame racial prejudice would henceforth constitute grounds for setting aside a board election. The use of such offensive material has declined substantially, but by no means entirely, since those decisions were rendered.

In addition to propaganda calculated to spur racial hatred, the non-union employers have practiced actual discrimination on the job in a number of respects. For example, Negroes have been restricted to menial jobs and strict segregation of facilities has been maintained. In one of the most notorious cases ever decided by the NLRB, involving J.P. Stevens & Co., Inc., the industry's second largest chain (J. P. Stevens & Co. Inc., 157 NLRB No. 90 (1966)) the Trial Examiner severely condemned the practice of the company of maintaining segregated toilet facilities which was revealed at the hearing.

This, then, is the nature of the industry in which we operate. Is it any wonder that Professor Osburn found that employment of Negroes in this industry is only a small fraction of what it would be if Negroes were employed in proportion to their representation in the labor force? In North Carolina, the Negro employment ratio in textiles was 61% of its proportion of the labor force in 1965 and in South Carolina, it was only 47% (Negro Employment in the Textile Industries of North and South Carolina, pp. 30-31).

The crucial fact is that the responsibility for existing racial patterns in the industry is clearly in the hands of management. It is management which exercises the unilateral right to hire - in unionized plants as well as in non-union plants. In hiring new employees, it is management which determines the jobs and departments to which they shall be assigned.

The Textile Workers Union of America, AFL-CIO, has placed no impediments in the way of management hiring members of minority groups. Membership in the union is open to all on a non-discriminatory basis. Under our constitution, "any worker employed in any industry within the jurisdiction of the International Union . . . shall be eligible for membership in the union." (Article XI, Sec. 1(a), TWUA Constitution, June 1966).

The union is operated on a completely non-segregated basis. Our constitution makes no provision for different classes of membership or segregated locals and no such differentiation exists in our organization. Minority group members have full rights of participation in union affairs and many do in fact hold offices as stewards, committeemen, local union officers and International union officers.

In carrying out our legal responsibility of representing all workers in the bargaining unit, it is our policy to represent them fairly and impartially, without regard to race, creed, color or national origin. All workers have equal access to the grievance procedure established under our collective bargaining agreements.

TWUA has consistently supported civil rights and equal employment opportunities for all Americans. In 1956 the union's Executive Council adopted a resolution on civil rights which read, in part, as follows:

> " Historically the fight for civil rights and the battle to organize labor have marched forward together . . . A national fair employment practices act should be passed; and in the meantime, the Government Contracts committee should more vigorously enforce the non-discrimination clause in such contracts . . ." (For full text of resolution, see Appendix II).

The biennial convention of the union in 1956 adopted a resolution denouncing the White Citizens Councils and allied organizations "as enemies of law and order and bitter foes of the labor movement." The resolution concluded with a "call upon members of labor unions and all those devoted to southern progress to scorn these groups." (Appendix III).

This resolution was adopted in spite of the vocal opposition of a number of southern delegates. In fact it resulted in a walkout from the convention by a number of delegates and the resignation of a few members from the union.

TWUA's actions in support of civil rights have not been limited to convention resolutions expressing the union's point of view. In 1960 the General President of the union placed a local union in Front Royal, Virginia, under trusteeship in order to prevent the local from assisting a segregated school in that city after the public schools were ordered to desegregate. This action was upheld by the union's biennial convention in 1960 and the local union discontinued these activities.

At our 1966 convention the union reaffirmed its support of civil rights as "part of a struggle to secure equal rights for all minorities, all races, all colors and ethnic groups" and called upon Congress and the Administration to "utilize its full powers to legislate and administer effective laws to prevent discrimination in employment." (Appendix IV).

In implementing the union's policy of supporting equal employment opportunity, we have sought to break down whatever barriers to Negro hiring and upgrading we inherited when we organized a plant. As Marshall points out, "it would be a mistake . . . to conclude that unions caused segregated rosters, because racial divisions of labor existed long before unions were significant in the South. Indeed, the virtually unorganized Southern textile industry has had relatively few Negroes and rigid racial segregation. Almost without exception, moreover, those firms which have desegregated their lines of progression in the South are unionized." (Ray Marshall, The Negro and Organized Labor, 1965, p. 142).

We have suggested to a number of mill managements that it would be fruitful to take advantage of the government assistance available for on-the-job training programs under the Manpower Development and Training Act. In spite of the serious shortages of workers encountered by the mills in the past two years, our suggestions have been rejected. These employers are so hostile to any measure of government regulation that they even refuse to participate in government-assisted training programs. However, the industry has not been reluctant to demand government assistance where no regulation of their activities was involved, such as the cotton textile import controls instituted in 1961 and the One-Price Cotton law enacted in 1964. The industry was able to profit from these government programs without sharing the benefits equitably with its employees.

Under the pressure of stringent labor shortages, southern textile employers have been compelled to change their exclusionary employment practices. A survey by the Commission's staff of 136 establishments in North and South Carolina reporting Negro employment in 1964 and 1965 shows that Negro employment increased its proportion of total employment from 6.0% in 1964 to 9.3% in 1965. (Derived from Tables 7A and 7B, 1966 Employment Survey in the Textile Industry of the Carolinas). In 1966 the Commission's staff tabulated returns from 406 establishments in the Carolinas which show that Negroes account for 8.6% of the total work force; excluding white-collar jobs (Officials and Managers, Professionals, Technicians, Sales Workers, Office and Clerical), Negroes comprise 9.1% of the production and maintenance workers.

A survey conducted by TWUA in 1966 of southern plants covered by our collective bargaining agreements yielded returns from 30 establishments with a total of 18,933 production and maintenance workers (Table 1, Appendix V). Negroes comprise 11.1% of the workers in these bargaining units, compared to an average of 9.1% in the Carolina establishments covered by the Commission's survey. The proportion of Negro employment to the total in 7 units which reported this information for prior years increased from 5.5% in 1964 to 9.6% in 1965.

The extent to which Negroes have been permitted to enter production jobs with opportunities for upgrading is indicated by the fact that 54.7% of the Negroes in these TWUA units are employed in semi-skilled Operative classifications (Table 2, Appendix V). Until recently, Negroes had been employed predominantly in unskilled Laborer and Service classifications. Their representation in these classifications is still disproportionately high, Negroes accounting for 32.4% of the Laborers and 51.4% of the Service Workers.

On the other hand, Negroes are under-represented in the highest-skill manual worker classification (Craftsmen). Only 1.5% of the Negro males are classified as Craftsmen and none of the Negro females are so classified. Moreover, the figures show a much lower participation rate for Negro females (6.0% of all females) than for Negro males (12.9% of all males).

The results of this survey indicate that considerable progress has been made in making employment opportunities available for Negroes in the southern textile industry. However, the disproportionate distribution of Negroes among the various skill levels and the low participation rate of Negro females point to the need for affirmative action programs to assure equal employment opportunities for all.

The report prepared for the Commission, Negro Employment in the Textile Industries of North and South Carolina, by Donald S. Osburn, provides a useful framework for discussion. We endorse the "implications for the future" which Dr. Osburn draws from his analysis, namely that "as a long run goal, the extent and quality of Negro education must be improved," and that "there is much that can and should be done immediately . . . (including) disseminating information about job opportunities, urging geographic and occupational mobility, and encouraging greater Negro participation in available vocational training programs." (Osburn Report, pp. 43-44).

Before proceeding to an appraisal of the approaches which could be most fruitful in enlarging employment opportunities for minority groups, we would like to address ourselves to several references in Dr. Osburn's report which provide a grossly distorted view of the relationship between unionism and Negroes.

1. Effect of Higher Wages

Osburn states that "because they have so little power, unions have not been primarily responsible for raising wages (in the Carolina textile industry). Greater unionization might bring higher wages generally, but it might not necessarily benefit the Negro in the long run." (p. 25). He cites Dewey's suggestion "that unions have an adverse effect on Negro advancement because the more successful a union is in securing higher wages, job security, and better working conditions, the more likely it is that the unionized jobs will attract white workers."

The question of whether unions have been primarily responsible for raising wages in this industry is debatable. We believe that it is no coincidence that each of the general wage increases instituted by the industry in the past eight yeats occurred shortly after TWUA launched massive leaflet distributions at the gates of unorganized mills, calling upon the industry to share its growing prosperity with its workers in higher wages.

Far more important than this question is the inference which Osburn draws that future union wage gains will be inherently inimical to Negro interests. This is a throwback to the discredited doctrine that Negroes should limit their aspirations to the lowest skilled jobs since the higher jobs will attract white workers.

We categorically reject the notion that union success in raising labor standards has an adverse effect on Negro opportunity. Indeed, the facts clearly belie this proposition. Bureau of Labor Statistics data on 1964 average hourly earnings and percentages of non-white to total employment in major manufacturing industries reveal that there is no consistent relationship between an industry's wage level and the proportion of Negroes employed (Appendix VI). High-wage industries like Primary Metals and Transportation Equipment, with average earnings well above the All-Manufacturing average of $2.44, also employ above-average proportions of Negroes (12.1% for Metals and 8.2% for Transportation Equipment, compared to an average of 7.6% for all-manufacturing). On the other hand, low-wage industries like Textile and Furniture employ below-average proportions of Negroes (5.3% and 7.0%, respectively).

2. Effect of Seniority Rules

Osburn offers no statement of his own on this subject but cites Rapping to the effect that "imposed seniority rules may disadvantage non-whites who are relatively recent arrivals from agriculture to the industrial center." (p. 25, Osburn Report).

The fact is that seniority rules are designed to formulate an equitable basis for reconciling the interests of all employees. The notion that an employee accumulates certain rights as his length of service grows is deeply rooted in industrial practice. Such benefits as vacation pay, insurance, pensions and choice of shifts are generally dependent upon length of service. In the same way, it is fitting for an employee's seniority to determine his relative position in case of layoff or promotion. With respect to promotions, southern textile companies generally retain the right to disqualify the senior employee on the basis of their judgment of his qualifications.

Actually, Negro employees have at least as much to gain from seniority rules as do whites. The hallmark of the seniority system is that it substitutes a set of equitable rules for the discretionary powers of management. The exercise of these powers has certainly disadvantaged Negroes in the past and they are bound to benefit from the application of uniform seniority rules. Marshall points out that "unions have made it possible for Negroes to hold their positions in some industries by introducing the principle of seniority." (The Negro and Organized Labor, 1965, p. 143).

It is noteworthy that the author cited by the Osburn Report (Rapping) concedes that union seniority rules might indeed bestow valuable rights upon Negroes but he speculates that if this should occur, unions which are "politically dominated by whites" would be likely to change their rules so as to cancel the Negroes' rights.

We submit that this kind of speculation has no place in a report purporting to provide objective background material for the Commission. All it does is betray the anti-union bias of the author. Unions are damned if they do and damned if they don't!

We submit, further, that the principles which unionism stands for -- the justice of raising the wage and economic standards of workers, and the equity of establishing common rules by which the interests of all employees shall be governed -- are advantageous to nonwhites as well as whites. Surely the Commission cannot condone the theory that the higher wages, job security and better working conditions achieved by unions "have an adverse effect on opportunities for Negro advancement." This is a pernicious theory which we urge the Commission to condemn.

3. Effect of "Strike Violence" on Integration

The Osburn report quotes Dewey to the effect that "the unique social cohesion and cultural isolation, together with the history of strike violence in this industry, discouraged employers from attempting to integrate their work forces." (Osburn Report, p. 26).

This is another statement which tells more about the author's prejudices than about the objective facts. It is nothing more than an apologia for the discriminatory employment practices pursued by employers in this industry.

Marshall notes that "employers are much more important than unions in the economic power structures of most communities, especially in the South." (Op. cit., p.141).

In view of the ruthless domination of textile communities by the employers in this industry, it is absurd to suppose that they would be "discouraged" from attempting to integrated their work forces for the above reasons.

We know of no racial protest strike in the textile industry in the past twenty years. In fact, the most substantial gains in Negro employment and upgrading which have taken place in the past two years were completely free of any worker protest. This bears out Marshall's finding that "the evidence seems conclusive that a firm management position on upgrading will usually prevent overt reaction from white workers, especially where management's policies are supported by the local or international union." (Op. cit., p. 139).

We are confident that the Commission will not be deterred from a constructive approach to the task of enlarging employment opportunities for minority groups by pursuing diversionary theories. We must recognize that this is a complex task requiring affirmative action on many fronts. All parties at interest can contribute to the success of this venture by cooperating fully in a joint effort to overcome the obstacles to true equality of opportunity.

The employers must shoulder the prime responsibility. They do the hiring and they assign new employees to particular departments, which frequently determines opportunities for future upgrading. It is therefore their responsibility to conduct their recruitment in such a way as to assure dissemination of information about job opportunities among all who may qualify. They have the responsibility to adopt hiring procedures which screen applicants on the basis of objective qualifications for the job rather than extraneous factors such as race. They also have the responsibility to institute training programs to enable new employees to learn the requisite skills as well as permitting old employees to upgrade their skills. Finally, they have the obligation to develop equitable rules for affording promotional opportunities which will avoid favoritism and discrimination.

The government also has many responsibilities in this area. Of fundamental importance is its role under the Employment Act of 1946 to assure maximum employment, production and purchasing power. The great gain in Negro employment in the southern textile industry during recent years owes much to the rapid growth in the nation's economic activities, stimulated by the federal government's fiscal policies and Great Society programs.

The state and federal governments have an obligation to improve the operation of our labor markets. More adequate information is needed on the availability of jobs. The counseling services of the state employment commissions need to be expanded and relocation grants provided to facilitate worker mobility.

In the field of education there is a tremendous need for improvement. All levels of government must share in the responsibility for closing the gap between Negro and white educational achievement. There is a particular need for expanding Negro participation in vocational training programs.

The Negro community also has a major role to play in improving the capability of minority groups to take advantage of new opportunities. Community groups can give counsel and encouragement to young people on educational and vocational matters. They may also serve as a clearing house for job information and work with unions, management and government to assure the carrying out of fair employment practices.

The Textile Workers Union of America, AFL-CIO, is dedicated to the task of establishing decent labor standards in the textile industry. Fair employment practices are an integral part of our goal. We have pursued this goal in collective bargaining with employers in the southern textile industry to the benefit of all our members - Negro and white. We intend to continue our efforts in this direction and look forward to cooperating with all interested parties in the achievement of a better life for textile workers.

APPENDIX II

Resolution on Civil Rights Adopted by Executive Council, Textile Workers Union of America, AFL-CIO July 9, 1956

Historically the fight for civil rights and the battle to organize labor have marched forward together. The bloody battle between steel workers and Pinkerton detectives, and the use of federal troops against Pullman strikers provide memorable chapters in the last century's battles for civil rights. In this century, instances multiply up to the present; none have been more fervent in this struggle than members of our own union. The labor movement supports and applauds advances in civil rights for all groups.

After almost three and a half years in office, the Eisenhower administration has finally submitted election-year proposals for civil rights legislation. These proposals include setting up a commission on civil rights, establishing a civil rights division within the Department of Justice, the prosecution of private persons as well as public officials who interfere with the right to vote in federal elections, and injunctive relief against denial of civil rights.

There is no need for Congressional authorization for a commission on civil rights. The President can and should establish such a commisssion forthwith. The other proposals deserve full support, but since they are inadequate to meet the need, they should be supplemented by the proposals of liberals in the House and Senate.

Legislation is required to abolish the poll tax, still in effect in four states. An anti-lynching bill is required. The Senate and House rules that allow filibustering are in urgent need of change. A national fair employment practices act should be passed; and in the meantime, the Government Contracts committee should more vigorously enforce the non-discrimination clause in such contracts.

From all of this legislation we demand that a union organizer's right to be free from molestation will be finally secured. During the last year, our organizers have been brutally beaten in Sylacauga, Ala., and Gaffney, S. C. The Department of Justice refused our pleas for assistance, claiming that the assaults did not come within the scope of present laws. The current legislative proposals must make injunctive, civil and criminal remedies available against any person who interferes with the right to organize.

We hope that the administration's submission of civil rights legislation in an election year was not a cynical move to substitute pretense for action. We call upon Republicans and Democrats alike to support a full and effective civil rights program that will extend the blessings of democracy to all Americans. To such a program we offer labor's traditional and historical support.

THEREFORE BE IT RESOLVED by the ninth biennial convention of the Textile Workers Union of America, AFL-CIO, that:

1. We call upon Congress to enact the administration's civil rights proposals.
2. We urge that the inadequacies of these proposals be remedied by additional civil rights legislation. The poll tax should be abolished, an anti-lynching bill is required, and a fair employment practices act should be passed. The Senate and House rules that allow filibustering should be changed. Injunctive, civil and criminal remedies must be made available against any person who interferes with the right to organize.
3. We call upon the states and cities of the nation to adopt fair employment practices acts in order to prevent employers who are not in interstate commerce from practicing discrimination.

APPENDIX III

Resolution on White Citizens Councils Adopted by Ninth Biennial Convention Textile Workers Union of America, AFL-CIO May 18, 1956

In 1954 the United States Supreme Court declared that segregation in the public schools violates the United States Constitution. A year later it ordered the end of segregation "with all deliberate speed." One of the great conflicts in American society has been settled by these decisions. Their consequences are like those that inevitably follow social change of vast sweep and deep implication. Americans most intimately affected by these decisions must obey the mandate of the highest court of the land. Americans not called upon to make the critical adjustments must view efforts at compliance with patience, understanding, tolerance and wisdom. We deplore the President's failure to provide the leadership without which the transition to an unsegregated public school system will be needlessly painful.

Anti-labor forces have seized this moment of confusion to launch a new assault on labor. They have formed White Citizens Councils and allied groups that hide their union-busting objectives behind the mask of an anti-segregation program.

Many of the leaders of these groups have been identified as long-time foes of organized labor. They have been the generating forces of "right to work" legislation and staunch supporters of the Taft-Hartley act. While they claim their goal is to keep Negro children out of white schools, their more serious objective is to keep unions out of unorganized plants. In this objective they have already succeeded in some instances. We expect to meet them many times again as our most bitter foes in future organizing campaigns.

What union organization these groups cannot destroy they hope to sterilize. They plan a fraud even bigger than the "right to work" laws—they hope to talk southern labor into breaking away from AFL-CIO. If they are successful, they will create the largest company union the world has ever seen except those in the Soviet Union. The regional wage differential will become a permanent feature of southern life. Southern labor will sink irretrievably into the morass of second-class economic citizenship.

The recklessness and irresponsibility of the White Citizens Councils was dramatically demonstrated last month when its members brutally attacked a Negro singer in Birmingham, Ala. We congratulate the law enforcement agencies of Birmingham for their speedy apprehension and punishment of these hoodlums.

While the great changes of the times demand patience, tolerance and understanding, the White Citizens Councils and allied organizations promote union-busting and an atmosphere of hate, bigotry and violence. It was this atmosphere in Sylacauga, Ala. and Gaffney, S. C. that produced brutal attacks on our organizers in the last year. Members of labor unions and all who are interested in the economic and social progress of southern labor must spurn these groups as their dreaded enemies.

THEREFORE BE IT RESOLVED by the ninth biennial convention of the Textile Workers Union of America, AFL-CIO, that:

1. We call upon the President to convene a conference of southern governors and provide other moral leadership for the peaceful and orderly transition to an unsegregated public school system.

2. We denounce the White Citizens Councils and allied organizations as enemies of law and order and bitter foes of the labor movement. We call upon members of labor unions and all those devoted to southern progress to scorn these groups.

TEXTILE WORKERS UNION OF AMERICA

APPENDIX IV

Resolution on Civil Rights
Adopted by Fourteenth Biennial Convention
June 24, 1966

The Civil Rights Act of 1964 opened up all accommodations to the public regardless of race or color. Compliance with its provisions has been virtually universal. It also provided for the desegregation of all facilities receiving federal funds and established an Equal Employment Opportunity Commission to guarantee equal employment opportunities for all.

The Voting Rights Act of 1965 contains the means to end discrimination at the ballot box. The Act provides for federal registrars and other protection in counties where there is discrimination against Negroes and other minorities in registration and voting. Congress has thereby provided a remedy which, if effectively used, could break through the voting discrimination pattern. The extension of voting rights to all persons in the South will contribute to the composition of city, state and federal governments having a better understanding of the need for legislation in the interest of the common people.

The passage of both pieces of legislation were major accomplishments in the continuing effort to abolish racial discrimination in this country, and we commend President Johnson for his courage, his skill and leadership in securing the passage of these laws.

Civil and human rights include the equal administration of justice, equal justice in courts for all men, the right to trial by an unsegregated jury, continued progress in school desegregation, equal and improved educational facilities and protection against unlawful arrests and police brutality.

The struggle for civil rights is part of a struggle to secure equal rights for all minorities, all races, all colors and ethnic groups.

We therefore urge that wherever and whenever prejudice, hatred and discrimination raise their ugly heads, we promptly strike them down.

In some southern communities law enforcement officers, acting in cahoots with employers and reactionary forces, have arrested civil rights workers and union organizers on trumped-up charges. Union organizers have been denied the right to public sleeping accommodations and the right to hire or use public meeting places. They have been the victims of violence by police. We are witnessing a return to the open tactics of vigilantes of the nineteenth century. Federal legislation is urgently needed to safeguard the civil rights of all who are the victims of such violence and harassment.

THEREFORE, BE IT RESOLVED by the 14th Biennial Convention of the Textile Workers Union of America, AFL-CIO, CLC, that:

1. We call upon Congress and the Administration to utilize its full powers to legislate and administer effective laws to prevent discrimination in employment.
2. We recommend the passage of effective legislation making it a federal crime to commit acts of physical violence against and harassment of civil rights workers and union organizers attempting to exercise their civil rights or attempting lawfully to assist others in obtaining their civil rights.
3. We urge that jurors in both federal and state courts be chosen from jury rolls made up completely by chance selection, so that the systematic exclusion of non-Caucasians in both federal and state courts will become a thing of the past.
4. We pledge to continue our close cooperation with men, women and organizations of goodwill within the labor movement, as well as outside of it, to make our country a better place in which to work and live and to rid ourselves of prejudice, hate and discrimination whenever, wherever and against whomever we find it.

I am Emory Via, Labor Program Director for the Southern Regional Council, Inc., headquartered in Atlanta, Georgia.

I am pleased that this forum is being held. I trust that it is continuing evidence of the Commission's desire to go beyond the case-by case approach in employment discrimination. As a representative of a Southwide organization, I welcome the attemtion given to the region and to one of our major industries. Indeed as the commission knows, it is the predominant industry in two states affected by this hearing.

I am sure that the Commission will find that there are in the region a number of persons and organizations who will support it fully in its work of implementing the long delayed national policy of ending discrimination in employment and securing equal opportunity for all. I have no doubt that spokesmen for industry can tell you of examples of progress which they have made and point to incidents where a company has gone the second mile in its efforts to assist our society in overcoming the horrendous impact of long run, general, and specific discrimination. It is not a situation which one industry by its efforts alone can find suitable answers, but each of us has the task of tending promptly to our own responsibilities. It stands to reason that some persons are in better situations than others to influence associates, organizations, and community leaders not to be bound by past bad habits and to make moves toward a new and hopeful day for all persons of the region.

In many ways the textile industry is uniquely qualified to provide this kind of leadership within the Carolinas. It is the predominant industry. It has aggressive business leadership. This leadership is an important part of community social, cultural, and political life. It is an industry not characterized just by disparate, localized enterprises but by important economic combinations in the form of chain manufacturing enterprises and manfacturing associations. I have no doubt that the industry's leadership can receive substantial technical and consultative help from the Commission. And there would be available to them other resources of the federal government, which if not yet tapped, could be so with the Commission 's help.

There are private organizations, which though they should not be charged with doing industry's job, would join willingly in supporting constructive efforts by industry. Such support might range from further consultative assistance, to public education, to actual assistance in some phase of the total program which should be undertaken.

I would guess that there are industry leaders that already know what to do. The Commission can certainly lay out a workable plan of how to proceed. Some industry representatives may already be acquainted with the general outlines of programs for affirmative action as recommended by other agencies, such as the Department of Defense in terms of assisting companies to comply with Executive Order 11246 so as not to jeopardize the contractual relationship with the federal government.

If the textile industry through its leadership and associations were to take the initiative, with commission assistance, they could indeed adopt a total program to insure in fact that equal opportunity within the industry had been achieved. You will not miss, of course, my emphasis on actual, in fact achievement as conterposed to statements of good policies on showing of efforts only. Fairness, no longer in the American scene, can satisfied by rituals, even when well intentioned. We are tragically behind in recognizing the reality that performance is what is required. It is required by decency to rpeviously deprived persons, yes, but it is also required by our own sense of self respect as a nation and as a region. It is required by the practical situation of minority groups and their legitimate disatisfaction with the results of American democracy to date, it is required by the intricacies of the U.S. involvement in international affairs which includes an enormous amount of economic activity which in a serious way affects the textile industry, and happily we should all agree, is required by national policy as represented by the Commission's presence here today.

I am not an economist but it would seem that the textile industry's staying power during years of some adversity and its recent prosperity are due to several factors. There include managerial skill, productive development, relative prosperity in the general economy, technological changes , a productive labor force, and public policies which have afforded the industry a significant degree of protection.

The industry is to be credited for its imagination and skill; however, these attributes afford no excuse for escaping its public responsibilities. And certainly the protection granted by public policy gives a special cause to not just meet the minimum requirements of public responsibility but to seek in everyway to measure up to what the present situation requires, including of course the eradication of discrimination from the entire industry.

The papers prepared by Drs. Osburn and Wallace for the Commission are quite useful. They reveal that the economic pressures of a tight labor market have caused the textile industry to hire Negroes for the first time in significant numbers. The papers document, too, that though a significant percentage increase in Negro employment can be shown, it is due almost entirely to the low base from which the comparison must be made.

Further, the old pattern, to those concerned with employment fairness, continues in that Negroes are severly underrepresented in clerical, skilled, technical, professional and managerial occupations. I hope that industry spokesmen can teel us of agressive programs of recruitment and training to remedy this situation. However, such programs have not come to my attention. '

Those of us concerned with the economic development of the region, must be pleased to rate the decline of textile employment as a proportion of all employment. The Commission will understand that this is not an anti-textile industry statement, but one that favors regional development. It is a comment on the low wage nature of the indsutry. How 'natural' this low wage status, is something that economists can debate. For my part I am pleased to learn from the Osburn report (p.21, "Negro Employment in the Textile Industries of North and South Carolina.") that competition from industrialization created wage increases for Southern textile workers in 1966. It is especially heartening to know that this could be done at a time when the industry was being acclaimed for a high level of profits.

Regarding Section V of the Osburn paper, I am far from certain as to what the impacy of automation will be on the employment of Negroes and the industry's skilled needs requirements. I favor, as a general proposition, creating machines to do man's work. I think we can expect, however, numerous cases of adversely effecting Negro employment unless companies take affirmative action in terms of training. I would guess, for instance, that automatic doffing machinery already threatens the jobs of Negro women hired as doffers in some plants. This could, of course, mean a lack of work and a resultant loss of jobs for a group which the Dr. Wallace's report so clearly shows to be especially disadvantaged.

I am not especially sanguine about leaving to an industry the sole power of determining fairness in employment, for whites or Negroes, when faced with the impact of automation. And we are talking of an industry where the degree of unionization -- a potential balance to management's unilateral decision making-- is woefully small. I do not raise this issue because I think the Commission should invade the theory field of industrial relations, but because, in all candor, it should be expecially alert to the rights of minority workers where there are few other checks on managerial discretion. There are a few points in the Osburn report on which I would like to remakr. At several points he comments, or quotes others, regarding the impact of unions on the availability of opporunities for Negroes. We are talking about the textile industry. The unions in that industry are of importance to the inquiry under way. Because of the rather heated relations bewteen unions and management in the southern textile industry, a certain amount of mis-information and conclusion-jumping sometimes occurs regarding cause and effect

The paper (p.25) raises the question as to whether Negroes might suffer if wages were increased by union action. I submit that all employees within the industry would profit -- Negroes and whites alike. The problem is who is in and who is out. In the textile industry, even if the union represented much more of the workers than its less than 10% share, it would not be the union that would be in charge of admissions. It is true that wages go up and if you have discrimination, that the favored group will get the jobs if the pay is sufficient for their favored position. But we are presumably talking about being rid of discrimination, and it does not behoove us to even imply that poor wages are an advantage to Negroes as against better wages.

Although there are trades that unions exercise a degree of control of job allocations as implied by Osburn (p.25) this is not the case in the textile industry. If he is talking only about the application of a seniority system, then the question must go to the fairness of the system -- does it discriminate on the basis of race. It is important to recognize that a seniority system is designed to protect workers' rights--not racial rights. It is as important to protect the rights of whites as of Negroes. However, if a system was designed to treat a group unfaily, then I am sure the law under which this Commission operates can reach that situation.

Osburn also used the unfortunate term "strike violence" as a reason why employers were slow to integrate work forces. I fear that this term, to most ears, implies "union" violence. It is true that the textile industry has had its share of industrial relations violence. There is a public record on this matter, so it need not be argued here, but it becomes clear upon reading it that violence may well spring from management or community action. I do not believe that the proposition that violence in industrial relations operated, generally in a special way to keep Negroes out of the Industry.

Later in his paper (p.30) Professor Osburn uncovers the happy truth that when plants in the industry were integrated, that management did not face high labor turnover costs. This is an old truth in the process of ending discrimination in employment which is well understood by the members of this Commission. It is backed by extensive experience under state fair employment agencies and federal programs as well as by the experience of companies that have responded to moral persuastion to integrate well in advance of a legal requirement to do so. It is a lesson useful to the industry of this region. Clear, decisive management action, now backed by law, can make full integration in employment work. Many companies have historically assumed as an operating cost, the cost of training programs. I am sure that the Textile industry has not differed markedly from other industries in this regard. Today there are unequaled opportunities for federal and state governmental assistance as well as aid from private resources in providing training programs. I trust that there will be an industry initiative to utilize all of these resources and that they will be brought to bear in a very special way on the problems of securing quality employment for Negro men and women.

In closing, I would like to raise a caution for the Commission's consideration. It is a reminder to exercise the greatest care as it approaches the textile industry, with its demand for less expensive labor, to not contribute to again locking-in Negroes into the region's lowest paid jobs. I would suggest here only two steps that may help avoid such an outcome. One, already made, is to be the advisor and prod to see to it that Negroes have full opportunity to enter all jobs at all levels and that responsible parties take affirmative action to prepare Negroes for such jobs. Secondly, the moral influence, technical assistance, and legal authority of this Commission would be used with the higher paid industries of the Carolinas to see that they provide sufficient opportunities for Negroes, too. It is an essential ingredient to our long range progress in employment opportunity, and as a region of developing hope, that Negro workers, on a par with whites, have meaningful alternatives in employment.

Negro Employment in the Textile Industries of North & South Carolina

Chairman Shulman, Commissioner Holcomb, Commissioner Jackson, I am pleased that this forum is being held. I am sure that the Commission will find that there are in the region a number of persons and organizations who will support it fully in its work of implementing the long delayed national policy of ending discrimination in employment and securing equal opportunity for all. I have no doubt that spokesmen for industry can tell you of examples of progress which they have made and point to incidents where a company has gone the second mile in its efforts to assist our society in overcoming the horrendous impact of long run, general, and specific discrimination. It is not a situation in which one industry by its efforts alone can find suitable answers,but each of us has the task of tending promptly to our own responsibilities. It stands to reason that some persons are in better situations than others to influence associates, organizations, and community leaders not to be bound by past bad habits and to make moves toward a new and hopeful day for all persons of the region.

In many ways the textile industry is uniquely qualified to provide this kind of leadership within the Carolinas. It is the predominant industry. It has agrressive business leadership. This leadership is an important part of community, social, cultural and political life. It is an industry not characterized just by disparate, localized enterprises but by important economic combinations in the form of chain manufacturing enterprises and manufacturing associations. I have no doubt that the industry's leadership can receive substantial technical and consultative help from the Commission. And there would be available to them other resources of the federal government, which if not yet tapped, could be so with the Commission's help.

There are private organizations, which though they should not be charged with doing industry's job, would join willingly in supporting constructive efforts by industry. Such support might range from further consultative assistance, to public education, to actual assistance in some phase of the total program which should be undertaken.

I would guess that there are industry leaders that already know what to do. The Commission can certainly lay out a workable plan of how to proceed. Some industry representatives may already be acquainted with the general outlines of programs for affirmative action as recommended by other agencies, such as the Department of Defense, in terms of assisting companies to comply with Executive Order 11246 so as not to jeopardize the contractual relationship with the federal government

If the textile industry through its leadership and associations were to take the initiative, with Commission assistance, they could indeed adopt a total program to insure in fact that equal opportunity within the industry has been achieved. You will not miss, of course, my emphasis on actual, in fact achievement as counterposed to statements of good policies or a showing of efforts only. Fairness, no longer in the American scene, can be satisfied by rituals, even when well intentioned. We are tragically behind in recognizing the reality that performance is what is required. It is required by decency to previously deprived persons, yes, but it is also required by our own sense of self respect as a nation and as a region. It is required by the practical situation of minority groups and their legitimate disatisfaction with the results of American democracy to date; it is required by the intricacies of the United States' involvement in international affairs which includes an enormous amount of economic activity which in a serious way affects the textile industry; and happily, we should all agree, performance is required by national policy as represented by the Commission's presence here today.

I am not an economist but it would seem that the textile industry's staying power during years of some adversity and its recent prosperity are due to several factors. These include managerial skill, product development, relative prosperity in the general economy, technological changes, a productive labor force, and public policies which have afforded the industry a significant degree of protection.

The industry is to be credited for its imagination and skill; however, these attributes afford no excuse for escaping its public responsibilities. And certainly the protection granted by public policy gives a special cause to not just meet the minimum requirements of public responsibility but to seek in every way to measure up to what the present situation requires, including, of course, the eradication of discrimination from the entire industry.

The papers prepared by Drs. Osburn and Wallace for the Commission are quite useful. They reveal that the economic pressures of a tight labor market have caused the textile industry to hire Negroes for the first time in significant numbers. The papers document, too, that though a significant percentage increase in Negro employment can be shown, it is due almost entirely to the low base from which the comparison must be made.

Further, the old pattern, to those concerned with employment fairness, continues in that Negroes are severly underrepresented in clerical, skilled, technical, professional and managerial occupations. I hope that industry spokesmen can tell us of aggressive programs of recruitment and training to remedy this situation. However, such programs have not come to my attention. And it is with real regret that I must remark on the general absence of statements from industry spokesmen at this hearing.

Those of us concerned with the economic development of the region, must be pleased to note the decline of textile employment as a proportion of all employment. The Commission will understand that this is not an anti-textile industry statement, but one that favors regional development. It is a comment on the low wage nature of the industry. How 'natural' this low wage status is, is something that economist can debate. For my part I am pleased to learn from the Osburn report (p. 21,"Negro Employment in the Textile Industries of North and South Carolina") that competition from industrializtion created wage increases for Southern textile workers in 1966. It is especially heartening to know that this could be done at a time when the industry was being acclaimed for a high level of profits.

Regarding Section V of the Osburn paper, I am far from certain as to what the impact of automation will be on the employment of Negroes and the industry's skilled needs requirements. I favor, as a general proposition, creating machines to do man's work. I think we can expect, however, numerous cases of automation adversely affecting Negro employment unless companies take affirmative action in terms of training. I would guess, for instance, that automatic doffing machinery already threatens the jobs of Negro women hired as doffers in some plants. This could, of course, mean a lack of work and a resultant loss of jobs for a group which Dr. Wallace's report so clearly shows to be especially disadvantaged.

I am not especially sanguine about leaving to an industry the sole power of determining fairness in employment, for whites or Negroes, when faced with the impact of automation. And we are talking of an industry where the degree of unionization--a potential balance to management's unilateral decision making-- is woefully small. I do not raise this issue because I think the Commission should invade the thorny field of industrial relations, but because, in all candor, it should be especially alert to the rights of minority workers where there are few other checks on managerial discretion.

There are other parts of the Osburn report on which I would like to remark. At several points he comments, or quotes others, regarding the impact of unions on the availability of opportunities for Negroes. We are talking about the textile industry. The unions in that industry are of importance to the inquiry under way. Because of the rather heated relations between unions and management in the southern textile industry, a certain amount of mis-information and conclusion-jumping sometimes occurs regarding cause and effect.

The paper (p.25) raises the question as to whether Negroes might suffer if wages were increased by union action. I submit that all employees within the industry would profit--Negroes could be done at a time when the industry was being acclaimed for a high level of profits.

The paper (p.25) raises the question as to whether Negroes might suffer if wages were increased by union action. I submit that all employees within the industry would profit--Negroes and whites alike. The problem is who is in and who is out. In the textile industry, even if the union represented many more of the workers than its less than 10% share, it would not be the union that would be in charge of admissions. It is true that if wages go up and if you have discrimination, that the favored group will get the jobs if the pay is sufficient for their favored position. But we are presumably talking about being rid of discrimination, and it does not behoove us to even imply that poor wages are an advantage to Negroes as against better wages.

Although there are trades in which unions exercise a degree of control of job allocations as implied by Osburn (p.25) this is not the case in the textile industry. If he is talking only about the application of a seniority system, then the question must go to the fairness of the system--does it discriminate on the basis of race. It is important to recognize that a seniority system is designed to protect workers' rights--not racial rights. It is as important to protect the rights of whites as of Negroes. However, if a system was designed to treat a group unfairly, then I am sure the law under which this Commission operates can reach that situation.

Osburn also used the unfortunate term "strike violence" as a reason why employers were slow to integrate work forces. I fear that this term, to most ears, implies "union" violence. It is true that the textile industry has had its share of industrial relations violence. There is a public record on this matter, so it need not be argued here, but it becomes clear upon reading it that violence may well spring from management or community action. I do not believe that the proposition that violence in industrial relations operated, generally, in a special way to keep Negroes out of the industry can be supported.

Later in his paper (p. 30) Professor Osburn uncovers the happy truth that when plants in the industry were integrated, management did not face high labor turnover costs. This is an old truth in the process of ending discrimination in employment which is well understood by the members of this Commission. It is backed by extensive experience under state fair employment agencies and federal programs as well as by the experience of companies that have responded to moral persuasion to integrate well in advance of a legal requirement to do so. It is a lesson useful to ths industry of this region. Clear, decisive, management action, now backed by law, can make full integration in employment work.

Many companies have historically assumed as an operating cost, the cost of training programs. I am sure that the textile industry has not differed markedly from other industries in this regard. Today there are unequaled opportunities for federal and state governmental assistance as well as aid from private resources in providing training programs. I trust that there will be industry initiative to utilize all of these resources and that they will be brought to bear in a very special way on the problems of securing quality employment for Negro men and women.

In closing, I would like to raise a caution for the Commission's consideration. It is a reminder to exercise the greatest care as it approaches the textile industry, with its demand for less expensive labor, to not contribute to again locking-in Negroes into the region's lowest paid jobs. I would suggest here only two steps that may help avoid such an outcome. One, already made, is to be the advisor and prod to see to it that Negroes have full opportunity to enter all jobs at all levels and that responsible parties take affirmative action to prepare Negroes for such jobs. Secondly, the moral influence, technical assistance, and legal authority of this Commission should be used with the higher paid industries of the Carolinas to see that they provide sufficient opportunities for Negroes, too. It is an essential ingredient to our long range progress in employment opportunity, and as a region of developing hope, that Negro workers, on a par with whites, have meaningful alternatives in employment.

Thank you for this opportunity to appear before the Commission.

Closing statement in behalf of the Commission

"Ground Rules"

1. Statements by speakers are limited to 15 minutes, followed by informal exchange between members of the Commission and the speaker, limited to time of original statement. The members may seek further elaboration of the speaker's views as set forth in his statement. The general public will not be permitted to ask any questions of the participant.

2. All participants to submit prepared material, if possible, by January 6, along with requests for specific hour at which to be heard. Twenty copies of prepared statement are requested.

3. Except for the 30-minute discussion period, persons who were not invited by the Commission must first be interviewed by a Commission representative, and will be scheduled as time permits. The time schedule and designation of persons to be heard will be at the discretion of the Commission.

4. Any public charge of discrimination against a specific individual, employer, union or employment agency is out of order. A Commission representative will be present and available for private consultation with persons who wish to file specific charges of discrimination.

5. A period of 15 days following the close of the forum will be allowed for submission of additional statements.

STATEMENT OF JAMES PIERCE, COORDINATOR
INDUSTRIAL UNION DEPARTMENT
AFL - CIO

To the Textile Forum of The

EQUAL EMPLOYMENT OPPORTUNITY COMMISSION

AT CHARLOTTE, NORTH CAROLINA

FRIDAY, JANUARY 13, 1967

STATEMENT BY JAMES PIERCE, COORDINATOR, INDUSTRIAL UNION DEPARTMENT

My work as Coordinator of the Industrial Union Department, AFL-CIO requires that I implement the policy of the IUD throughout a wide range of activities. Primary is the responsibility for directing and coordinating the organizing activities of IUD affiliates throughout the Southeast.

The IUD is a Department of the AFL-CIO, representing approximately 60 International Unions with total membership of over 7 million people and covers all phases of American Industry. Organizers working under my direction simultaneously conduct campaigns in scores of different industries from electronics and automobile to textile and hosiery. In addition to the organizing campaigns in industries I am charged with the task of organizing the 130,000 migrant farm workers in the Southeast.

Nowhere except in the textile industry have I seen such frequent reliance upon inflammatory racial propaganda by employers in an industry in their attempt to maintain control of their employees and the community in which it operates. This was true ten years ago. It is still true today.

This is a letter from a Textile Company to it's employees mailed in 1956 - more than 10 years ago. Allow me to quote from it.

"All over the South today there is deep concern on the question of racial segregation versus intergration. That is a matter on which each person is entitled to his or her own views. This company does not consider that it is appropriate for the company to try to influence you one way or another on this deep or vital issue."

"But we do want to point out to you that the unions have taken and are taking a very extreme position on this matter ...The actual truth is that the unions are working day and night, and pouring out the money they collect in dues, in an effort to eliminate segregation and to bring about the intergration in the schools and elsewhere between the white people and the colored people as rapidly and completely as possible."

"In the case which was before the United States Supreme Court on this question, the CIO, now merged with the AFL in what is called the AFL-CIO, filed an official document in which it stated emphatically and positively that the Union supports the elimination of racial segregation from every phase of American life."

"Further the union urged that segregation should be ended "forthwith" rather than by 'gradual adjustment'. "The document further states" that where the unions have their way, there is likewise no segregation in the use of plant eating places, locker rooms, rest rooms, etc."

"You may have not noticed in the newspapers (this letter continues) that the AFL-CIO at its recent convention took $75,000 of the dues paid to it by the people who are its members and gave this money to the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, which is the organization agressively working for the wiping out of all racial segregation, both in schools, manufacturing plants and elsewhere." Close quote.

Let me now read to you from a letter passed out by another textile company during an organizing campaign about one year ago. It begins:

"All over the South there is deep concern on the question of racial segregation versus integration. That is a matter on which each person is entitled to his or her own views. This company does not consider it appropriate to try to influence you one way or the other on this deep and vital issue . . ."

On and on this letter goes, repeating word for word what was said by another textile employer 10 years ago.

I call the Commission's attention to a publication called "Militant Truth" which crops up regularly in organizing campaigns. It is mailed to textile workers' homes and the address plates are identical even to misspelled names to the particular company's own plates. Here's an excerpt from a sample editorial entitled "An Evil Coalition.": I quote:

"A closely-knit alliance between the modernist-socialist National Council of Churches, the labor unions and the radical 'Civil rights' organizations has teamed up to undermine constitutional principles and to promote all manner of radical-socialist social and political ideologies - - -. Self-styled civil rights leaders are betraying the Negro, just as the union bosses are betraying labor. They are only interested in promoting themselves .....not in offering any genuine help to the Negro race." End quote.

Here we have an instance where textile employers not only us racial propaganda to place fear into the hearts of white workers with regard to unions, but also attempt to discredit those organizations which are working to promote equality of opportunity in the eyes of Negro workers themselves.

It was pointed out here yesterday by the Textile Workers Union of America that textile employers still dictate the editorial policies of the local newspaper. Here's a story in a small town paper only a few months ago which carries a list of contributions made by unions to various organizations. Under the headline: "What does the Union Do with All YOUR MONEY? . . . . It spotlights the following contributions:

NAACP, Detroit, $1,000.

NAACP Defense and Education Fund, $1,000.

NAACP National Freedom Fund, $500.

National Urban League, $2,025.

And this newspaper is not content with exploiting anti-Negro feelings in behalf of the town's principal employer. It also utilizes anti-Semitism, spotlighting a $2,000 contribution to the Jewish Labor Committee and an investment of $27,000 in State of Israel Bonds.

It was also pointed out yesterday that, by virtue of its position as chief employer, textile management is able to force the community to submit to its will in a large variety of economic and social matters. In this fashion, during an organizing campaign in a small North Carolina community, it was able to get the Mayor to declare; and I quote:

"In my opinion, when a person joins the Union he is in effect joining the NAACP because the two have become allies in this city."

Even the industry's semi-official publications reflect racial bias. Here's an excerpt from an article in a slick textile industry magazine which injects racism into an attack upon former Commerce Secretary Luther Hodges, a one-time textile executive and governor of North Carolina: I quote from this article:

"In his new book, 'The Business Conscience,' Secretary of Commerce Luther Hodges has not only firmly and unequivocally declared himself to be on the side of the angels, but has also expressed strong doubts that many of his former friends in the textile industry belong in such company. . . "

"It should not astonish anyone who has taken note of the bread and butter requirements of some book publishers and of the ways of some politicians that Mr. Hodges was invited to turn his sensational revelations into a neatly-jacketed salable volume. It is announced on the back of the title page that Mr. Hodges' rayalties for this book are being assigned to the United Negro College Fund and to the Methodist Colleges of North Carolina." Unquote.

Finally, I call to the attention of this forum a quotation from a recent proceeding before the National Labor Relations Board wherein the NLRB Regional Director reported as follows with regard to the anti-union activities of a textile plant manager:

"Witnesses stated that in the course of his remarks, the plant manager displayed to the assembled employees a picture of Walter Reuther standing on the steps of a building with Martin Luther King and said that the picture had been taken in Selma, Alabama; that the IUD had actively and financially supported the civil rights activities of Martin Luther King and contributed substantially to the expenses of the Selma march. It is asserted that the plant manager rhetorically inquired whether his listeners would want part of their dues money to be used to support the activities of Martin Luther King and whether they would wish to be represented by persons who supported and condoned such activities . . . The plant manager admits that he displayed the picture of Reuther and King which he states appeared in a union magazine..."

I cite the foregoing quotations because some people would have you believe that the textile industry is going all-out to remove racial prejudice and job discrimination from the textile communities; that all that is needed is a few years of persuasion, logic, and a sense of justice.

I fervently wish this were so. But all the evidence points to the contrary. If action speaks louder than words, and it does, the truth must be evident to all of us that the textile industry has no intention of releasing it's employees, or it's community, from the bonds with which they are presently tied; the bonds of economic slavery, racial prejudice, and community domination by the industry.

When occasionally, there is compliance with the law of the land by textile employers it is generally for one of two reasons; because of the current labor shortage----or in order to qualify for government contracts; not because of some miraculous desire to bring the South into the twentieth century. The truth is that racial prejudice and job discrimination pays off for the textile industry in dollars and cents; in higher dividends for the stockholders. It keeps the union out and keeps wages low. Their job is to make money, and if appeals to racial prejudice will accomplish that they will undoubtedly continue to employ it.

We of the IUD are convinced of this. The textile industry sits like a giant in many southern communities. It has demonstrated that it can manipulate, and even ignore, public opinion in these communities. If it decides to open the door--more than just a crack or two--to employment opportunities for Negro workers, it will encounter no serious trouble from it's white workers. Many industries, other than textile, have done so.

All that is needed is the will of the industry to do so. And that, if you please, means surrendering one of its traditional weapons---and I refer to racial propoganda---in combating the efforts of unions to bring a better way of life to all textile workers, regardless of race, color, or creed.

Thank you, again, for the opportunity to address this forum.

ITEMS RECOMMENDED FOR DISCUSSION AT TEXTILE EMPLOYMENT FORUM BY GUEST SPEAKERS

1. Comment, critical or otherwise, on the "Osburn Report" with particular emphasis on additional information or insights which would add to the Commission's and the public's knowledge of trends in the textile industry and enlarged opportunities for minority employees there.

2. Comment upon the Commission's analysis of data from Employer Information Report EEO-1 (to be supplied).

3. Specific recommendations for programs by which the Commission's Technical Assistance Division can work with all interested groups to stimulate the apparent trend of increased Negro employment in the industry, and to increase opportunities for Negroes in white collar and skilled employment.

4. Specific recommendations by which the following agencies or groups can act to meet these goals:

   a. Employers
   b. North Carolina Good Neighbor Council and affiliates
   c. Other state agencies, such as Employment Service [women - domestics?

      Education - elementary and secondary; vocational; higher education
      Agriculture
      Welfare

   d. Federal agencies other than EEOC
   e. Community and human relations organizations

5. Statement of any activities within the speaker's knowledge, being conducted by any of the foregoing, which have already resulted in improved job opportunity in the textile industry for Negroes, with particular emphasis upon methods of recruitment, training programs, implementation of equal employment policies by management, overcoming resistance to change in the work force and the community, etc., from the management, or demand side of the labor market; and any techniques or programs which have stimulated interest in the minority community in seeking and qualifying for jobs in the industry, the supply side of the labor market.

6. If representatives of management from their experience have any comments which would encourage other employers to seek to improve minority group hiring patterns and practices, they should be offered. Information about educational and skill requirements and projections of industry needs for various occupational categories would also be useful.

7. Comment upon increased employment opportunities in North and South Carolina outside the textile industry.

Hearings Slated On Textile Jobs

CHARLOTTE—Hearings on employment of Negroes and other minorities in the textiles industry will be conducted Thursday and Friday in Charlotte.

Stephen N. Shulman, chairman of the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, which will hold the hearings, and two other commission members will hear spokesmen from State and local agencies, civil rights groups and individual complaints.

The American Textile Manufacturers Institute has said it will not take part because the announcement of the public hearings "implied a punitive approach and later events have done little to dispel this impression."

The textile industry provides about 45 per cent of the manufacturing jobs in the Carolinas.

Race Discrimination Is Charged to Mills

Ral. News + Observer 1-13-67

CHARLOTTE (UPI)—Charges of "intimidation, coercion and discrimination" were made against Southern textile mills Thursday as the federal Equal Employment Opportunity Commission opened the first public hearings it has ever held on inustrial hiring practices.

About 160 persons were present at the first day of the two-day forum, including many representing mills' management despite an official boycott of the sessions announced earlier by the firms' central trade organization, the American Textile Manufacturers Institute (ATMI)

An ATMI statement had said the forum might "encourage unfounded and irresponsible accusations" and simply holding the hearing "implied a punitive approach" against the mills. Only one industry representative spoke, limiting his remarks to his firm's employment practices.

'First Fired'

Kelly M. Alexander of Charlotte, president of the North Carolina National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, noted during periods of unemployment, "Negroes are the first fired and last hired" and added "we reject the notion that Negroes are not qualified" or untrainable. "One is not born a textile worker," he said.

Alexander called for a "comprehensive investigation" of employment practices and establishment of apprentice training programs "beyond tokenism." He placed part of the blame, however, on "the failure of constructive Negro leadership to have rapport with understanding officials."

Poverty Charge

Paul Swaity, a vice president of the AFL-CIO Textile Workers Union of America, charged the Southern textile industry with manufacturing poverty as well as textiles.

"And its by-products are injustice and inequality. The tools it uses are not only looms, spinning frames and other standard textile machinery. It also relies upon intimidation, coercion and discrimination," Swaity said.

"And it uses them not only on a racial basis, but also against white workers who seek a remedy for the substandard conditions that have been saddled upon them by this industry's traditional low wage policy."

Swaity said "subsidized industrialization" had record progress in the South but nowhere else had workers "been accorded so small a share of the propsperity which this industrialization has brought."

Southern Textile Mills Charged With Racial Bias At Hearing

Paul Swaity, a vice president of the AFL-CIO Textile Workers Union of America, charged the southern textile industry with manufacturing poverty as well as textiles.

"And its by - products are injustice and inequality. The tools it uses are not only looms, spinning frames and other standard textile machinery. It also relies upon intimidation, coercion and discrimination," Swaity said.

Swaity said "subsidied industrialiation" had record progress in the South but nowhere else had workers "been accorded so small a share of the prosperity which this industraliation has brought.

SOCIAL CONSCIENCE LACK

"Employers must shoulder the prime responsibility," he said, accusing the industry of being "notorious for its lack of a social conscience" and of violating the National Labor Relations Act "cynically and deliberately."

"....equal employment opportunities cannot be built upon quicksand," he told the commission, set up in July, 1965 under the 1964 Civil Rights Act.

"There must be a strong foundation based upon industrial democracy."

Vivian, W. Henderson, an economist who is president of Clark College in Atlanta, attacked the industry's "extremely poor record on Negro employment .... and .... vicious history of outright exclusion of Negroes..

"The only manufacturing industry that parallels the textile industry in terms of Negro exclusion from employment in the south is apparel, an allied industry," Henderson said.

DISCRIMINATION CHARGED

"All white plants are the rule rather than the exception in East Tennessee, southwest Virginia, North and South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama and Mississippi, and this is the case in places where Negroes make up a significant part of the population."

Citing numerous statistics to back up his charges, Henderson said while 56 per cent of southern textile workers come from rural areas, only 3.8 per cent of rural Negroes could find jobs in textiles and 2.2 per cent in apparels.

EEOC data showed only 8.6 per cent of textile workers surveyed in 1966 were Negro, he said, with Negro women "virtually excluded from employment."

Many mills "located in all white areas to avoid the question of Negro employment," he added, noting the plight of non - college bound youths who "are too sophisticated to work in a white person's kitchen, and a textile mill in their small town .... won't have them."

APPEAL FOR EQUAL HIRING

Other speakers appealing for more equal hiring practices cited figures showing 45 per cent of all industrial jobs in both Carolinas are in textiles and ranking North Carolina 50th among all states in average hourly manufacturing wages with South Carolina 47th.

Commission chairman Stephen N. Shulman, said 13,404 complaints of job discrimination were received in the first 18 months of the EEOC's existence, with more concerning North Carolina mills than from any other state. He said 869 complaints came from North Carolina and 250 from South Carolina.

The hearings followed an EEOC report Jan. 3 that noted Negroes were getting more jobs in Carolinas' textile mills than ever before, although mostly unskilled and concentrated in the lowest occupational categories.

Donald G. Hollowell, Atlanta regional director of the EEOC, urged that industries use "aggressive recruitment" of Negroes as "further evidence of employers' willingness to improve the picture in

Hiring of Negroes Slow, Forum Told

Emp-Sou

CHARLOTTE, N.C. (AP)—An official of the Equal Employment Opportunities Commission said Thursday there is evidence of limited progress in the hiring of Negroes in the textile and other Southern industry.

Donald G. Hollowell, Atlanta regional director of the commissions, told a forum that Negro employment in the textile industry in the South is limited "in terms of significant, affirmative action."

Textile industry officials attended the forum, but refused to enter the discussion, saying earlier the announcement of the hearings "implied a punitive approach" and that such "town hall" meetings "can encourage unfounded and irresponsible accusations."

DIRECTOR EXPLAINS

But, Hollowell said, "our efforts here today are in behalf of encouraging and assisting in the kinds of affirmative action that will eliminate the cause of complaints."

He said the affirmative action that would be "further evidence of employers' willingness to improve the employment picture in textiles" is the "agressive recruitment of Negro men and women in the Negro community and placement in all capacities for which they are qualified or qualifiable through training."

Stephen N. Schulman, commission chairman, said the form was called to explore the low ratio of Negro employment, particulary in skilled crafts in the Carolinas textile mills, not to hear complaints.

MORE COMPLAINTS

However, he noted the commission has received more complaints about discrimination in North Carolina than from any other state.

He said in its first 18 months of operation the commission has received 13,404 complaints. He said 869 of these came from North Carolina and 250 from South Carolina.

Schulman said the textile industry provides about 45 per cent of the jobs in manufacturing in North Carolina. He pointed out that forms submitted to the commission by employes show that while non-whites constitute 22.3 per cent of the population of North Carolina and 30.5 per cent in South Carolina, only 8.4 per cent of the textile workers in the two states are Negro.

The American Textile Manufacturers Institute said it would not participate in the forum, although some individual textile firms were represented at the meeting. A commission spokesman said the number of textile firm representatives present couldn't be immediately determined.

Hiring of Negroes By Mills Studied

Emp-EEOC

CHARLOTTE, N.C. (AP)—The matter of Negro employment by textile firms in the South was explored Thursday at a public forum sponsored by the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission (EEOC).

The industry itself, however, was inclined to bypass the two-day meeting, only two of six textile spokesmen originally on the program remained on the agenda as the forum began, They were Leighton C. Dunlap of the Industrial Relations division of Dupont and Marshall Rauch, president of Pyramid Mills.

Stephen N. Schulman, chairman of the commission, told the gathering that it was thought that "a public forum on minority employment in the industry would be helpful. With the goal of realizing employment opportunities that would be developing, a broadly based exchange of information seemed to be in order."

Schulman said the the EEOC, in its first 18 months of operation, beginning in July, 1965, received 13,404 complaints of discrimination in hiring practices, with 869 from North Carolina and 250 from South Carolina.

Schulman said a study of the Carolinas textile industry was prepared for the commission by Dr. Donald Osburn, at the time at North Carolina State University, but now at the University of Missouri. Schulman said the Osburn study showed "A low utilization of Negroes and a concentration in the low-paying jobs."

Schulman said the purpose of the forum was to study the low ratio of Negro employment, particularly in skilled crafts in the Carolinas textile industry, not to hear complaints.

Donald G. Hollowell, Atlanta regional director of the commission, said that Negro employment in the South's textile industry is limited "in terms of significant, affirmative action."

He stressed that efforts at the forum "are in behalf of encouraging and assisting in the kinds of affirmative action that will eliminate the cause of the complaints."

Textile Employment Forum Ends

CHARLOTTE (AP)— Education, church and welfare officials were heard Friday as the two-day forum exploring the matter of Negro employment in Southern Textile Mills concluded.

The textile industry took a limited role in the discussions sponsored by the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, although some mill executives attended.

Watts Hill Jr. of Durham, chairman of the North Carolina Board of Higher Education, said the white community must emphasize speed and support in helping the Negro in North Carolina.

Hill declared, "In the white community the emphasis must be on more speed and support. In the Negro community the emphasis must be on more understanding that an education cannot be given overnight."

He added, "There must be a realization by Negroes that they are not even making full use of educational opportunities which already exist."

Jack Crum, director of Christian social action for the North Carolina Council of Churches, called for efforts to gain equal employment opportunities for all people without regard to race.

He said, "We must cease to be afraid of the Ku Klux Klan."

He asserted, "The fear of many people has been understandable."

Crum said that after he testified in Washington against the Klan a sticker was placed on his office door which read: "The Knights of the Ku Klux Klan is watching you."

He said he laughed at it, but his Negro secretary was frightened by it and he finally removed it from the door.

Clifton M. Craig, commissioner of the North Carolina State Department of Public Welfare reported on the efforts of the agency to aid Negroes.

He said Negroes did not want welfare aid but were put in that position by circumstance and, in many cases, injustice.

Willie Mae McCrimmon, 18-year-old Negro girl, said that two textile mills in her home town in an unidentified Piedmont county discriminated against her. She said that in her town Negroes were not hired by the textile industry, except in janitorial positions.

James Pierce, coordinator for the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Department, stated, "Nowhere except in the textile industry have I seen such frequent reliance upon inflammatory racial propaganda by employers in an industry attempt to maintain control of their employes and the community in which it operates. This was true 10 years ago. It is still true today."

Textile Firms Scored For Shunning Negroes

W. post 1-14-67

CHARLOTTE, N.C., Jan. 13 (AP)—Two days of hearings into employment standards in Southern textile mills ended today following charges the textile mills practice systematic discrimination against Negroes.

The textile industry and its trade organization, the American Textile Manufacturers Institute (ATMI) did not participate in the hearings, conducted by the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, but a number of mill executives were in the audience both days.

One mill representative, Leighton C. Dunlay of the Du Pont Co., listened to the numerous charges of systematic and widespread racial bars against Negroes yesterday, then spoke briefly. He said his firm has actively sought to employ and train young Negroes, starting with high school age.

ATMI Charge

Marshall Rauch, president of Pyramid Mills, another large employer, spoke today. He and Dunlap were among six textile executives originally listed as speakers. The others withdrew after the ATMI charged that the sessions might lead to "unfounded and irresponsible accusations."

Jack Crum, an official of the North Carolina Council of Churches, said "we must cease to be afraid of the Ku Klux Klan," and called for efforts to gain equal employment opportunities for all people without regard to race.

At yesterday's session, Dr. Vivian W. Henderson, an economist and president of Clark College in Atlanta, said the textile industry has "a vicious history of outright exclusion of Negroes from the work force in the various plants." He also charged that textile firms" will build plants in all-white areas or near them to avoid the question of Negro employment."

One EEOC official, Donald D. Hollowell, regional director in Atlanta, said that while the textile industry has increased its hiring of Negroes, "there has been limited affirmative action in areas such as the aggressive recruitment of Negro men and women."

EEOC Chairman Stephen N. Shulman cited a report that indicated "a low utilization of Negroes" and concentration of those that are hired to low-paying jobs.

EEOC Chairman Stephen N. Shulman cited a report that indicated "a low utilization of Negroes" and concentration of those that are hired to low-paying jobs.

Few in Textile Jobs

Shulman said no-whites represent 21.7 per cent of total employment in North Carolina, but only 3.9 per cent of the total are in textile jobs. In South Carolina, Shulman said, nonwhites account for 30 per cent of employed workers, but only 5.2 per cent are in textile jobs.

[In other testimony reported yesterday, NAACP official Kelly Alexander charged that workers at State employment placement offices "contributed to exclusion of Negroes by accepting and filling discriminatory job orders received from the textile industry."

[Shulman announced that the EEOC had received 13,404 complaints since its inception in July 1965. Of these, he said, 869 were filed from North Carolina and 250 from South Carolina. A spokesman for the Textile Workers Union of America said the textile industry, which employs about 45 per cent of all manufacturing workers in the Carolinas, "plays white worker against black worker."]

Carolina Textiles And The Negro Worker

Wilmington Journal 1-28-67

By Bertha C. McNeill

On January 14, I read in The Washington Post of a Public Forum on Minority Employment in the Textile Industry, held in the Public Library of Charlotte, N.C. for two days, January 12-13. Later I read more about it in The Carolinian.

The Forum had been called by the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission (EEOC) in Washington, D. C. Here, thought I, is a story of our Federal Government at work. And it is!

Immediately I called one of the three commissioners, Mr. George Butler and asked for an interview. When I arrived the next morning at one of the desks on the 11th floor, a charming young colored woman asked me to be seated while waiting a few minutes for Mr. Butler, who would join me directly. As I sat there, five other young women intent on errands passed me, two of them also colored. And then Mr. Butler, a well-built man with graying hair cordially greeted me and led the way through the Press Room, to an office where a former Washington editor of the Afro-American president--Mr. Alfred L. Sweeney, Deputy Director of Information, EEOC. At several desks in the Press Room sat both colored and white clerks. Both the well-lighted, thoroughly modern building in structure and decor, and its personnel reflected the new spirit of equality in opportunities in the policy of the Federal government.

Mr. Butler enroute had explained to me that the purpose of EEOC is to receive complaints of discrimination in employment in violation of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. Since July, 1965 the Commission has received 13,404 complaints, 869 from North Carolina and 250 from South Carolina.

Why was North Carolina chosen for the first forum? Mr. Butler gave the same answer as that given at the Charlotte meeting by EEOC Chairman Stephen N. Shulman: "You have to start somewhere and this seemed an immensely logical beginning. There is actual discrimination; a low utilization of Negroes with the concentration of those hired in low-paying jobs. There is an increased awareness of the facilities of EEOC." It is also true that the Carolina dominate the textile industry, accounting for almost 43% of all U. S. textile mill production.

Pleading urgent affairs, Mr. Butler left me with Mr. Sweeney who supplied a folder of clippings from the New York Times, the Afro-American, the Charlotte Observer, etc. From those I found answers to most of my questions.

Who Attended the sessions? Educators, church and social workers, welfare officials, and a few executives of industry. As the Textile Manufacturers' Institute had declared a boycott, protesting an implied punitive approach, and the possible encouragement of unfounded and irresponsible accusations, only two industry executives participated in the announced program. Yet at the close of the meeting, E. Sadler Love, secretary-treasurer of the Institute defended industry's policy on the ground of intense competition as one reason for refusing to train on the job hundreds of thousands who lack adequate training. The textile leaders would prefer a private conference between EEOC and them to explore means to facilitate the full utilization of available manpower.

What was the form actually like? Well, the Mayor of Charlotte in his welcome to the group said that Charlotte is interested not only in economic opportunities for the poor but for more and better opportunities for all its citizens. Then Dr. Donald D. Osburn opened the first session by presenting a study of Negro Employment in the Textile Industries of North and South Carolina. His report, covering 406 textile mills in 73 counties, identified changes that have taken place in the industry, indicated some occurring now or are to be expected, and explained the effect, present and expected, on the Negro worker. Historically, the industry has almost excluded Negroes: Even in 1960 non-whites represented 21.7% in North Carolina's total employment but only 3.9% of textile employment. Negro women represent only 3.7% of all female employment.

In 1951 almost no Negro women were employed; Negroes (men) had unskilled jobs only; no Negroes had white collar or supervisory jobs. Marked changes have occurred; 3/5 of 3013 added to the payroll were Negro, an increase of 54.8% for colored men, but 312.7 for colored women. Of 10,211 managers or officials in North and South Carolina 11 are colored. In North Carolina, of the 103 companies which reported in both 1964 and 1965, more than 3,000 employees were added to the payroll with an employment increase of 55% for our men; 758 women instead of the former 184.

Dr. Osburn suggests certain things that we can do ourselves: Get more formal training. Technological changes may or may not work against the colored worker. The fact remains that the demand for technical personnel will increase. The extent and quality of Negro education must be improved. Third, information concerning jobs must be spread, and willingness to move, to go where the job is must be encouraged.

Were there the expected protests, charges, etc.? Yes, but those who told personal experiences of disappointments or inequities could not identify the place or firm. A number, however, were cited. Besides reports of industry's reliance upon propaganda to control their employees and the community, there was also discussion of intimidation, coercion, and discrimination in the textile industry. An N.A.A.C.P. executive charged the State Employment Security Commission with refusal to send Negroes to certain jobs, and a representative from the U. S. Department of Labor admitted that industry rarely participated in federal training jobs or used the federal apprenticeship programs.

Would you call the Forum a success? In his closing statement, Commissioner Shulman said that the Forum could be a success only "if programs come out of it that mean opportunities for minorities are enhanced."

Case Transfer a TWUA Victory

Stevens Slapped Down by Court

RICHMOND, Va. — The Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals here has transferred the J. P. Stevens Co. case to New York's Second Circuit—a step sought by TWUA—and in effect slapped down the company for maneuvers that skirted the law and made a mockery of due process.

The Fourth Circuit, where the company had filed an appeal from an NLRB order, ruled that a review petition filed by TWUA was timely but that there was "serious question" as to the timeliness of Stevens' filing.

The NLRB order, issued last March, ordered the giant textile firm to restore jobs to 71 workers in Roanoke Rapids, N.C., and Greenville and Rock Hill, S.C., who were fired in an anti-union campaign marked by "flagrant unlawfulness."

The NLRB order was issued at exactly 10 a.m. on March 22. However, the Fourth Circuit found that Stevens filed two appeals before it had actually seen or been served with the board's order. These attempts "to beat the clock"—and make a shambles of due process of the law—took place one and a half hours and three minutes before Stevens was served with the NLRB order.

The NLRB order not only called for the restoration of 71 jobs with back pay and interest, and seniority, but also directed an unusual remedy "to undo the effect of the massive and deliberate unfair labor practices" committed by the company.

In a unanimous decision, the five-member board ordered J. P. Stevens to:

- Mail to each of its workers in each of its North and South Carolina plants —not just those involved in the case— copies of a pledge to comply with the NLRB order and to refrain from any future illegal activities.
- Hold meetings during working time of employees in all plants in the two states and have a company official read the pledge to the assembled workers.
- Give TWUA reasonable access to plant bulletin boards for a one-year period.

The case, a consolidation of many charges filed with the NLRB against the company, arose out of a TWUA campaign, beginning in 1963, to become collective bargaining representatives in 20 Stevens plants in the Roanoke Rapids, Greenville and Rock Hill areas.

38¢ Package Won by TWUA For 700 Workers in Ohio

LOCKLAND, O.—Terms of a new agreement—hailed as the "best ever" negotiated by Local 1495 for the 700 workers at Stearns & Foster here—were ratified at a membership meeting, according to Sol Stetin, regional director.

The three-year contract provides a wage-fringe package estimated at 38¢ an hour.

Wage improvements call for a 4¢ increase on base rates in the first year, 8¢ more in the second and another 8¢ raise in the final year.

Pension plan improvements in the second year mark a significant advance for the workers. At present, only base rates are counted in estimating pension credits — vacation, holiday and bonus pay being excluded. In the future, gross earnings will be the basis for such credits.

Inequity adjustments will provide 10¢ to 20¢ an hour, over and above the general wage increase in the first year, to some 107 workers in the machine shop and garnetting, dye house, bleach and kier-sorting departments.

The new contract also calls for a new Blue Cross 120-day comprehensive family plan to be paid for by the company. Formerly, the workers paid for this protection.

An additional holiday, the day after Thanksgiving, was also written into the pact as well as improvements in the vacation program to provide a third week after 12 years of service instead of 15, and a fourth week after 25 years.

The local also won three days off with pay in the event of death in the immediate family.

The union's negotiating committee included, in addition to Stetin, Carl Johnson, Cincinnati Joint Board manager; Al Backs, president; Walter Coffey, vice president; Remus Smith, secretary; Bill Phillips, chief plant steward, and shop stewards Earl Tankersley and George Meyers.

TWUA Hikes Pay, Fringes in Philly

PHILADELPHIA — Improvements in wages and fringe benefits are now being enjoyed by workers in five plants here as a result of negotiations recently completed by TWUA locals, according to Joseph L. Hueter, joint board manager.

A new two-year contract settlement reached between Local 33 and Atlas Fabrics Corp. provides general wage increases of 7¢ the first year and 8¢ in the second. Other contract gains include an additional paid holiday, a fourth week of vacation after 15 years of service and increases in sick-accident insurance.

Negotiations were carried on by William F. Miller, business agent, and William Berryman, chairman.

At Textile Service Co., Local 208 won general wage increases of 15¢ an hour for machine operators, 10¢ per hour for top rated jobs and 5¢ per hour for the remaining employees in each year of the 22-month agreement. The pact also calls for four weeks' vacation after 20 years of service, an additional paid holiday, improvements in pension plan, effective next year, increases in sickness and accident insurance and a provision for the maintenance of insurance coverage for three years in cases of illness.

General wage increases of 10¢ an hour each year for certain listed workers and 5¢ per hour each year for the others were written into the new two-year agreement reached between Local 208 and Caledonia Dye Works.

Other gains scored for the workers are an additional paid holiday, four weeks' vacation after 20 years, 5¢ per hour for the establishment of a pension plan, with another 5¢ in 1967, and sickness and accident insurance benefits. Negotiations were conducted by Miller and Charles Rhodes, chairman.

A one-year agreement reached with Tackawanna-Hue Wanna Processors will provide general wage increases of 9¢ per hour, an additional paid holiday, four weeks' vacation after 15 years, death-in-the-family allowance of three days and improvements in sickness and accident insurance. Conducting negotiations for Local 208 were Miller and Frank Mariner, chairman.

Pay hikes totaling 20¢ an hour and fringe improvements were obtained by Local 1614 in a new two-year agreement covering some 70 workers at Delaware Ribbon Manufacturers.

The pact calls for 10¢ an hour more in each year, improvements in vacations, sickness and accident benefits and an additional paid holiday.

The union negotiating team included William W. Wilson, business agent, and a committee comprised of Horace McGill, Clare Palumbo and Bette Ford.

Pollock Announces Staff Changes

An appointment designed to take increased advantage of TWUA organizing opportunities was announced at year's end by General President William Pollock.

Paul Swaity, a TWUA vice president and southern director since mid-1964, was moved up by Pollock to the post of administrative assistant to the general president. He will work out of TWUA international headquarters in New York City and will supervise organizing and agitational activities.

Scott M. Hoyman, assistant southern director, has been named to assume Swaity's duties. He will work out of the TWUA office in Charlotte, N.C.

Swaity, a native of Sudbury, Ont., joined TWUA's staff in 1949 after service in the field of labor education. In the succeeding years he has been an organizer, acting Canadian director and TWUA education director. He is now serving his second term as a TWUA vice president, having originally been elected to the union's Executive Council in June of 1964.

Hoyman came to TWUA in 1948 after service with the Packinghouse Workers Organizing Committee and a stint as an economics instructor. His first assignment was as education and publicity director for the Lewiston and Biddeford-Saco joint boards in Maine. He has since served variously as a political action specialist, an organizing crew leader and as assistant to the coordinator of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Department's organizing drive in the Carolinas.

Signing new pact that brought a 49¢ package to the workers of Joseph Davis Plastics Co. are representatives of Arlington (N.J.) Local 696 and management.

TWUA's 1967 program of action to improve the quality of life for our membership in the United States and Canada is described in the union's latest publication, whose title page is shown here. Reprinted below are highlights from the new booklet which is available at joint board and regional offices in U.S. and Canadian editions.

FIVE STRIDES TOWARD A FUTURE OF OPPORTUNITY

B-A

Easing the Shock, Sharing the Fruits of Automation

THE textile industry has not faced up to its responsibility in this age of automation. It has appropriated more than two-thirds of the benefits of higher productivity to which textile workers are entitled. Management in other industries has recognized its obligation to ease the burden of adjustment faced by workers affected by technological change.

The President's Commission on Technology, Automation and Economic Progress has recognized that, in order for automation to be acceptable, it must be consciously directed towards human interests and human needs.

▸ We therefore call upon management in the textile industry to fulfill its responsibilities by not only establishing wages and working conditions befitting a modern and efficient industry, but by adopting measures recommended by the President's Commission. These include improved planning of the introduction of new technology so workers can be absorbed during expansions; allowing reductions in the work force to take place through normal attrition; retraining and upgrading displaced workers to new jobs created by automation; providing time off with pay to allow soon-to-be-displaced workers to look for other jobs, and protecting them against forfeiture of earned rights to pensions, insurance and vacation pay.

▸ To assure the fact that automation will not become a threat to the welfare of textile workers, we call upon the industry to establish a Textile Automation Fund which can be used to finance severance pay and provide the necessary assistance for training, education and relocation of workers displaced by technological change.

▸ We urge Congress to enact the legislation required to implement the recommendations of the President's commission. Automation will cease to be a threat only if jobs are available to all and a decent standard of living is assured to every American family.

▸ We urge all our local unions to negotiate for the establishment of employer-financed automation funds as a mechanism for guaranteeing severance pay and financial assistance to workers displaced by technological change.

Wiping Out Poverty

THE WAR against poverty is a struggle in which TWUA has been enlisted since its inception. Indeed, our union and the labor movement in general was born out of the efforts of working people to raise their living standards above the poverty level.

We urge the Administration to formulate a specific program to implement the promise of full employment as the foundation on which the attack on poverty must be built. Such a program should include:

▸ A national planning agency to engage all segments of the population in setting economic growth targets and devising policies for fulfilling them.

▸ Vastly expanded public works to create jobs and provide urgently-needed public facilities and services, many of which will directly benefit the poor.

▸ Amendment of the National Labor Relations Act to give substance to the right of workers to organize and enable the labor movement to pursue its historic role in waging war on want—organizing the unorganized so they too can enjoy the benefits of collective bargaining.

▶ ▶ ▶ Planting More Seeds for Growth

THE OPPORTUNITY for textile workers to organize looks brighter than at any time in the last two decades. Never in our history has the textile industry been more profitable. Expenditures for new plants and equipment are creating a modern, highly-efficient industry in the U. S. which, in 1965, reaped a fantastic average profit of $1,500 a year for every worker it employed—an all-time high.

Yet, despite their fabulous profits, the unorganized employers remain unresponsive to needs of the workers who made these profits possible. According to the U. S. Bureau of Labor Statistics, textile wages are at the very bottom of the list of our 21 major manufacturing industries. Textile workers are paid $30 a week less than the average for all manufacturing in the U. S. One out of five southern textile workers earns less than the poverty level of $1.50 an hour, or $3,000 a year.

This is the shocking economic and social picture of this industry. Individually and alone, textile workers are weak and helpless. Only by building a strong union can we wipe out the economic and social injustices that have plagued the working men and women of our industry since its inception.

Since our 1964 convention, we have won bargaining rights in approximately 200 plants employing more than 20,000 workers. This is TWUA's greatest advance since 1956. The accelerated progress we are making in the South is an indication that, after years of work, our efforts are beginning to bear fruit. Therefore:

▸ We must step up our efforts to extend organization to non-union plants in every division of our industry in the United States and Canada.

▸ While commending the AFL-CIO, the IUD and the CLC for their help in organization, we must call upon them to intensify and expand their activities.

▸ We must step up our campaign to make every TWUA member conscious of his stake and responsibility in organizing and, by doing so, expand our voluntary organizing programs.

▶ ▶ ▶ ▶ Total Involvement In Political Action

FOR OVER 150 YEARS, American textile workers have been in the forefront of social and economic struggle. Born in the strife and turmoil of the Thirties, our union is fully committed to the necessity of political action to bolster our efforts in the economic field.

We have learned through bitter experience that our hard-won gains at the bargaining table can be nullified or lost by executive order or by legislative action. Very little legislation does not affect, in some degree, the lives of our members and their families. Committed as we are to the proposition that what is good for America is good for labor, we strive unceasingly for those measures that will enrich the lives and enhance the security of all Americans. Much remains to be done. Therefore:

▸ On the local union level, we must maintain and support active and effective COPE-legislative committees, encouraged and backed by our international union.

▸ We must work, wherever possible, within the COPE framework of established state and local central bodies and with other organizations friendly to the aims of organized labor.

▸ We must continue our dollar-drive programs to provide adequate funds for successful political activities.

▶ ▶ ▶ ▶ ▶ More Rewarding Jobs in an Expanding Industry

OUR UNION has played a significant role in the revitalization of the textile industry. The efforts we launched in the Fifties to obtain government assistance bore fruit in the last five years. Included are the One-Price Cotton Law, the International Cotton Textile Agreement, and a government-sponsored Textile and Apparel Technology Center to stimulate basic research leading to the development of new products, processes and markets for textiles.

At the same time, however, imports of textile products have risen sharply and present a major threat to the continued prosperity of the industry. The International Cotton Textile Arrangement has slowed the rate of increase in cotton textile imports, but the influx of wool and man-made fiber products has risen with no letup. Therefore:

▸ We urge the President of the United States to call a conference of principal textile exporting and importing countries for the purpose of negotiating international arrangements for the regulation of trade in textile products, so that domestic markets will not be disrupted by sharp increases in imports.

▸ Above all, however, we call upon management in the textile industry to abandon its outdated, low-wage policies and raise the wages and economic benefits of textile workers to a level commensurate with the standards prevailing in other modern and efficient American industries.

Dear Emory,

Thank you for sending me a copy of your Charlotte, North Carolina speech.

It is a brave, bold and truthful statement. It is good that you made it. We hope that the EEOC takes heed.

Best wishes.

In NLRB Examiner's Report:

AFL-CIO 2/11/67

Union-Busting Firm Assailed on Tactics

Labor law violations of the J. P. Stevens & Co., Inc., have been so persistent and the testimony of management witnesses so untruthful that "it begins to appear doubtful" that any legal remedy can right the wrongs done to Stevens employes, a National Labor Relations Board trial examiner has concluded.

The examiner was Boyd Leedom, formerly NLRB chairman in the Eisenhower Administration. The Stevens firm, second largest textile chain in the nation and an important government contractor, is headed by Robert T. Stevens, secretary of the Army in an Eisenhower-era Cabinet.

In a report upholding union charges of widespread unfair labor practices in Stevens' Carolina plants, Leedom scored management not only for repeatedly violating employe rights but also for setting policies that he said led many company supervisors to lie on the witness stand.

Leedom declared that "an unending series of unfair labor practices by an employer may result in permanently thwarting concerted action by employes." Conceivably, he said, "other arms of government, with a different approach, may have to take action" if Stevens employes' rights are ever to be enforced effectively.

The former chairman also advised another approach—a "signal from the top" and a "complete conversion" of the Stevens way of doing business.

In his findings, Leedom noted that "those who take an oath to tell the truth should do so." As for remedies open to the NLRB, he recommended a "cease and desist" order directing the Stevens chain to halt its threats, intimidation and interference with the rights of employes to take part in union activities; and an order restoring 13 fired workers to their jobs, with backpay to their discharge in 1965 or 1966.

Third Decision

The decision—the third of its kind by an NLRB hearing officer against the big textile chain for interfering with organizing drives by the Textile Workers Union of America—brought demands for a congressional investigation into textile industry conduct. The demands come from TWUA Pres. William Pollock and Dir. of Organization Nicholas Zonarich of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept.

"Nearly four years have passed," Pollock said, "since the proceedings against J. P. Stevens began. Not one of the 101 unlawfully discharged workers has yet been reinstated." He continued:

"Trial Examiner Leedom has found that a conspiracy exists in the southern textile industry that has 'denied thousands of employes . . . such economic benefits as may flow' from the labor act." Like two other examiners, Leedom called for new remedies—a "matter to which the 90th Congress should turn its immediate attention," Pollock declared.

"The fact that Stevens, while cynically indulging itself in mass violations of federal labor law, continues to fatten on millions of dollars of federal contracts is a matter for the Johnson Administration's immediate attention," he said.

"There is no justification whatever for rewarding lawbreakers with federal contracts."

The TWUA began an organizing effort in 1963 at Stevens plants in Roanoke Rapids, N.C., Piedmont, S.C., and Greenville, S.C. Management launched a program of opposition that drew repeated union charges of unfair labor practices. Three examiners have now found the company guilty of unlawful conduct and a fourth charge still awaits a hearing.

The NLRB adopted the examiner's findings in one case, which Stevens has asked the 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals to overturn. In that case, the board ordered management to rehire 71 fired workers. Stevens also has filed exceptions to an examiner's rulings in another case where 17 workers were found to have been unlawfully discharged. The board has not yet acted on the latter.

In the latest case, Leedom found violations by Stevens management so flagrant that he recommended the same extraordinary remedies to protect Stevens employes that were set forth in an earlier case. He advised that Stevens be ordered to grant the union "reasonable access" to all company bulletin boards for a one-year period, and that a "responsible official" be required to read the board's findings to all employes "during working time" and "by departments and by shifts."

Reviewing the testimony of "numerous witnesses who hold positions in middle and lower management echelons of the Stevens firm," Leedom said the facts prove the company "and the persons who share in the responsibility of forming its policy" are "predisposed to defeat the union and the employes . . . even though such opposition involves violating the Labor-Management Relations Act."

Noting that most company witnesses who testified about the firing of union members were "good and decent citizens" with long careers in management for a concern that is well known nationally for many products, Leedom concluded that many of such witnesses lied on the witness stand "without compunction" and in the conviction that it was the accepted and right thing to do.

NLRB reports indicate, Leedom noted, that Stevens is not the only giant of the textile industry in the South that "seems to be rejecting the national labor law."

Benefits of Law Denied

Whether this is due to a coincidence, to a "common understanding" or a fear of jeopardizing its competitive position, Leedom said he does not know, but observed that "whatever the reason, thousands of employes and wide geographic areas are being denied such economic benefits as may flow from the labor act."

Leedom said he is convinced that "substantially all the law violations" of the Stevens firm "must stem from the decision of one man or a very few men at the top of the management structure; and a signal from the top would not only correct the offenses committed against the employes, but would relieve personnel in the lower levels of management of the obviously distasteful duty of participating in an active program" of perverting justice.

Leedom found that in discharging two veteran employes when they became ill, Stevens management acted on a pretext. Such practices, he commented, are "so out of tune with a humane, civilized approach" to industrial relations that "they should shock even those least sensitive to honor, justice and decent treatment."

Such an employer attitude, he said, "suggests retrogression to the unbelievable practices involving child labor" and a review of it "should bring about a complete conversion" in the Stevens way of doing business.

600 Unionists Help URW Win Election

Hawthorne, Calif.—The Rubber Workers emphatically beat back a raid by the unaffiliated Mine Workers' District 50 to retain bargaining rights for 3,881 workers at two Mattel Co. toy plants here and in the City of Industry.

The vote in a National Labor Relations Board election was 1,500 for the URW, 587 for District 50 and 43 for no union.

A major event was a plant-gate demonstration of support for the URW by 600 members of area unions. The demonstration was sponsored jointly by the AFL-CIO Los Angeles-Orange Counties Organizing Committee and the Los Angeles County AFL-CIO under newly elected Exec. Sec. Sigmund Arywitz.

The plant-gate turnout drew broad support from many unions, including a large delegation from the young United Farm Workers Organizing Committee. UFWOC Dir. Cesar Chavez and Assistant Dir. Larry Itliong also helped by meeting with Mattel workers and urging them to stay with the URW, the latter union reported.

URW Pres. Petter Bommarito and Organization Dir. Robert Hill met with the workers and joined the demonstration.

The election campaign was jointly conducted by the staffs of the URW and the two-county organizing committee headed by Dir. William Gilbert.

RECEIVED

March 18, 1967

Honorable Robert W. Kastenmeier
House of Representatives
Washington, D. C.

Dear Congressman Kastenmeier:

Mr. Clark has asked me to reply to your letter of March 6, 1967. I will try to give you specific answers to the questions which you raised in your letter.

As of January 1, 1967, the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission had referred 10 matters to us with recommendations that the complaints contained therein be considered as a basis for a pattern or practice suit under Title VII of the 1964 Civil Rights Act. I say complaints because whether there was one complaint against an employer or a number of complaints against the employer contained in the file which was referred to us, we would handle it as simply one matter.

In connection with these matters, we have filed one pattern and practice suit against the Dillon Supply Company of Raleigh, North Carolina. This suit was filed on February 27, 1967.

We have returned one file involving an employer in North Carolina because we did not think, after considerable investigation, that there was sufficient evidence to support a pattern or practice suit.

Bigger stick to fight job bias

New Administration moves— an anti-discrimination court suit, a compulsory apprenticeship reporting form, support for a tougher law—signal a new drive for employment reform

Equal chance at good jobs for Negroes, other minorities is Administration goal.

The Johnson Administration's two-year-old drive against discrimination in employment is moving into high gear. The Administration has asked Congress for stronger enforcement weapons against offending employers and labor unions, and is wielding its existing weapons with new vigor.

The Administration is certainly aware of widespread public disillusionment with some civil rights goals and with the techniques used by some civil rights groups to achieve them. It has apparently decided to focus on minority employment as an area that needs reform —and where voters will still support reform to a considerable degree.

Current developments are probably the most significant since the 1964 Civil Rights Act established the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission (EEOC) to investigate and process job-discrimination complaints against employers and labor unions.

Deficiencies. The commission was activated officially on July 2, 1965. Since then, it has processed thousands of complaints. But critics have complained that its procedures have been painfully slow, that it lacks real enforcement powers, and that it has been forced to seek conciliatory solutions even where the situation required stronger measures. Civil rights spokesmen, employers, and union officials have tended to agree that the Civil Rights Act's provisions regarding EEOC rendered it ineffective compared with other federal agencies.

Now, however, the Administration has moved aggressively on three fronts:

- President Johnson urged on Congress a "Civil Rights Act of 1967," which contains strengthened procedures for Title VII, the employment section of the 1964 law. The bill would give EEOC authority to issue cease-and-desist orders against employers and unions, and to seek enforcement of those orders in the U. S. Court of Appeals.
- The Justice Dept. filed a Title VII suit against an employer—an industrial supply company in Raleigh, N. C.—charging the company with following a pattern of discrimination in its employment policies. This is the first such suit by the department despite a number of earlier appeals by EEOC for legal action under the "patterns of discrimination" section of the act.
- EEOC drafted the first compulsory reporting forms requiring detailed accounting of minorities in apprenticeship programs along with a full breakdown of union membership by sex and minority group. The questionnaires, which will become effective later this year, apply to all employers involved in apprenticeship programs with 50 or more employees and all unions with 50 or more members.

The new questionnaires are designed to spotlight the admission of Negroes and other minorities to construction union apprenticeship programs—or their exclusion from them. These programs have been a special target of civil rights groups, which feel that entry into the apprenticeship programs is the most effective way to open up craft-union membership—and thereby construction employment—to minorities.

Detailed. The questionnaire will be the subject of a public hearing later this month. Under present plans, EEOC would require separate reports by each trade and craft, including the number of apprentices of each sex and minority group, plus information on the standards and selection procedures of all apprenticeship programs.

In the Justice Dept. action, the suit against Dillon Supply Co. of Raleigh followed two still-unresolved suits against labor unions charged with discrimination. EEOC had forwarded 17 cases involving alleged "patterns of discrimination" by employers. Presumably Justice Dept. attorneys decided that the Dillon case was the strongest.

Non-opportunity. The suit seeks a court order barring racial discrimination by the company. It charges that "Dillon assigns Negroes to menial low-paying jobs without regard to their qualifications and keeps them in such jobs while providing advancement opportunities to others who are no more qualified."

The Dillon case was one of nearly 14,000 complaints processed by EEOC in its first 18 months—a respectable record considering the commission's newness, its undermanned staff, and the morale-weakening effect of resignations by two of its five commissioners.

The commission recommended investigation of 6,009 of the charges brought against employers, unions, and employment agencies, and completed investigation in about half the cases. EEOC found that violations had taken place in 1,550 cases. It achieved compliance with the law by means of conciliation in 244.

Big backlog. The commission's latest accounting shows more than 2,000 charges still pending. Staff members are making an all-out attempt to reduce the backlog, which has doubled in the past six months, according to Stephen Shulman, head of the EEOC.

Yet despite the volume of cases and the limitations of a conciliatory method, the commission lists some clear-cut successes. Among them:

- An aircraft manufacturing company introduced a Negro training program that increased minority hiring almost tenfold and opened up high-level jobs to Negroes for the first time.
- A Southern bakery company set up training programs for 140 Negroes.

EEOC's current projects include an attempt—unsuccessful so far—to eliminate discriminatory practices among companies in the Southern textile industry. It is also attempting to modify discriminatory testing and promotion procedures in a Southern paper manufacturing plant. It has found that among the first 100 companies to sign the voluntary anti-bias pledges of Plans for Progress, four companies had fewer than 1% Negroes among their employees, and 25 companies had fewer than 3%.

Officials say that the number of complaints received by the commission has far exceeded its expectations. They feel that their experience in the field indicates the existence of "widespread tokenism."

Slow progress. EEOC regards the Negroes' job progress to date as fairly limited. While manpower shortages have helped Negroes to move into some construction jobs and some construction unions, this trend has been slowed by lack of training, officials say. They also note the new obstacle created by the shift of business from the city to the suburbs—relatively few Negroes live in suburbs.

The commission is also looking into the kind of employment testing that discriminates against Negroes by requiring educational and other attainments that are not really necessary for the job—and that most disadvantaged minorities lack. EEOC would like to see testing restricted to the measurement of skills actually required for the job.

Over-all, EEOC places greatest reliance on the strengthened enforcement procedures contained in the civil rights measure now being considered by Congress. A similar bill passed the House in the 89th Congress, but died in the Senate as a result of a filibuster.

This year's measure could meet the same fate, particularly with the gain of conservative votes in the 90th Congress. The outcome will depend in large part, however, on how hard the Administration is prepared to fight for the bill.

Taft-Hartley reopens the shipyards

Electricians were back on the job in shipyards in California, Washington, and Oregon this week—but the dispute that led to their strike four months ago is still far from settled.

The electricians—members of locals of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers—went back to 13 yards under a Taft-Hartley Act national emergency strike injunction. Federal factfinders appointed by the President found the wage dispute hopelessly deadlocked and the strike a threat to the Vietnam war effort.

The IBEW locals cite higher skill in demanding a bigger pay increase than those won by other shipyard unions. A union spokesman in San Francisco warned that unless there is "substantial agreement" on IBEW's demands, "in 80 days, we'll be right back where we started—on strike."

Most yards returned quickly to normal or near-normal operations as thousands of laid-off workers returned to jobs. In the Seattle area, however, shipyards reported many workers who had taken temporary jobs elsewhere were coming back slowly. End

There are a few points in the Osbourn report on whcih I would like to ~~comment~~ remark. ~~I/have/~~ At several points he comments, or quotes others, re arding the impact of unions on ~~fairness in employment or~~ on the availability of opportunities for Negroes. ~~I assume that we are concerned primarily with the textile industry. My remarks are aimed at commen~~

We are talking about the textile industry. The unions in that industry are of importance to the inquiry under way. Beacusd of the rather heated relations bewtwen unions and management in the southern textile industry, a certain amount of mis-information and conclusion-jumping sometimes occurs regarding cause and effect. The paper(p.25) raises the question as to whether Negroes might suffer if wages were ~~raised~~ increased by union action. I submit that all employees within the industry would profit -- Negroes and whites alike. The problem is who is in and who is out. In the textile industry, even if the union represented much more of the workers than its less than 10% share, it would not be the union that would be in charge of admissions. ~~The/report/says~~ It is true that if wages go up and if you have discrimination, that the ~~a~~ favored group will get the jobs ~~and the pay~~ if the pay is sufficient for their favored position. But we are presumably talking about being rid of discrimination, and it does not behove us to even imply that poor wages are an advantage to Negroes as against better wages.

Although there are trades that unions exercise a degree of control of job allocations as implied by Osbourn(~~on~~p. 25) this is not the case in the textile industry. If ~~I/I/~~ he is talking only about the application of a seniority system, then the question must go to the fairness of the system -- does it discriminate on the basis of race. It is important to recognize that a seniority system is designed to protect workers' rights -- not racial rights. It is ~~then~~ as important to protect the rights of whites as of Negroes. However, if ~~the~~ a system was designed to treat a group unfairly, then I am sure the law under which this Commission operates can reach that situation.

Osbourn also used the unfortunate term "strike Violence" as a reason why employers were slow to integrate work forces. I fear that this term, to most ears, implies "union" violence. It is true that the textile industry ~~has been~~ has had its share of industrial relations violence. There is a public record on this matter, so it need not be argued here, but it becomes clear upon reading it that ~~Violence is not the sole prerogative of~~ violence may well spring from management or community action. ~~is far from being the sole prerogative of union.~~ I do not believe that the proposition that ~~st~~ violence in industrial relations operated, generally, in a special way to keep Negroes out of the Industry

Later in his paper (p.30) Professor Osburn uncovers the happy truth that when plants in the industry were integrated, that management did not face high labor turnover costs. This is an old truth in the process of ending discrimination in employment which is well understood by the members of this Commission. It is backed by extensive expereince ~~in~~ under state fair employment agencies and federal programs as well as by the experience of companies that have responded to moral persuasion to integrate well in advance of a legal requirement to do so. It is a lesson useful to the industry of this region. Clear, decisive management action, now backed by law, can make full integration in employment work.

Regarding Section II of the Osborn paper,

I am far from certain as to what the impact of automation will be on ~~textile~~ the employment of Negroes and the industry's skilled needs requirements. I favor, as a general proposition, creating machines to do man's work. I think we can expect, however, numerous cases of adversely effecting Negro employment unless companies take affirmative action in terms of training.

I would guess, for instance, that automatic doffing machinery already threatens ~~already~~ the jobs of Negro women hired as doffers in some plants. This could, of course, mean a lack of ~~wrk~~ work and a resultant loss of jobs for a group which the Dr. Wallace report so clearly shows to be especially disadvantaged.

I am not especially sanguine about leaving to an industry the sole power of determining fairness in employment, for whites or ~~and~~ Negroes, when faced with the impact of automation. And we are talking of an industry where the degree of unionization -- a potential balance to management's unilateral decision making -- is woefully small. I do not raise this issue because I think the Commission should invade the thorny field of industrial relations, but because, in all candor, it should be especially alert to the rights of minority workers where there are few other checks on managerial discretion.

Text

Many companies have historically assumed as an operating cost, the cost of training programs. I am sure that the Textile industry has not differed markedly from othe industries in this regard. Today there are unequaled opportunities for federal and state governmental assistance as well as aid from private resources in providing training programs. I trust that there will be an industry initiative to utilize all of these resources and that they will be brought to bear in a very special way on the problems of securing quality employment for Negro men and women.

In closing, I would like to raise a caution for the Commission's consideration. It is a reminder to exercise the greatest care as it apporaches the textile industry, with its demand for less expensive labor, to not contribute to again locking-in Negroes into the region's lowest paid jobs. I would suggest here only two steps that may help avoid such an outcome. One, already made, is to be the advisor and prod to see to it that Negroes have full opportunity to enter jobs at all levels and that responsible parties take affirmative action to prepare Negroes for such jobs. Secondly, the moral influence, technical assistance, and legal authority of this Commission should be used with the higher paid industries of the Carolinas to see that they provide sufficient opportunities for Negroes, too. It is an essential ingredient to our long range progress in employment opportunity, and as a region of developing hope, that Negro workers have on a par with whites meaningful alternatives in employment.

(Note: The following title amends Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 covering discrimination in employment to give the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission new authority to issue cease and desist orders and to petition for court enforcement of its orders.)

TITLE III

SEC. 301. Section 706 of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 (78 Stat. 259; 42 U.S.C. 2000e-5) is amended to read as follows:

"(a) The Commission is empowered, as hereinafter provided, to prevent any person from engaging in any unlawful employment practice as set forth in sections 703 or 704 of this title.

"(b) Whenever it is charged by a person claiming to be aggrieved, or a charge has been filed by a member of the Commission where he has reasonable cause to believe a violation of this title has occurred, that an employer, employment agency, or labor organization has engaged in an unlawful employment practice, the Commission shall notify such employer, employment agency, or labor organization (hereinafter referred to as the 'respondent') of such charge and shall make an investigation thereof. Charges shall be in writing and shall contain such information and be in such form as the Commission requires. Charges shall not be made public by the Commission. If the Commission determines after such investigation that there is reasonable cause to believe that the charge is true, the Commission shall endeavor to eliminate any such alleged unlawful employment practice by informal methods of conference, conciliation, and persuasion. Nothing said or done during and as a part of such informal endeavors may be made public by the Commission or used as evidence in a subsequent proceeding without the written consent of the persons concerned. Any officer or employee of the Commission who shall make public in any manner whatever any information in violation of this subsection shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined not more than $1,000 or imprisoned not more one year.

"(c) In the case of an alleged unlawful employment practice occurring in a State, or political subdivision of a State, which has a State or local law prohibiting the unlawful employment practice alleged and establishing or authorizing a State or local authority to grant or seek relief from such practice or to institute criminal proceedings with respect thereto upon receiving notice thereof, no charge may be filed under subsection (b) by the person aggrieved before the expiration of sixty days after proceedings have been commenced under the State or local law, provided that such sixty-day period shall be extended to one hundred and twenty days during the first year after the effective date of such State or local law. If any requirement for the commencement of such proceedings is imposed by a State or local authority other than a requirement of the filing of a written and signed statement of the facts upon which the proceeding is based, the proceeding shall be deemed to have been commenced for the purposes of this subsection at the time such statement is sent by registered mail to the appropriate State or local authority.

"(d) In the case of any charge filed by a member of the Commission alleging an unlawful employment practice occurring in a State or political subdivision of a State which has a State or local law prohibiting the practice alleged and establishing or authorizing a State or local authority to grant or seek relief from such practice or to institute criminal proceedings with respect thereto upon receiving notice thereof the Commission shall, before taking any action with respect to such charge, notify the appropriate State or local officials and, upon request, afford them a reasonable time, but not less than sixty days (provided that such sixty-day period shall be extended to one hundred and twenty days during the first year after the effective day of such State or local law), unless a shorter period is requested, to act under such State or local law to remedy the practice alleged.

"(e) A charge under subsection (b) shall be filed within one hundred and eighty days after the alleged unlawful employment practice occurred, except that in the case of an unlawful employment practice with respect to which the person aggrieved has followed the procedure set out in subsection (c), such charge shall be filed by the person aggrieved within two hundred and ten days after the alleged unlawful employment practice occurred, or within thirty days after receiving notice that the State or local agency has terminated the proceedings under the State or local law, whichever is earlier, and a copy of such charge shall be filed by the Commission with the State or local agency.

"(f) If the Commission determines after attempting to secure voluntary compliance under subsection (b) that further efforts are unwarranted, which determination shall not be reviewable in any court, the Commission shall issue and cause to be served upon the respondent a complaint stating the facts upon which the allegation of the unlawful employment practice is based, together with a notice of hearing before the Commission, or a member or agent thereof. Related proceedings may be consolidated for hearing.

"(g) A respondent may file an answer to the complaint against him and with the leave of the Commission, which shall be granted whenever it is reasonable and fair to do so, may amend his answer at any time. Respondents shall be parties and may appear at any stage of the proceedings, with or without counsel. Persons aggrieved may submit briefs or other written submissions on each occasion when such are permitted or directed, may be present to observe at any stage of the proceedings, with or without counsel, and may appeal or petition for review to the same extent as a party, but without the permission of the Commission persons aggrieved may not otherwise participate in the proceedings. The Commission may grant such other persons a right to intervene as respondents or persons aggrieved or to file briefs or make oral arguments as amicus curiae or for other purposes, as it considers appropriate. All testimony shall be taken under oath and shall be reduced to writing.

"(h) If the Commission finds that the respondent has engaged in an unlawful employment practice, the Commission shall state its findings of fact and shall issue and cause to be served on the respondent and the person or persons aggrieved by such unlawful employment practice an order requiring the respondent to cease and desist from such unlawful employment practice and to take such affirmative action, including reinstatement or hiring of employees, with or without backpay (payable by the employer, employment agency, or labor organization, as the case may be, responsible for the unlawful employment practice), as will effectuate the policies of this title: Provided, That interim earnings or amounts earnable with reasonable diligence by the aggrieved person or persons shall operate to reduce the backpay otherwise allowable. Such order may further require such respondent to make reports from time to time showing the extent to which he has complied with the order. If the Commission finds that the respondent has not engaged in any unlawful employment practice, the Commission shall state its findings of fact and shall issue and cause to be served on the respondent and the person or persons alleged in the complaint to be aggrieved an order dismissing the complaint.

"(i) After a complaint has been issued and until the record has been filed in court as hereinafter provided, the proceeding may at any time be ended by agreement between the Commission and the respondent for the elimination of the alleged unlawful employment practice, approved by the Commission, and the Commission may at any time, upon reasonable notice, modify or set aside, in whole or in part, any finding or order made or issued by it.

"(j) Findings of fact and orders made or issued under subsections (h) or (i) of this section shall be determined on the record.

"(k) The Commission may petition any United States court of appeals wherein the unlawful employment practice occurred, or wherein the respondent resides or transacts business, for enforcement of its order. The Commission shall, within 30 days after filing such petition, file in the court of appeals certified copies of the record in the proceedings before the Commission and the findings and order of the Commission. Upon timely application, the court may permit any interested person to intervene in the proceeding. Upon such filing, the court shall conduct further proceedings in conformity with sections 701-706 of title 5, United States Code, and shall cause notice thereof to be served upon the respondent and thereupon shall have jurisdiction of the proceeding and shall have power to grant such temporary relief, restraining order, or other order as it deems just and proper and to make and enter upon the record a decree enforcing, modifying and enforcing as so modified, or setting aside in whole or in part the order of the Commission. No objection that has not been urged before the Commission, its member, or agent shall be considered by the court, unless the failure or neglect to urge such objection shall be excused because of extraordinary circumstances. The findings of the Commission with respect to questions of fact if supported by substantial evidence shall be conclusive. If either party shall apply to the court for leave to adduce additional evidence and shall show to the satisfaction of the court that such additional evidence is material and that there were reasonable grounds for the failure to adduce such evidence in the hearing before the Commission, its member, or agent, the court may order such additional evidence to be taken before the Commission, its member, or agent, and to be made a part of the record. The Commission may modify its findings as to the facts, or make new findings, by reason of additional evidence so taken, and it shall file with the reviewing court such modified or new findings, which the parties waived oral argument; and by agreement have dispensed with the filing of briefs.

Upon the entire record in the case, and from my observation of the witnesses, I make the findings of fact and conclusions of law hereinafter set forth, and recommend that Respondent be adjudged in violation of the Act in the particulars hereinafter specified; also that the second or rerun election be set aside and a third election be held in the Dunean plant.

Findings of Fact and Conclusions of Law

There is no dispute that J. P. Stevens & Co., Inc., Respondent herein, is an "employer," and that the Textile Workers of America, AFL-CIO, is a "labor organization," within the meaning of the Labor Management Relations Act; and I find that the allegations of paragraphs 2 and 3 of the complaint respecting the nature, conduct and volume of the business of Respondent, all admitted by Respondent in its answer, are true and correct and that Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of the Act; also that the Textile Workers Union of America, AFL-CIO, is a labor organization, a matter also admitted by Respondent.

Observations on Credibility

Because of the somewhat unusual number of witnesses whose testimony is discredited in this case, and because of the background, that is, the decisions in the two preceding cases involving the same Employer and Union as are here involved, I deem not only pertinent but desirable this general statement concerning the credibility findings hereinafter made.

As will appear, where there has been a direct conflict in testimony of witnesses called by the Respondent and those put on the stand by the General Counsel, I have in the main credited the testimony adduced by the General Counsel. The resolution of credibility conflicts in judicial and quasi judicial proceedings is always unpleasant, and often a very difficult task. Objective as the finder of the facts seeks to be, and, however carefully he tries to find out what really happened, still he is not divinely ordained to pronounce the truth. His findings only "stand in" for the facts in the imperfect administrative and judicial processes.

These views on credibility resolution are set forth, in part because many of the findings hereafter made reject the testimony of numerous witnesses who hold positions in middle and lower management echelons of the Respondent Employer. I am charged with, and do take notice of the previous cases, which legally establish at this point that Respondent, and the persons who share in the responsibility of forming its policy in dealing with the Union here involved, are predisposed to defeat the Union and the employees, in their right to act in concert respecting wages, hours, and working conditions, even though such opposition involves violating the Labor Management Relations Act. Apart however from this unfavorable background respecting Respondent's attitude toward the rights of employees as fixed by Federal enactment, I reject the testimony of Respondent's witnesses, hereinafter not credited, on the basis of my own best judgment, independently formed from the demeanor of all the witnesses, and after weighing the consistency and believability of the testimony for and against Respondent; and such resolution has not been easy. For most of the men who took the stand in Respondent's behalf (and testified one after the other that various discharges involved herein were for reasons that do not violate the Act) appeared to me in all respects (excepting the unbelievable position they took as to such discharges) to be good and decent citizens with long and favorable careers in management for a concern that is well known nationally for many products it manufactures. Such witnesses, who took an oath to tell the truth, offered evidence not accepted here, which if colored or untrue, nevertheless was offered seemingly without compunction. How they could do this, if they did, is a question that had to be resolved in deciding the issues in this case; but the question has broader implications.

The reports of the NLRB indicate that Respondent is not the only giant in the textile industry, doing substantial business in the so called "South," that seems to be rejecting the national labor policy. It is not generally known whether this position is due to a coincidence, to a common understanding, or to a fear on the part of each that if it should break the barrier into enlightened employee policy, it would jeopardize its competitive position. Whatever the reason, thousands of employees and wide geographic areas are being denied such economic benefits as may flow from the LMRA.

It is well known to all persons having more than a casual interest in labor-management relations within the country, that these areas (including the locations of the plants here involved) reject in greater or lesser degree, and in ways less subtle than in some other parts of the nation, the concept of collective bargaining. This knowledge is so common that not even those who are the judges in labor cases need remain ignorant of the fact. In conformity with such common knowledge, I have the inescapable but independently reached, conviction, erroneous as it may be, from having heard innumerable witnesses at the trial, and having carefully digested and reviewed their testimony from the typewritten transcript, that many of the witnesses called by Respondent testified as they did pursuant to a policy, made at a higher level of management than theirs, to defeat this Union's organizational effort at the cost, if necessary, of committing unfair labor practices and then denying the unlawful acts in the process.

If I am right in the foregoing conclusion, and of course it is my best judgment that I am right based on all that I have seen and heard in the conduct of the hearing, then the responsibility of each person on the firing line, who was called upon to act as a witness in the unlawful denial of the employees' rights, is freed to a greater or lesser degree of individual guilt feeling, because the policy and the project he serves extends beyond himself, becomes not only plantwide, but companywide, industrywide, and large enough in some instances to encompass whole communities. In the process something in the nature of a crusade seems to develop in which means toward the end, that would be wholly rejected by the individual if the affair were entirely his own, are not only accepted and utilized but assume certain aspects of virtue in that the actors seek to overcome a common enemy, an evil that here takes on the form and name of unionism. And so either believing or rationalizing that their position is just, they engage in the common error of fighting real or pretended "evil" with evil. A dual standard of conduct - that is one standard for the individual, and another for an organized effort- has been recognized and applied throughout the history of mankind. War, out of which national heroes are born and are greatly honored by us all, is the prime example.

If such dual standard of morality played any part in the denial of employees' rights in this case, as I believe it did, then of course it is the duty of a public official to right the wrong insofar as his function permits; and that is what I here seek to do, greatly deploring what seemed to me to be a flagrant breach by many of the promise made under oath to tell the truth.

The foregoing discussion finds its justification in the rule that requires not only findings and conclusions in a Trial Examiner's decision, but also his reasons or basis therefor. The decision in this case depends almost entirely on a resolution of credibility conflicts in the evidence, and the parties are entitled under the rule to know, and to understand the thought processes if possible, that undergird the resolution of such conflicts. And underlying the discussion is a faint hope that something here written might tend to produce a new appraisal in some quarters of the methods used in opposing employees' rights to organize. For if, as I believe and find, there has been a deliberate intention on the part of some to bring about a result in this case not based on truth, such persons will not only add substantially to the measure of human misery if they succeed, but more importantly, perhaps, they have added their very considerable weight to the persistent and pervasive disregard of the rule of law, that now afflicts our society. This case and the two preceeding it in this labor conflict, and many similar cases as well, could serve as an incentive for a sober reappraisal of the importance of the simple principle that those who take an oath to tell the truth should do so. There is a wide area of lawful opposition open to employers for resistance to their employees' efforts to organize. To go beyond the lawful limits wilfully is wholly inexcusable.

The discussion under the heading Observations on Credibility, however, serves in the main as an important factor in the rejection of the testimony adduced on behalf of Respondent, where such testimony is not credited.

I deal with the various allegations of discriminatory action affecting employment in the order that evidence was introduced as to the several cases.

The Dunean Plant

Aubrey Kent, 8(a)(3), and 8(a)(4)

Aubrey Kent went to work at the Dunean plant in June, 1945 and was discharged August 11, 1965. When discharged he was a loom fixer and held such position for about 8 years.

It is conceded by Respondent, and the evidence clearly discloses, that Kent had been active in support of the Union's effort to organize the plant, and had testified in Board proceedings, against the interest of Respondent, prior to his discharge; and that Respondent had knowledge of both his union activity and his participation in the hearings. As a union supporter Kent had signed a card early in the Union's organization campaign, his name appeared on union leaflets and his activity increased and became open after he first testified in a Board hearing. He became a member of the Union's organizing committee. He was an observer for the Union in the first election. He wore a union button in the plant and during workbreaks encouraged employees to join the Union and obtained signatures from some on union membership cards. He helped pass out union leaflets both mornings and evenings, before and after work.

The evidence discloses and I find that during the course of his employment of about 20 years, Kent had worked steadily up the line of progression in jobs and had been commended numerous times by supervisory personnel on the quality of his work.

election therefore invalid. For these reasons I recommend that the election be set aside and that another election be held to determine the desires of the employees in the appropriate unit respecting their representation for collective bargaining purposes by the Union.

Copies of the newspaper, The Observer, were admitted in evidence pursuant to the Regional Director's reference to the Trial Examiner of the question whether its circulation among Respondent's employees constituted a valid objection to the election. In the Regional Director's order he said of The Observer, ". . .standing along, /the material in it/ does not warrant the setting aside of the election." And of the evidence he developed in his investigation of the objections he said it did not compel the conclusion that Respondent furnished names and addresses or subscribed for the publication in its employees' behalf. He recognized that in the context of other objectionable conduct, and even though its circulation might be through the intervention of a third party, such use of the newspaper might constitute objectionable conduct.

Even though the circumstances of employees receiving The Observer without subscribing for it, as several testified, and even though its anti-union material is often inflammatory, I am reluctant to rely on it in any degree as grounds for setting aside the election, and do not do so. I am not completely persuaded that the circulation of the newspaper goes beyond the limits of free speech allowed an employer by the Board in his resistance to the organization of the employees.

The Remedy

Having found that Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices I shall recommend that it cease and desist therefrom and that it take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act in the particulars set forth in the Recommended Order. For the reasons which are stated in Consolidated Industries, Inc., 108 NLRB 60, 61, and cases there cited, I shall recommend a broad cease and desist order. Where the recommendation is to make an employee whole for any loss of earnings suffered as a result of discharge or other discriminatory action, the sum to be paid him shall be computed in accordance with the formula stated in F. W. Woolworth Company, 90 NLRB 289, with interest thereon at 6 percent per annum, as provided in Isis Plumbing & Heating Co., 138 NLRB 716.

It begins to appear doubtful if any remedy legitimately devised within the frame work of the Labor Management Relations Act will right the wrongs of an employer who persists in violations in the way the Respondent has persisted. I take notice that since this proceeding began a fourth complaint has been filed against Respondent. An unending series of unfair labor practices by an employer may result in permanently thwarting concerted action by employees. Conceivably other arms of government, with a different approach, may have to take action if this Respondent's employees' rights are ever effectively enforced. Apparently the Board recognizes this difficulty, and in the first Stevens case applied unusual remedies. I provide such remedies in this case.

RECOMMENDED ORDER

Upon the basis of the above findings of fact and conclusions of law, and upon the entire record in the case, it is recommended that J. P. Stevens & Co., Inc., its officers, agents, successors and assigns shall:

Labor Drives to Close The South's Open Shop

VERA RONY

"WHAT we have just heard," said the angry congressman from Florida, "is a diatribe against the South, a blanket indictment of Southern employers, and an inflammatory racist statement that is beneath the dignity of this committee."

The speaker was Republican Representative Edward J. Gurney, and the occasion was a September hearing by the House Committee on Education and Labor to determine if it should conduct an investigation of the national labor laws and their administration by the National Labor Relations Board. Significantly, his remark was directed not at an aggressive union witness but at the committee's own chief investigator, Odell Clark. On the basis of an extensive fact-gathering tour, Clark had reported that Southern textile workers—Negroes more than whites—were being harassed, intimidated, and threatened with physical violence by employers determined to thwart their efforts to organize.

Clark's charge, supported by subsequent testimony from union officials, accomplished more than just incurring Gurney's wrath. Its immediate effect was to focus public attention on a relentless multimillion-dollar struggle with as many historic implications for the South as the first Freedom Ride or the march from Selma to Montgomery. Perhaps more, since this campaign concerns black and white, all those of both sexes who work in the mills, factories, stores, and offices in the eleven states of the old Confederacy.

Fired After Fifty Years

Although this is largely a bloodless conflict, it has had its casualties, among them Jess F. Cudd, who was fired in January, 1964, from his job as a doffer for J. P. Stevens & Co., Inc., in Whitmire, South Carolina. When Cudd appeared before the NLRB, the sixty-three-year-old worker told the trial examiner that he had gone to work for Stevens in 1913.

Q. During your fifty years down there, Mr. Cudd, before the union came in, had you ever been written up [reprimanded] for your work?

A. Not as I know of.

Q. Had there ever been any complaint about your work?

A. No, sir.

Cudd, the NLRB concluded, was fired because of his enthusiasm for the Industrial Union Department, AFL-CIO, an aggregate of fifty-six unions, about twenty of which two years ago launched a series of organizing campaigns against Southern industries, including the first labor challenge in a decade of a major textile chain—J. P. Stevens, the second largest producer in the largest open-shop industry in the country.

Beginning in 1955, the Textile Workers Union of America attempted to organize the world's biggest textile complex, Burlington Industries, Inc. According to the man who headed the union operation, Lawrence Rogin, now the AFL-CIO's education director, the Burlington effort was terminated by the union after a bitter campaign marred by racial propaganda, anti-union publicity, and, most telling, large-scale dismissals of workers who, Rogin insists, were pro-union.

Hence, the IUD rejected Burlington as its primary textile target in 1963, and decided to concentrate on Stevens, a company geographically centralized, typical of the industry in terms of wages and working conditions, and financially capable of making dramatic improvements in both. According to Fortune, which joined in "the jaunty, brassy celebration" of the firm's 150th birthday in 1963: "In the whole history of U.S. business there has never been anything quite like Stevens. Its uniqueness goes beyond being the world's oldest diversified textile company. Over the century and a half, the management of the firm has passed from father to son in a direct line. . . . Among some one hundred families who started woolen mills in the U.S. in the years 1800 to 1815, the Stevenses are the sole survivors. And generation after generation of Stevenses has shown industry how to survive and prosper by sinuously working around obstacles, by unsentimentally jettisoning outmoded traditions. . . ."

The headquarters of the Stevens empire takes up sixteen stories of a building in New York's garment district. Presiding over its more than sixty mills and some 40,000 workers is Robert T. Stevens, Secretary of the Army early in the Eisenhower administration. He was described in Fortune as "a gentlemanly, reserved fellow" whose bitter, bruising experiences in the Army-McCarthy hearings taught him, in his own words, something about "human relations." Among the humans with whom the former Army Secretary has relations, albeit distant, are the 3,000 workers in the five Stevens mills in Roanoke Rapids, a serene, bucolic town (pop. 16,171) in eastern North Carolina.

An Appalling Callousness

On a chilly day last February, I followed one of the meandering roads leading out of Roanoke Rapids to a primitive concrete-block building to meet Jim Pierce, the co-ordinator of the IUD and Textile Workers organizing campaign in the Southeast. Included among Pierce's impressive credentials is the chairmanship of the Texas AFL-CIO's civil-rights committee in 1957, when it issued a pioneering manifesto condemning segregationist unions at a time when the national federation was approaching the issue cautiously.

"This campaign to organize Stevens is a new approach by a new union setup determined to create a new South," Pierce said. "Instead of one union, like the Textile Workers, going in to tackle one plant—and practically inviting the company to shut that plant down, as in the well-known Darlington case in 1956—the IUD is tackling twenty-five of Stevens's forty-odd plants in the Carolinas. As soon as a plant is ready for an election, we send in a group of organizers, each one with a different background and approach, so that we can be sure of getting our message across to every person in the mill—young or old, man or woman, black or white. And speaking of color, our operation is completely integrated—an integrated staff, integrated committees, and integrated meetings. We also have integrated contracts. Promotion according to seniority and ability, period."

Was the IUD sure that it could win with this approach? Were the people of Roanoke Rapids ready for it? Scott Hoyman, a Textile Union veteran who was directing the Roanoke Rapids operation, said grimly: "We're not worried about our approach; we've been winning seventy per cent of our elections in the South, which is better than the national average. What we're worried about is Stevens's approach." Hoyman handed me a complaint issued by the NLRB against Stevens early in 1964, citing 153 instances of threats, spying, and intimidation, together with the discharge of fifty-three employees for union activity, twenty of them in Roanoke Rapids.

The NLRB was so concerned about the company's tactics that it appealed to the Federal District Court in Greenville for an injunction against further illegal reprisals by Stevens. Choosing an unusual procedure, Judge Robert Martin announced that he would dispense with witnesses and hear the case on the basis of affidavits alone. He would not change his mind even after the union produced NLRB testimony in which company witnesses flatly contradicted their affidavits, confessing that they had no idea what they had sworn to; the company had simply prepared the statements and said, "Sign here." After a six months' delay, Martin denied the injunction. His decision was ultimately upheld by the Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals.

"During the year that the NLRB was investigating, holding hearings, and trying to get injunctions," Hoyman told me, "the company kept firing people, including some who had testified for the NLRB under subpoena. Last October, the board issued another complaint with fifty-four more unfair labor practices and eighteen more union people fired. We'll start hearings on those pretty soon, but what good does that do the people in the mill? They're scared stiff."

Judging from a complaint brief issued by the NLRB's regional office in Winston-Salem, North Carolina, this is hardly surprising: "The union began its campaign . . . about June, 1963, and shortly thereafter [Stevens] began its planned program of extensive... interrogations, threats, and harassment and massive discharge of known union adherents. . . . Respondent showed its utter contempt for Labor Board processes. . . . In certain cases, respondent's callousness in ridding itself of union adherents was appalling."

During the hectic weeks preceding the March union election in the five Roanoke Rapids mills, the eighteen IUD organizers on loan from their parent unions met frequently in the Rebel Restaurant of the Dixie Motel to compare notes and occasionally receive intelligence reports from millworkers.

"You should have been here back in '63, when I first set up this campaign," said Mrs. Virginia Keyser, who handled the Roanoke operation by herself for the first eight months. "People were interested, they signed cards, they'd talk to you. We had a good committee going in the mill, and they did the organizing, which is the way it ought to be. But after the campaign really got rollin' and workers were comin' to union meetings, the company began to knock our people off. Now there's nothin' going for us in the mill. The people are even afraid to talk to us in their own homes."

"Even finding their homes is a problem," added organizer Geneva Barnett. "Most of the mill people have no phones, and they move all the time. But if you want to see what it's like, let's go." After some fruitless doorbell ringing, we finally located Mrs. M. J. But her hospitable smile didn't last beyond the word "union." "Oh, I'm going to vote for y'all—but I can't ask you in. You know how things are now. They'd find out."

We rode around in circles for a while, before locating the home of Mrs. J. T., a trim white cottage in front of which was a motorboat on a trailer. The intelligent-looking, self-contained young woman who appeared at the door was succinct: "Thank you, I am not interested."

"Well, you're not getting a very positive picture of our chances, are you?" Mrs. Barnett later told me. "But I'll bet my bottom dollar she's in data processing. The people there think they're a different class from the other workers, and they'd rather die than have anything to do with them."

Mrs. Barnett's hunt-and-peck problem was nothing compared with the swing-shift odyssey of organizer J. D. "Preacher" Goad, who was pursuing a prospect suggested by local Negro leader Jettie Purnell. The mill-village mentality may not have changed much since the advent of the automobile, but its ecology certainly has. Millworkers can live fifteen or twenty miles out of town, and at night, on casually marked country roads, they might as well live on Mars.

A lonely light turned out to be a country store out of Erskine Caldwell; the weary proprietor directed us on our way. "Good, his car is here," Goad whispered. He knocked on the door; a woman's voice answered faintly.

"Is this Mrs. Smith?"

"Ye-e-e-ss."

"Is Mr. Smith here?" (Long pause)

"What do you want?"

"Mr. Jettie Purnell sent me. I'd like to talk to him."

"Jettie sent you? What do you wanna talk about?"

"I'd like to talk to Mr. Smith about the union." (Another pause)

"Ah'm sorry—Mr. Smith ain't here."

"Do you know when he'll be back? I'll be glad to come back later or tomorrow."

"I got no idea when he'll be back."

About a half an hour later, we located Mr. E. B., a burly Negro who was standing outside his dilapidated shack working on his car engine. Another man was holding a flashlight. Goad again mentioned Purnell's name. Would Mr. B. consider signing a union card? He nodded his head, yes. Then, with pen and card in hand, Mr. B. hesitated. He looked at Goad, he looked at his friend leaning on a fender. "Ah jes' doan know," he said softly. Did he have any questions about the union, was there anything Goad could tell him? "No, no—it's jest—" he made an uncomfortable, worried motion. "Ah better not—ah better not," he muttered, thrusting the pen and card back at Goad. "O.K.," said the Preacher with a sigh. "I'll come back again next week."

At 6 A.M. the next day, at a leaflet distribution in front of the mill, I met Mrs. Shirley Hobbs, who, after attending some union meetings, had been fired for counting one napkin short in one bundle and three in another bundle out of the 1,060 napkins she inspected every hour. Her foreman told her she was costing the company money. When she found out that two other girls who had also miscounted would not be fired, she slapped the foreman so hard that, in his own words, "I was carrying her fingerprints for hours."

I was curious about the process that had led Mrs. Hobbs, a mother of four, into the union movement. "During the war, Jarman, my husband, was stationed in California, and I worked in a store that had a union, so I know the difference. That's why it's so hard for me to understand the people around here. They see the conditions at the paper mill, where they've got a union—a minimum of $2.15 an hour and a top over $4. At Stevens, a loom fixer, who gets paid the most, makes about $2.38, and there are only four hundred of them. Everybody else makes between $1.38 and $1.75, and that's including the two five per cent raises the company gave after the union campaign started. Jarman was making $1.40. You can't raise four kids on $56 a week, so I was back doing the same thing my mother did—working in the mill. That's the way you're supposed to do around here; work in the mill just like your parents, get paid just about like your parents, and don't complain"—she gave me a little one-sided grin "—just like your parents."

While the textile industry experienced some difficult times in the not so distant past, there is little question about its current ability to pay standard wages. "For the third consecutive year, record sales were achieved," according to the 1964 annual Stevens stockholders' report, "reaching $684,660,000 compared with $609,408,000 in 1963. . . . As in the case of sales, your Company's net income has more than doubled in the past ten years."

Bigger Than the Government

Textile wages, of course, are only one way of gauging the working conditions in the mills. "I've been working for Stevens for over forty years," Mrs. R. G. told me. "My daddy helped put the machinery into the Patterson mill in 1908. But it was different in those days. We used to start the spinning, then go out and play jack rock or tag—then we'd go back and work some more. But they don't have any heart for you no more in the mill. You got to rush around all day in that heat and dampness so you'll make your production. It got so bad I took to puttin' a towel around my neck so the sweat wouldn't pour all the way down. And my glasses cloudin' over and I cain't hardly stop to wipe 'em dry."

I asked her husband if many of the workers felt as they did, and if this meant they would vote union. "Oh, lots of 'em would like to better theirself," said Mr. G. "You hear 'em whisperin' here and there, around the water cooler. They're thinkin' about the union all right. But ah don't know. The overseers and all are always hintin' around about how Stevens is a big company and they could just close these here plants like that one they're always showin' the picture of that went union. And you cain't tell 'em nothin' about the government holdin' no secret election. Din't the union say it was against the law for the company to fire those people who worked for the union—and din't the company go and fire 'em anyway? Folks around here ain't so sure what the government's goin' to do, but they're mighty sure what Stevens is goin' to do."

On March 11, the election was held at Roanoke Rapids; the union lost by 498 votes out of 2,870 validated ballots. Within three months the Textile Workers Union was also defeated in two other mills in Greenville and Piedmont, South Carolina. As Mr. G. had predicted, several union election observers were fired after the ballots were counted. According to Pierce's testimony before the House committee, Stevens has fired 250 workers for union activity since the start of the IUD drive. [In a letter to the committee, the company complained that it had not been given an adequate opportunity to present its case, labeled the union charges "distorted and false," and stressed its "constant efforts" to provide its employees with "steady jobs, good working conditions, and desirable wages and benefits, on a continually rising basis."] Yet, since the union's initial complaint to the NLRB in August, 1963, not a single dischargee has been reinstated or one unfair labor practice prohibited.

The explanation lies in "the built-in delay factors of Labor Board processes and the problems and weaknesses of the present Labor Relations Act," said Nick Zonarich, the IUD's organizational director. To evaluate the first, one has only to trace the progress of the union's 1963 charges against Stevens through the NLRB labyrinth: The board's regional office investigated, found the company guilty on most counts, and issued a consolidated complaint in January, 1964. Stevens denied guilt and the NLRB trial examiner scheduled hearings in March. The sixty hearing days stretched through September, and the examiner's evaluation of the 12,000-page transcript took ten months. His decision, published this July, has been appealed by Stevens to the full board, which in this case will require at least three or four more months. Meanwhile, hearings have already been held on a second consolidated complaint and scheduled for a third.

"I know the board takes a hell of a long time, but you've got to give both sides the right of appeal, and you've got to give the board time to consider the mass of evidence piled up by an employer like Stevens, who's taken the gloves off," Albert Horn, an IUD attorney, told me. "It would help to give the board more staff so that a trial examiner could have a few assistants and come up with a complex decision in four months instead of ten, but basically you can't cut board time in half without cutting the heart out of due process. No, the key to this thing is to put some teeth into the labor law."

Giving Them 'But For'

This is the reason that the IUD's Southern organizers have waged their determined campaign to bring the question of Taft-Hartley revision before the House committee. And foremost among their recommendations for reform will be the reinstatement of illegally discharged workers early in the NLRB process, preferably at the time of the regional director's complaint, thus finding the worker innocent until adjudged guilty and safeguarding both his livelihood and the free choice of his fellows. The Stevens case also highlights the need for penalties to be exacted from employers committing unfair labor practices. Under the present law, the employer suffers no penalty regardless of the scope or deliberateness of his violations; he is merely ordered to cease and desist. As Jim Pierce pointed out to the House committee:

"Some people may ask how a company can afford to fire 250 employees for unionism when the law entitles them to reinstatement with back pay. The answer is simple. About one quarter of the dischargees are too intimidated to even present their cases to the Board; another quarter find other jobs or drift away. For the 150 whom the board will finally uphold, back pay will come to about $300,000, whereas a ten-cent-an-hour raise won by the union for all 40,000 Stevens workers would cost the company eight to ten million dollars a year. For a certain kind of employer, that's quite a bargain." When one considers that the entire back-pay restitution is tax-deductible, it is quite probable that Stevens will emerge from the union struggle with a tidy profit.

But the most fundamental remedy proposed by the union forces is the "but for" clause. Under current law, the board can direct the employer to stop harassing union adherents, and it can set aside an election conducted in a coercive atmosphere. But the records show that where an employer has defeated the union by massive reprisals, his workers seldom recover sufficiently to vote for the union in a second election held a short time later. Therefore, under this proposal, where evidence establishes that "but for" the company's illegal behavior the union could have garnered a majority the first time around, the board can declare the plant organized. Obviously an employer faced with such a law might prefer to fight fair and take his chances in the voting booth instead of playing dirty and losing automatically.

A Peculiar Institution

Sources close to the House Education and Labor Committee insist that the committee will launch a full-scale investigation of the labor law as soon as it resolves the problem of who will chair the hearing. If it does, the testimony would obviously not be restricted to any one region of the country. Nevertheless, such an investigation must ultimately touch upon a fundamental question: Will the open shop succeed slavery and Negro oppression as the "peculiar institution" of the South? For thirty years this region has defied the American pattern of industrial relations in which organized labor plays an integral role. Before the Second World War, when the South was still preponderantly agricultural, this deviation may have been tolerable. But not today, with the South ahead of the nation in the growth of its new plant investment and manufacturing output.

Southern workers, white or Negro, are entitled to the same freedom from anxiety on the job, the same rights of self-determination and free association, the same sense of pride that workers have achieved in the rest of the country. They should also have a similar share in the nation's prosperity. Yet Southern workers in manufacturing last year earned an average of $2.06 per hour compared to the national average of $2.53.

THE election defeats last spring have not altered the IUD's determination to unionize the Roanoke Rapids mills. Although the union appears to have lost its bid to have the NLRB invalidate the results and order new elections, the organizing work continues. If the IUD eventually succeeds in its Southeast campaigns, the repercussions will go beyond the economy and into the political life of the region. Roanoke Rapids is again a good example. This little industrial center bears the political stigmata of a company town. Its state senator is the local lawyer for J. P. Stevens and the paper mill, and a virulent racist. Negroes constitute about one-fifth of the population, yet it was not until this fall that even token integration was accomplished in the schools. The Ku Klux Klan is active and has sent warnings to the IUD and to those local labor leaders who refused Central Labor Council endorsement of the Klan's choice in the last gubernatorial election. "We'll never modernize this town," said one of these union leaders, "until we get some more unions in here to educate the people. Otherwise the mayor and all the rest of them are goin' to keep on playin' the same old game."

Bailing Out The Cotton Industry

JULIUS DUSCHA

THE Senate Agriculture Committee is now considering a bill with the innocuous title "An Act for Cotton Research and Promotion." The legislation is ostensibly an attempt to help the declining cotton industry face the competition of synthetic yarns by stimulating research projects and cotton promotion. But in fact its main effect would be to put the government in the position of underwriting commercial advertising campaigns for a private industry.

The advertising and research would be paid for under a Federally supervised program that would assess cotton farmers a dollar for every bale they produced. But the actual distribution of the money raised by the program—an estimated $12.5 million for this year—would be left to the discretion of a private group representing the cotton industry.

The passage of the bill by the House earlier this year was an example of the way in which a well-organized lobby can push legislation through Congress if it has the support of a powerful chairman like Representative Harold D. Cooley (D., North Carolina) of the House Agriculture Committee. The bill, which Cooley introduced, was drafted by lawyers for the National Cotton Council of America, the industry's principal lobby, and its most immediate purpose appears to be the rescue of a faltering fund-raising drive initiated by the council.

In 1960 the council, which represents cotton mills as well as farmers, established the Cotton Producers Institute to promote the use of cotton. The institute set up a voluntary assessment plan to finance its advertising program, but it was never able to raise more than $3 million in any single year, even though cotton production had been amounting to nearly fifteen million bales annually. (It is expected to drop to 12.5 million bales in 1966.) Last year, when receipts from the voluntary program declined to $2.5 million, the leaders of the council and its subsidiary institute decided that only the Federal government could salvage its promotion campaign.

Cooley Labor

Under the draft legislation submitted to Cooley by the council, the Secretary of Agriculture would be empowered to call an election among the nation's 600,000 cotton producers to vote on the dollar-a-bale assessment. But this would not be an ordinary election, for the bill provides that the assessment could go into effect either if two-thirds of the cotton farmers approved it or if farmers accounting for two-thirds of cotton production voted in favor of the program. Cotton farming is dominated by large producers; less than fourteen per cent of them account for two-thirds of the total production. Thus a small minority of farmers could dictate the outcome.

But the assessment would have to be paid by all cotton farmers, whether they were poverty-stricken Negroes in South Carolina scratching five bales a year out of tired soil or Mississippi planters supervising mechanized operations on rich land producing fifty thousand bales annually. Farmers who did not wish to participate in the program could have their assessments refunded only through a complicated procedure designed to discourage dissenters.

It would cost the Agriculture Department $400,000 to conduct such an election and $50,000 a year to collect the assessments, process requests for refunds, and supervise the program. These substantial administrative expenses would not be taken out of the promotion fund; the money would come from Federal tax revenues.

Once the program was approved, it would be supervised by a Cotton Board appointed by the Secretary of Agriculture and made up of cotton producers. The board would not get into the details of the promotion program. Instead, it would designate a private organization representing cotton producers to be responsible for spending the fund raised by the assessments on advertising, other promotional work, and research dedicated to increase the use of cotton. The private organization that would get the money would in all likelihood be either the National Cotton Council or its Cotton Producers Institute, since they are the only groups that meet the standards set forth in the legislation.

Though cotton mills would be expected to benefit from the promotion program as much as farmers, the legislation makes no provision for contributions from them. They were exempted partly because the council felt that an assessment on the mills was more likely to be reflected in higher prices for cotton textiles than one levied on farmers. Higher prices for cotton goods would only tend to cancel the expanded sales sought by the advertising campaign. Another reason for the exemption of mills is that most major companies process both synthetic and cotton goods and have no particular interest in taking sides in the fight for textile markets. Yet, in the crazy-quilt world of cotton legislation, the strongest Congressional support for the assessment came from Southern representatives like

Cooley who have cotton mills in their districts.

Because the needs of the Cotton Council coincided with political pressures on Cooley and other Representatives from states where cotton farming and cotton mills are important, the legislation moved quickly through the House Agriculture Committee and onto the floor. The 1965 farm bill included controversial provisions designed to reduce cotton production in the face of rising surpluses, and Cooley and many of his Southern colleagues were searching for ways to demonstrate to restless constituents that cotton still has plenty of friends on Capitol Hill.

THE Department of Agriculture, which is already spending $18 million a year on cotton-research programs, went along with the Cotton Council's plan. Under Secretary John A. Schnittker pointed out in a letter to Cooley that cotton's share of the U.S. fiber market had decreased from sixty-five per cent to fifty-three per cent during the last five years. In the meantime, the cost of cotton subsidies has steadily increased, totaling more than $3 billion during the last decade and $601 million in 1965 alone.

The conservative American Farm Bureau Federation and the liberal National Farmers Union, two of the largest farm organizations, both opposed the assessment proposal. This in itself was news, for the Farm Bureau and the Farmers Union seldom agree. Reuben L. Johnson, the Farmers Union's legislative director, told the Agriculture Committee that his organization felt it was unfair to require farmers to contribute to a promotion fund without also placing such a requirement on cotton mills and other cotton processors. Charles Shuman, president of the Farm Bureau and a vigorous supporter of Section 14(b) of the Taft-Hartley Act, which allows states to prohibit union shops, told the House Agriculture Committee when he testified against the dollar-a-bale assessment: "There is a much closer parallel in the rationale on which this legislation is based and the arguments made in favor of repeal of Section 14(b) of the Taft-Hartley Act than many of the supporters of this legislation would want to concede."

Representative Robert J. Dole (R., Kansas) followed a similar line of argument, attacking the bill as "compulsory cottonism," while Frank Thompson, Jr. (D., New Jersey), charged that the House was being asked to set up a union shop for cotton farmers. The parallels are not exact, but they are close enough to embarrass the Southern supporters of the cotton bill who argued so vigorously against the repeal of Section 14(b) last year. Cooley tried to cut off such comparisons by saying: "We are talking about agriculture. I am not getting off on something else."

It was only during the heat of the floor debate that Harlan Hagen (D., California), a spokesman for California cotton producers and a supporter of the legislation, blurted out the truth of the matter: "The motivation of this legislation is the same motivation that applies to union shops," Hagen declared. "There are too many free riders in the cotton business. They are not necessarily small farmers either, believe me. This is an effort to get some discipline in seeking fairness for cotton producers."

'There's the Rub'

The compulsory aspect of the legislation may not have worried such cotton spokesmen as Cooley and Hagen, but it did bother the five-man Mississippi House delegation, which opposed the bill. "When they get his dollar," Thomas G. Abernethy said, "it is all over so far as the farmer is concerned—except that he can take his hat in hand and walk around to the county ASC [Agriculture Stabilization and Conservation Service] office, be labeled as a nonco-operator—apologize—bear the ignominy and the humiliation that goes with it—and say, 'Will you please give me my dollar back?' That is the situation. This is wrong."

While some Southern Democrats squirmed, House Republicans had a field day. Paul Findley of Illinois asked, "Is it in the public interest to establish the precedent of placing the Secretary of Agriculture in charge of a program under which millions of dollars are passed out, on a selective basis, to buy TV and radio time, newspaper and magazine space, and—who knows—perhaps even a few discreetly located billboards? This responsibility could lead to tribulations without end. . . . Think of the panic ahead in the White House if the Secretary finds it impossible to stretch the checkoff dollars far enough to cover simultaneously a saturation sales pitch on men's sweatshirts and one of the virtues of one hundred per cent cotton underwear for milady. To choose? Aye, there's the rub (and I speak not of Cannon towels) . . . "

Before the roll was called, Carl Albert (D., Oklahoma), the House Majority Leader, pleaded for the legislation: "We are trying to find a means by which the cotton producer can compete with other types of fibers. This is the only way you can make advertising in the field of cotton somewhat comparable to that in respect to other fibers."

At first even Albert's plea did not seem enough to carry the bill. More persuasive was the muscle of the House leadership, muscle that is used whenever legislation supported by a committee chairman seems to be in trouble. After the roll had been called the usual two times the bill still lacked a majority; Albert and other House leaders quickly persuaded five Democrats, four of them freshmen, to change their votes. The final vote was 189 to 183.

The outlook for the legislation in the Senate is uncertain, though the two most powerful members of its Agriculture Committee, Chairman Allen J. Ellender (D., Louisiana) and James O. Eastland (D., Mississippi), face re-election this year and might be helped by expeditious passage of the bill. Eastland himself is a big cotton producer who has always been receptive to suggestions from an industry that looks more to the Federal government than to itself to save it from synthetics.

The Communist Car: An Upside-Down Status Symbol

ALEXANDER BREGMAN

THERE IS a special department in heaven for dead motorists, a current joke in Warsaw goes. St. Peter asks a newly arrived soul: "Nationality?" "American." "Car make?" "Cadillac." "What happened?" "Speed of one hundred miles an hour. Crashed into a tree." The next deceased answers the same questions: "Italian; Alfa Romeo; icy road." The third: "A Pole; bought a Syrena on the installment plan; died of starvation."

All over Eastern Europe, to own a car is the great dream. Yet according to the Polish weekly Polityka, the five European Communist car-producing countries manufactured a total of about four hundred thousand cars in 1964, or just about one car for every eight hundred inhabitants and less than half as many as were sold in the United States back in 1915.

There are only two ways to get a car without delay. One is to be a top party or government official who will either have a state-owned car at his disposal or will be given priority for immediate delivery. The other is to have relatives in the West who will pay for it in hard currency. With generous western connections, a Pole can obtain a home-produced Syrena costing $1,000, a Soviet-produced Volga at double the cost, or a Czechoslovak Skoda or an East German Wartburg at a price somewhere in between the other two. But few can expect such a gift.

Some Polish engineers, architects, and technicians have found another short cut to car ownership: signing up for a year's work in an underdeveloped country in order to earn the purchase price of a car in foreign currency. Even luckier professionals have been given permission to work for a year or so in Britain, France, Sweden, or the United States; at the end of their residence abroad they return with a car—and a lot of other things. But for the great majority of enthusiasts the road to ownership is very much rougher and longer.

In 1964, according to the report in Polityka, a hundred thousand Czechoslovaks put down twenty thousand crowns each, about sixteen months' average income, in return for which they were placed on a waiting list with hope of delivery of a Skoda car some time in 1966. Early last year the Warsaw Department of Commerce announced that applications for Soviet and Czechoslovak cars would be accepted for an hour a day during the succeeding ten days. The announcement added:

"The following papers should be attached to the application:

"(a) A certificate from the manager of the enterprise describing the post occupied by the applicant; the purpose of the purchase; the opportunities of using the car for professional work; and the average monthly amount of prizes and bonuses.

"(b) A declaration that the applicant during the past three years has not bought a new car at the state car-selling organization. Should it happen that three years have not elapsed since the last purchase of a car but the car has been damaged beyond further use, the applicant has to present an additional certificate to this effect."

Nonetheless, during those ten days hundreds of Poles queued for hours to fill in an application and enclose the required certificates, all duly stamped. Their chance of success was slim. In 1966 only one Pole in a thousand will be lucky enough to buy a new car: thirty thousand are expected to be sold in a country with a population of thirty-one million. Their new owners will have waited for at least two years for delivery.

Still, Poles are more fortunate than Russians, who might have to wait up to seven years. And everywhere in Eastern Europe the price is beyond most citizens. A Russian earning on the average of 105 rubles a month has to pay 3,400 rubles for his Moskvich. For a Polish worker the price of a Moskvich would represent five years' average income. The Czechs come off best—for only two years' average income they can have a home-produced automobile. Yet many people do save to buy a car on the installment plan even though the monthly payments are too much for them.

How to Become a Millionaire

In the West the person who wants a car but can't afford a new one is usually able to manage a second-hand one. Not so in Eastern Europe. A used car, though immediately available, will cost him even more than a new one. In East Germany a 1949 Volkswagen brings four thousand marks, about a thousand dollars. In Warsaw, where there is an open-air market for used cars every Sunday, the price asked for a two-year-old Volkswagen is 180,000 zlotys, which even at the most favorable exchange rate is almost $8,400

COMMENTS OF F. S. LOVE, SEC.-TREAS., AMERICAN TEXTILE MANUFACTURERS INSTITUTE, INC., CONCERNING EQUAL EMPLOYMENT OPPORTUNITY COMMISSION SESSIONS, CHARLOTTE, NORTH CAROLINA, JANUARY 12-13, 1967

Chron & EOC

FOR RELEASE AFTER 5:30 P.M., FRIDAY, JANUARY 13, 1967

Some of the statements made at the two-day Equal Employment Opportunity sessions concluding today in Charlotte have contained malicious and irresponsible accusations concerning the employment practices of the textile industry, but it is not our purpose to engage in a contest of charges and counter charges. In general, these accusations came from individuals who perhaps were less concerned than we with the laudable objective of providing more jobs for more people. Nevertheless, American Textile Manufacturers Institute and many textile companies have been represented at this meeting and have followed the proceedings with genuine interest. ATMI congratulates Commissioner Stephen N. Shulman, who has done his best to bring out something of value from the sensationalism of the past two days.

Prior to the opening of this conference, we pointed out that a public session might be used by individuals who had little regard for the textile industry or its approximately one million employees. The events of the last two days indicate that our concern was not unfounded.

The textile industry's responsibility to this nation is, in part, to provide jobs. Despite its critics at the meeting -- most of whom provide few jobs and meet no payrolls -- statements presented to the session defined the significant progress the industry has made.

The figures presented by the Commission in chart form on the opening day seem to indicate that textile wages paid in both North and South Carolina are equal to or above the average for industrial wages paid in both states. They also show an encouraging increase in the textile industry employment of minority groups. We will not pretend to perfection, but we think it is significant, encouraging and indicative of the industry's social responsibility, that, according to the Commission's 1966 employment survey, while total textile employment in North Carolina increased 7 per cent between 1964 and 1965, non-white employment increased 73 per cent. This same survey also reveals substantial progress in the provision of job opportunities for Negro females. In the two years covered by the study, North Carolina textile industry employment of Negro women jumped 312 per cent. In South Carolina, a somewhat similar situation exists, with female Negro employment up 311 per cent.

Based on the Commission's figures, it appears that the textile industry provides jobs for some 35,000 non-whites in North and South Carolina. Can any other industry equal that figure?

It was also gratifying to learn from the Commission that although 1,119 complaints have been filed in the two Carolinas over an 18 months period, only 260 of these were filed against the textile industry. Considering the fact that the textile industry in these two states employs nearly 400,000 people, this is a record in which all of us can take considerable pride.

A representative of a South Carolina group cited a number of cases to indicate the harmonious relationship and the constructive hiring practices which exist in textile mills. He described the recruiting efforts of the textile mills through high schools, organized groups and other avenues, and indicated that the textile industry "does not need much urging" in searching vigorously for qualified employees. As a matter of fact, the textile industry is not concerned about race, color or ethnic backgrounds. Its concern is to find qualified employees. Also, as was brought out by a representative of the U. S. Department of Commerce, the rising tide of textile imports from low-wage foreign nations may ultimately make hiring practices an academic question.

The American Textile Manufacturers Institute had hoped that more constructive suggestions might have come from the meeting as to ways in which untrained individuals might be better prepared to make the broad jump into industrial employment. The Commission's figures indicate that the textile industry is meeting the challenge of this decade, but we are disappointed that so few speakers made specific sincere suggestions which would help either the industry or its prospective employees. Regardless of its good intentions, the industry must operate in a practical world of intense competition from other industries, both at home and abroad. It trains thousands of people each year, but it does not have the facilities to train the hundreds of thousands of others who lack adequate employment because they lack adequate training.

Some weeks before the public announcement of this forum, ATMI suggested that if the Commission wished to enlist industry support for its efforts to broaden employment opportunities the most appropriate way would be through a discussion with the industry's leadership. This, we visualized, would be a meeting devoted to practical, realistic approaches to the problem. This would be a meeting which would generate -- not heat, light; not censure, but solutions; not criticism, but cooperation. We made that suggestion in good faith. Mr. Chairman, we make it again today.

Representatives of many textile manufacturing companies have attended and have followed these sessions with concentrated interest. The industry has carefully noted the comments that have been made at the meeting, and its representatives return to their plants with renewed determination to provide the best possible jobs for the largest possible number of qualified American people.

EEOC - Textile Forum

STATEMENT TO THE EQUAL EMPLOYMENT OPPORTUNITY COMMISSION
TWO-DAY HEARING IN CHARLOTTE, NORTH CAROLINA ON EMPLOYMENT OF NEGROES IN THE TEXTILE INDUSTRY

January 12-13, 1967

MR. CHAIRMAN: My name is Courtney Siceloff. I appear in behalf of Penn Community Services, a private, non-profit agency of which I am the director. This is an organization founded in 1862, whose primary purpose is that of Community Development in Beaufort County, on the coast of South Carolina. Employment is one of the primary concerns of Community Development.

In addition, I am secertary of the South Carolina Advisory Committee to the U. S. Commisison on Civil Rights. In this respect, I would like to share my experiences with that Committee which in the past has considered matters relating to employment.

Let me first clearly state that my experiences with textile plants have been quite limited. I will therefore limit most of my remarks to Beaufort County, believing that the relating of specific problems in our county will be more useful than generalization about the state.

There is a knitting mill in Beaufort, manufacturing women's clothing. The plant was established about five years ago and at its peak employment, had some 300 employees, with about one-half of them Negroes. The firm agreed to desegregate its facilities, and in the process of building a new plant, came across a law which is still on the books. A portion of this law reads:

> SECTION 40-452, Code of Laws of South Carolina for 1952.
> "Separation of employees of different races in cotton textile factories.
> It shall be unlawful for any person engaged in the business of cotton textile manufacturing in this state to allow or permit operatives, help and labor of different races (a) to labor and work together within the same room, (b) to use the same doors of entrance and exit at the same time, (c) to use and occupy the same pay ticket windows or doors for paying off its operatives and laborers at the same time, (d) to use the same stairway and windows and laborers at the same time, or (e) to use at any time the same lavatories, toilets, drinking water buckets, pails, cups, dippers or glasses."

While this law is not enforced, its existence creates problems. The president of the firm felt he should contact the governor before proceeding with his desegregation plans; he was sure there would be no prosecution under the law. However, the contractor insisted the law required separate bathrooms- and proceeded to build them in spite of instructions from the president specifying otherwise.

The existence of the law has undoubtedly had a deterrant effect on firms, considering changing employment practices in their industry. The law likewise supports those employers who wish to make few - if any-changes in their employment patterns.

Textile Industry:

The EEOC should be commended for the research undertaken of the employment pattern in the textile industry, and the publication of its findings. I trust the Commission will continue this important phase of the work.

While the research undertaken by the Commission has been much more in depth than the material I had available, I found the Annual Report of the South Carolina Department of Labor to be quite helpful.

The latest report available is the 30th Annual Report for the period ending June 30, 1965; the 31st report is to be released later this month.

South Carolina Labor Commissioner William Fred Ponder points out that not only is the textile industry the most important one in South Carolina, but that in several areas, textiles equal all the other industries combined. Textiles account for 44% of the total capital invested in industry, 57% of the value products manufactured, and 59% of industrial wages. Thus it is very pertinent for the EEOC to examine the employment patterns in this industry.

While the Commission research figures indicate an increase on Negro employment in the testile industry recently, yet the percentage of Negros employed in the textile firms in South Carolina is less than it was 40 years ago.

Permit me to cite some figures comparing the industry in 1925 and in 1965. In the 40-year period, the value of the product increased 10 fold from $236,876,213 to $2,831,662,369-while employment of non-salaried employees nearly doubled - from 70,068 to 133,294.

Negro male employment went from 3742 to 7323. However, the percentage of Negro males empployed dropped from 6% in 1925 to 5.5% in 1965. The figures of Negro female employment are even more significant, with the number actually decreasing from 916 persons to 897 today. The percentage reflects the change: from 1% in 1925 to .7% in 1965.

These figures set beside white female employment, which doubled in that same period from 23,418 to 47,078- show both how little and static is Negro female employment in the industry.

While it should be pointed out that during the 40-year period, Negro employment decreased and has recently been on the rise, one cannot escape the conclusion that the industry has done little to improve its employment pattern in the last 40 years, in spite of federal legislation and the initiative of the firm to correct the situation.

South Carolina Employment Security Commission:

May I turn for a moment to the South Carolina Employment Security Commission, an agency financed by the U. S. Government, which has a key role in placing of workers.

I would like to refer to their role in one county in South Carolina - Beaufort, where I come from - in regards to the training and placement of Negroes in non-traditional jobs. While it is obvious that the Employment Security Commisission has a responsibility to all persons - and supposedly does not maintain records according to race-we are interested here today in the end result-how many Negroes are moving into jobs that previously were not open to them.

In Beaufort County, the Employment Security Commission has had the responsibility of placing graduates of MDTA-or STEP, as called in South Carolina-training courses. To date, two secretarial courses have been completed and another is to begin this month. Due to recent federal legislation, there should be many opportunities for qualified Negro stenographers and typists with federal and state agencies, federal contractors, Title VII Employers.

The placement in the first course - of 14 Negroes and 6 white persons - resulted in the immediate employment of all white persons available for work and eventual employment of only 4 of the 14 Negroes. The Employment Service was not responsible for the placement of any of the 4. Two of these are secretaries in Negro high schools and two work with OEO agencies. I would not term these non-traditional jobs.

The second course finished last December with 4 Negroes and 6 white graduates. The Negroes who finished this course a month ago indicate that they are not aware of any efforts of the Employment service to refer them to positions.

Staff Of The Employment Commission:

In Beaufort County almost 1/3 of Negro families earn less than $1,000 and over half earn less than $2,000, thus forming the bulk of persons using the services of the Employment Commission.

Of the 7-man staff in the Beaufort office, none is a Negro. Thus the agency which by law cannot discriminate in its own employment practices and on whom lies the responsibility if Negroes are to be placed in non-traditional jobs, has no Negro employee itself. How can this agency expect other employers to change their practices when it has not yet hired a Negro?

Thus, if this situation exists in other communities - and from my participation on the S. C. Advisory Committee to the U. S. Commission on Civil Rights, I feel that the Beaufort office in this respect is not singular - then I feel that the EEOC should not permit employers to rely primarily on the Employment Service for training and recruitment, until changes are made in that agency as well.

In conclusion, I would recommend that affirmative action be required of all industries covered by Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. This affirmative action should not be vague, general, nor voluntary. Employment standards should be established so that an industry would know whether it was taking sufficient affirmative action, as well as giving a guide to EEOC to judge compliance.

While there is little comparison between the problems of public schools and industrial employment, yet something can be gained from the experiences of schools being required to change their patterns. While the law regarding school desegregation became clear in 1954, there was almost no initiative on the part of school boards to comply until guidelines were established some ten years later.

It appears to me that this forum provides one example of what voluntary compliance often achieves. From my contact with EEOC staff members regarding this meeting, it appears that EEOC has done much to refrain from unnecessarily embarrassing the textile industry. Yet from the newspapers, I learn that few representatives of the industry have participated in this open meeting. If this is the type of cooperation that can be expected with EEOC - with its very limited enforcement powers, then precise guidelines need to be established.

Thus I urge EEOC recommend that Congress amend the present law to provide the Commission with the necessary enforcement machinery and personnel to establish employment standards that will permit minority groups that have been virtually excluded from certain industries to fully participate in them at all levels.

I commend the Commission for conducting this forum and appreciate the opportunity of appearing before you.

The textile compliance meeting convened at 11:00 on Tuesday, January 16, 1968, at the Main Labor Building in response to letters sent to the attending companies by Edward Sylvester, Director, OFCC.

The purpose of the meeting was to acquaint the textile companies with the purposes and objectives of the Government's imminent compliance program, and to achieve these aims through all possible mutual cooperation and understanding.

Mr. Sylvester and Commissioner Jackson, EEOC, set the initial tone by stressing that this was a unified Government program with OFCC's responsibility being the ten largest textile companies, and EEOC's, the remaining companies in North and South Carolina. Mr. Sylvester also stated that other Government agencies having some involvement with textiles in other aspects (tariffs, legislation, etc.) were also interested in this compliance program. It was also stressed that OFCC, DOD, and EEOC, in initiating this textile review, were merely continuing their emphasis on the industry-wide approach to compliance as done in other industries, rather than singling out the textile industry.

Lists of data to be supplied by the company and copies of the Department of Defense's compliance workbook were distributed to the contractors prior to a discussion in depth of what is involved in a compliance review. Questions asked by the contractors were limited to those of adequate notice by the Government, possibility of overlapping of jurisdiction by OFCC and EEOC, and the need for the data requested. These questions were answered, and it was announced that the OFCC-DOD textile compliance program would convene on January 22, 1968, at Dan River Mills, followed in the next thirty (30) days by Deering-Milliken, and Cannon Mills. Other companies will be announced by letter at later dates. The Department of Defense stated that two teams of two men each would be assigned full-time on the one year project.

The meeting ended at 12:30 p.m.

TEAM SUMMARY REPORT

(Textiles: Employment and Advancement for Minorities)
September, 1968

Introduction:

In January, 1967, a forum on textile industry employment patterns in North and South Carolina was held by the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission. Following the forum, six private agencies* formed TEAM to provide a field program in South Carolina and to work with national and regional federal offices to end discrimination in employment in the textile industry. Several of the private agencies had presented statements to the EEOC forum and one of them earlier had urged the EEOC to show interest in the textile industry.

TEAM was one part of a total effort including the governmental agencies (EEOC and OFCC) and the North Carolina Good Neighbor Council. TEAM hoped that the combined activities would serve a) to substantially increase Negro employment in entry level jobs, b) to place Negroes into a scattering of skilled and white collar jobs, c) to see that training, employment services, and other programs related to the textile industry were non-discriminatory, and d) to keep the private agencies informed about government agency action to insure that a high level of government activity continued.

*The six agencies were: The NAACP Legal Defense and Educational Fund, the Southern Regional Office of the National Urban League, Penn Community Services, The Southern Office of the AFL-CIO Civil Rights Department, The Southern Rural Training Project, and the Southern Regional Council.

TEAM Activities.

TEAM activities can be separated into two categories, field and general. The field activities went through several phases as the program moved through its initial organization, created community awareness, and then began to operate within local communities. In the earlier phases special materials were prepared on the program and they and appropriate government materials were widely distributed. Area conferences were organized by TEAM, and in cooperation with other agencies, to alert local Negro leadership, training agencies, and employers to the new interest in textile employment. Local informational meetings were held.

During the course of local community contact, indigenous, local leaders were selected to serve as community aides to the TEAM effort. The aides worked part time for pay to help create interest in textile employment, organize campaigns to test employer willingness to hire Negroes, to spot local situations contributing to employment discrimination, to cooperate with appropriate government staff people. Aides have worked in nine counties and are currently working in five or six. A special training program conducted at Penn Community Services assisted the aides in better understanding their duties, the textile industry, types of discrimination, job application and testing procedures, and available resources.

The community program has proved valuable in both achieving the ends of the program and in demonstrating how difficult it is to solve elementary problems in some communities. Approximately 500 persons have been placed by TEAM efforts. The total may be more but we recognized at the start that our best efforts at securing accurate reporting would be frustrated and this has frequently proved to be the case. This total, compared to our hopes, is disappointing; compared to other efforts or even on the basis of per head costs, the effort has been reasonably successful. And such comparisons do not take into account the continuing gains from community organization, the stimulation of groups to act on their own, and the goading of public agencies to enforce laws or to carry out their duties equitably.

The field program has led to over fifty complaints of discrimination being filed with federal agencies. Complaints have also been made to schools, the Technical Education Commission programs, and the employment service. In some cases corrective action has already taken place. The basic employment discrimination complaints are currently under investigation by EEOC.

The "general" activities of TEAM have included the further development of interagency cooperation (private and public), liason functions by TEAM board members between government agencies and at times within an agency, the "watchdogging" of federal agency efforts, and on occassion the confrontation of agencies with what was required of them by law and circumstance. There is no need to spell these activities out in detail, but they have been an essential part of the total process. Although we have had good cooperation from government staff, the process has had to be prodded. Their activities, with and without our help, have assisted in the hiring of about 1,500 Negro employees in newly opened industrial facilities alone, the Atlanta office of EEOC visited some fifty plants urging affirmative action and offering assistance, a number of cases have been referred to the Attorney General for action. One of these has been settled in court, a few others are in process, and some will not be acted upon. EEOC Commissioners have issued complaints in a number of cases, but only one of these seems to have gone to the final stages. The OFCC has made investigations and recommendations in six or seven of the ten largest companies and has proceeded to a showdown with one of them to serve as a model for the industry. The Labor Department is to take action against this company following September 30, if it has not agreed to implement a far reaching affirmative program.

Some Problems.

In almost no case were the problems of timing satisfactorily resolved. In a one year effort which attempted to bring a number of separate private and public agencies together it would be expected that competing demands, bureaucratic procedures, and human failure would lead to an imperfect meshing of efforts. Some of the difficulty came about because TEAM launched its field program after some of the public efforts were well under way. Other problems stemmed from the vagaries of the national political scene.

It had been our hope that the results of enforcement efforts would be made available sooner to act as a stimulus to companies and community leadership and to Negro workers reluctant to seek jobs in textiles. We have, frankly, been disappointed that a stronger court ruling could not be secured during the year, that a good settlement did not result from a commissioner complaint which in turn might be made public, or that an OFCC investigation has not already lead to positive action or, if necessary, debarment from government contracts.

We have had perhaps a little less than half of the performance we had hoped for, and sometimes promised, from government agencies. In some cases delivery was beyond the capacity (staff, budget, political commitment) of the staff involved. The total effort probably compares quite favorably to others. The government people are satisfied that it has been a worthy undertaking considering the newness of the effort, that it was the first such cooperative undertaking, and that it was the first strategic action use of their research data. TEAM, though not satisfied, thinks that a practical assessment would in large part confirm the government staff assessment.

The Opportunity Now.

The anticipation of a breakthrough with the big ten companies (OFCC action to secure positive programs or to debar) plus the effects of a new round of complaint oriented EEOC investigations, make us feel that the next few months will be the time of greatest employment gains in textiles. The public and private agencies agree that to maximize this opportunity it will be important to have a community program to recruit workers, spread information about openings, and to watch the recruitment process in action.

We are at that point, it would seem, where our various efforts are most likely to bear fruit in actual job placements. The Labor Department currently indicates that its actions should be completed during October. The EEOC initial investigations should be through in a few days. Both of these actions will alert the industry to the need for a more significant change in its patterns of employment. It should be remembered that rulings affecting the big ten alone will include enforcement possibilities in literally hundreds of their plants located in the Carolinas.

What Is Proposed.

TEAM proposes to phase out its operations over the next several months. For that period it would continue, if funds are available, its community aides program. In some areas the program would operate to take advantage of immediate opportunities, but in other cases we would time our activity to match favorable results from governmental action. We would not continue a full-time director, but would look to him for several days a month assistance and similarly use the Charlotte based field staff of the Legal Defense and Educational Fund. We would also be alert to the possibilities of extending our program into some areas of North Carolina where the opportunity is greatest and placement efforts have been weak.

The TEAM executive board would continue its participation in the project including field activities. The participation of the board in the project -- periodic meetings, field consultations, meeting with government staff -- has all been without cost to the project itself. Each agency has borne its own expenses. Two of the agencies, Legal Defense and Educational Fund and the Southern Regional Council, have contributed $2,500.00 to the project budget. And the LDEF has supported the project during this current period since the end of the grant money.

A grant of $10,000 is needed to allow for the project to be properly terminated and to take advantage of the current situation. We have decided not to seek a larger amount for a fully staffed operation partly because of the difficulty in maintaining fulltime staff in a temporary project of this nature and partly because we feel we can effectively build on what we have already done and make use of existing agencies. A larger program, however, could easily be justified and would we think be productive. Although we would like to see government funds made available for a larger program, we do not feel that the private agencies should continue this particular committment beyond what we have proposed here.

Statement by
Clifford L. Alexander, Jr., Chairman
Equal Employment Opportunity Commission before the Subcommittee on Administrative Practice and Procedure of the Senate Judiciary Committee
March 27, 1969

MR. CHAIRMAN, you have convened these hearings to explore the effectiveness and efficiency of government practices and procedures for ensuring equal opportunity in employment among government contractors.

The adequacy of tools must, of course, be measured against the magnitude of the task. I would like, therefore, to give you my perspective as Chairman of the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission on job discrimination as it exists today. The Commission's jurisdiction extends, as you know, to employers of 25 or more, whether or not they are government contractors, as well as to unions, employment agencies, and joint apprenticeship programs. I see from the witness list that you will be hearing from other agencies with specific responsibilities under Executive Order 11246 for compliance by government contractors with provisions of that order, and I will not comment on its requirements or administration. What I shall say about discrimination from my vantage point as Chairman of EEOC applies to contractors and non-contractors alike.

I believe we must recognize three basic characteristics of discrimination: it is pervasive in the American way of business; it is too often unrecognized for what it is; and, most importantly, it can be rooted out through appropriate and determined action.

It has become fashionable of late to talk of "disadvantage" as the reason why minorities find themselves unemployed or confined to the bottom of the job hierarchy. The assumption is that minorities are largely unable to compete effectively because education and training opportunities have been previously denied them. But it is not "disadvantage" that makes the annual earnings of the black college graduate $1,040 less at the median than the white who never attended college. It is discrimination.

The data our Commission collected in 1966 from all employers of 100 or more, including most government contractors, showed that of 17-1/2 million male employees, one out of nine was an official or manager; but among 1-1/2 million Negro male employees, only one out of 100 was so employed; and among Spanish Surnamed American males, only one out of 40. Among all male blue collar employees, one in three was a foreman or craftsman; but only one in ten blacks, and one in five Spanish Surnamed Americans. For minority women the situation is even worse since sex discrimination compounds their lack of opportunity.

There are those who would deny that broadscale discrimination is largely responsible for the exclusion of minorities, or their compression into lower paying jobs. But they ignore both what the processes of law define as discrimination, and the availability of qualified minorities that the Commission has tried to demonstrate through a series of public hearings and industry meetings.

When employers claim they "see no qualified minority applicants" it is often because their recruitment does not extend into the minority community as it has always extended into the Anglo community. In many instances, where the effect of such limited recruiting is to perpetuate a virtually all-white workforce, the employer would be in violation of Title VII -- not to mention the Executive Order -- despite the most glowing policy statement in his employee manual or diligent use of the "equal opportunity employer" slug in his classified ads in the daily paper.

Similarly, where minority job applicants are screened out disproportionately by tests that have not been validated as predictive of or related to actual job performance, the employer violates the law no less than if he still had a "whites only" sign in his personnel office.

Where minority employees are concentrated today in less desirable jobs because present seniority systems -- fair on their face since they apply to all -- perpetuate the effects of discriminatory placement in the past, the employer violates the law today.

I could cite further instances of how discrimination often fails to be perceived for what the courts have determined it to be under Title VII. But this Commission has seen many instances where one needn't be a lawyer to know that much more is afoot than a shortage of qualified minority workers. At public hearings in New York in 1968 on discrimination in white collar employment, we saw that among that city's nine largest banks, two had 31 black executives -- four others had none. We saw other instances of how some employers were capable of finding qualified blacks and Puerto Ricans for white collar jobs at all levels while others, in the same industry, were unable to find any to do virtually the same kind of work. Indeed, out of some 4,300 reporting units in the city, 46% had not a single Puerto Rican in any white collar job -- from clerical on up -- and 43% had not a single black.

I would like to submit for the record a distillation of those New York Hearings whose title, I think, sums up the picture we saw among some of the nation's largest employers. It is called "Help Wanted....Or Is it".

Many of the findings in our New York hearings apply with equal force to blue collar work as well as white collar. And they repeat themselves from city to city, industry to industry. We have met privately with top executives of the drug and utilities industries, reviewed their reported employment statistics, and urged action to change the patterns they showed: despite large minority work forces in their operating areas, little minority participation above the lower blue collar level and virtually no minority representation in middle management and upper level jobs.

Just two weeks ago in Los Angeles we saw an extremely disturbing picture at hearings covering the aerospace industry, motion picture production, the three radio-TV networks and several major financial institutions. In the movie industry, Mexican Americans and blacks were almost completely excluded from craft jobs by a collusive system involving the producers and many craft unions. The system's forseeable discriminatory effect made it a violation of Title VII notwithstanding the intent of the parties involved, and the parties evidenced no intent to change that system.

In the aerospace industry, lumping of minorities at the bottom of the job hierarchy was a rule with few exceptions. Minority witnesses testified they were frozen in positions for longer than their Anglo colleagues despite comparable or superior education and training.

The same television networks that had promised in New York to improve an abysmal record of minority employment showed, fifteen months later, a failure no less stunning to utilize the rich potential of minorities in Los Angeles.

I would be delighted to furnish this subcommittee with the transcript of the Commission's hearings in Los Angeles as soon as it is available. It will show a bleak picture. But it will also show some exceptions to this picture, as we saw among New York's leading white collar employers, the drug industry, and the private utilities. They are important exceptions, for they point to the abundance of qualified minority workers when employers adopt non-discriminatory practices.

It is the Commission's experience that those relatively few companies who have successfully recruited and upgraded minorities share certain vital characteristics. They have developed detailed written plans for affirmative action, establishing for themselves specific goals and timetables for ending exclusion and underutilization of minority workers. Top management requires reports of progress or failure plant by plant, department by department, job category by job category. Reports are not just filed, but acted upon. Top management makes it clear that rewards and sanctions will apply to supervisors' performance in equalizing job opportunity just as they apply to performance in other areas of the company's operation where specific objectives or obligations have been defined.

There is, Mr. Chairman, one industry in which I understand the Subcommittee is particularly interested, where it appears that such top management attention among major employers is particularly needed. This industry -- the textile industry -- was the first to which the Commission addressed itself in a public context in January, 1967. Statistics presented at a public forum in Charlotte showed gross underutilization of blacks, particularly black women, in North and South Carolina textile plants. And the Commission's investigations had uncovered some of the overtly discriminatory practices at plants of industry leaders that underlay the statistics of exclusion.

There have been other industries whose major employers have had comparably bad records. The leading textile employers are noteworthy, however, because in their capacity as government contractors they have been the subject of efforts by the OFCC and DOD following the Commission's textile forum, and thus provide an example of an industry where all the tools this Subcommittee is exploring have been used.

The Commission's experience with three of these major employers is enlightening. According to forms filed with the Commission in 1966, these companies made up about 25% of total textile employment, and now employ some 133,000 people. They have been the subject of a number of Commission investigations. At one plant, a company refused to hire a black woman solely because she had borne children out of wedlock -- although company officials admitted that they hired unwed mothers who were white. At another, a black man was discharged when he failed to execute a supervisor's order to perform an unpleasant task that investigation revealed was not assigned to similarly placed whites. It did not appear incidental that this man, whose work record had been rated adequate in the past, had been having trouble since being elected president of the local NAACP. Nor would it seem incidental that an unwritten plant rule required blacks, but not whites, to use paper cups when drinking from a supposedly desegregated water fountain.

Both cases I have mentioned were based on charges filed in 1966. The incidents are reasonably typical of cases we have investigated in other plants of the three textile companies at various times before and after the textile forum. And, unfortunately, such practices and others even more serious are allegedly widespread even today. In a charge received this year against one of the three companies, gross violations of Title VII were alleged including maintenance of segregated facilities and discriminatory shift assignments, layoff and discharge based on race. In addition, the complaint cited persistent refusal of the respondent to undertake its responsibilities under Executive Order 11246.

I will not comment upon this alleged failure of the company as a government contractor to execute the requirements of the Executive Order. And the entire charge, of course, must be investigated before the Commission decides whether the facts support alleged violations of Title VII by this employer or any other. I will say, however, that the underutilization of blacks which the three leading textile companies reported in 1968 strongly suggests widespread discrimination at work.

Blacks held 11.7% of all the 133,421 jobs reported among the three companies. But the compression of blacks into lower paying jobs is starkly drawn by the statistics on individual job categories the companies themselves reported:

-- Blacks held only 16 of the 8,437 jobs as officials and managers - 0.2%.

-- They held 8 of 2,112 jobs as professionals -- 0.4% -- and 33 of 1,612 technicians positions -- 2.0%.

-- There were only 9 blacks among 1,497 salesmen -- 0.6% -- and even at the office and clerical level blacks held only 2.9% of the 11,256 reported jobs.

-- In blue collar work, Negroes held 11.7% of the 75,523 semi-skilled operative jobs, but only 1.8% of the 15,984 jobs as craftsmen, foremen and kindred workers. They held 35.9% of jobs as laborers and 36.0% of jobs as service workers -- the lowest rungs of the occupational ladder.

These figures, Mr. Chairman, are appalling -- particularly in what they say to the black job applicant whom these companies, like the rest of industry North and South, are ostensibly seeking. Looking at these figures from the outside, a young black college student would see one of every sixteen whites at the companies working in a job as official or manager -- but only one of 1,000 blacks. The black high school student would see one of every eight whites working as a foreman or craftsman, but only one of 50 Negroes. What credibility does this lend to the label of "Equal Opportunity Employer" that each of the companies probably displays in its classified ads?

I submit, Mr. Chairman, that equal opportunity will not become a reality in these companies, or in this industry, or in American industry generally unless and until all of the tools available to the public and private sector are appropriately utilized. If these tools are cumbersome, inadequate, duplicative or -- most importantly -- not utilized, the problem of job discrimination will remain grave. Discrimination costs billions of dollars annually in unrealized productivity. Dollars out of black and brown and white pockets alike. Its cost in human terms is incalculable. If with the guidance of this Subcommittee on Administrative Practice and Procedure, more effective and efficient action to eliminate discrimination ensues, all of the nation -- minority and majority -- stands to benefit.

STATEMENT OF SENATOR WALTER F. MONDALE BEFORE THE SENATE SUBCOMMITTEE ON ADMINISTRATIVE PRACTICE AND PROCEDURES

Mr. Chairman and members of the Committee:

I appreciate the opportunity to appear before you today, for these hearings are both timely and important. The role of the federal government in promoting equal employment opportunity is of vital interest to all of us. The unemployment rate for non-whites in America is twice that for whites. In some rural areas and northern ghettoes, unemployment soars as shockingly high as 35-40% among blacks. One of the causes of this grave problem is job discrimination. Such a trend will persist, with the unrest it brings, unless strong corrective action is taken by the federal government immediately.

The issues before this committee today are clear and simple. First, is the federal government, in the face of growing public concern with hunger, poverty and unemployment in our rural areas and urban slums, going to continue to foster racial segregation and discrimination through the use of federal tax dollars, thereby foreclosing job opportunities to thousands of black, Mexican-American and Indian citizens? Second, is the federal government going to make pronouncements about law and order and make new efforts towards ending crime and lawlessness while failing to follow and enforce its own laws and procedures on nondiscrimination? These issues are what provoked my concern about recent defense department actions regarding contracts to three large textile mills.

On February 8,1969, Deputy Secretary of Defense David Packard awarded contracts totaling $9.4 million dollars to three southern textile firms -- J.P. Stevens, Dan River Mills and Burlington Industries--on the basis of these firms' oral assurances that they would come up with an adequate "affirmative action" program. He did this not only without consulting the Office of Federal Contract Compliance, but in direct contradition of OFCC's and his own Defense Supply Agency's findings of discriminatory practices by these companies and recommendations that the companies be found in non-compliance with the Executive Order.

These findings of discrimination were not insignificant, as this summary indicates:

First. Negro male employees were being discriminated against in terms of promotion.

Second. There was discrimination in providing on-the-job training.

Third. Few Negro females were being hired in any capacity, despite the large number of white females being employed by these firms.

Fourth. Craft jobs were held by whites only, tests used to fill these jobs were not validated and were therefore not shown to be job related.

Fifth. Housing owned by Dan River Mills for its employees was segregated; whites were provided with cottages, Negroes with "shotgun" houses.

On February 11, 1969, I wrote Secretary Packard, requesting the terms of the assurances given him by the companies and urging him to hold up approval of these contracts. On February 26, 1969, I received a reply from a DoD official, which included a copy of a letter from Secretary Packard to Secretary Shultz, dated February 13, 1969.

In his letter, Secretary Packard stated that the companies' "chief executives have assured me that...(they)...will implement affirmative action plans to achieve the results contemplated under the Executive Order." This statement, along with the fact that no written agreement has yet been produced, amounts to a concession that millions of dollars of federal contracts were awarded on the basis of a handshake and a promise to do better.

Mr. Packard's attempt in the letter to explain his actions to Secretary Shultz is also most revealing. For rather than being at all reassuring, he explicitly indicates that the following deficiencies existed in the employment practices of the companies to which he had just awarded $9.4 million in federal contracts:

" 1. The companies do not provide in detail " specific goals and time tables for the prompt achievement of full and equal employment opportunity" as required in Section 60-1.40 of the OFCC Rules and Regulations.

" 2. OFCC policy and recent court decisions require that contractors remedy the present effects of past discrimination. Acceptable contractor programs to meet this requirement have yet to be formulated.

" 3. The companies have not provided a meaningful plan to assure fairness and nondiscrimination in recruiting, selection, placement, promotion and upgrading.

" 4. There still remains some company housing that is occupied on a segregated basis. A plan for prompt desegregation is needed."

Not only did Mr. Packard's action violate the substance of the law's requirements against discrimination as he himself so graphically outlined in his letter, but he also ignored completely the procedures under Executive Order 11246. He totally by-passed the OFCC, which is vested with responsibility for coordinating and supervising policies under the Executive Order, and he personally accepted oral, nonspecific assurances despite the regulations' requirements for written, specific assurances and for a timetable within which the contractor's affirmative action program will be accomplished.

It must be emphasized that Mr. Packard awarded contracts to companies which were not in compliance with the Executive Order. For the regulations issued under the authority of this Order unequivocally state that " where deficiencies are found to exist," as they were here,

" (b)efore the contractor can be found to be in compliance with the Order, it must make a specific commitment, in writing, to correct any such deficiencies. The commitment must include the precise action to be taken and dates for completion."

While the textile companies are required to report by May 1st on progress made in fulfilling their oral assurances, it is difficult to understand what they are to report about in the absence of a specific plan and requirements by which to measure these reports. Moreover, only Mr. Packard will be able to judge whether or not they are in compliance in the absence of any written agreement.

The action taken in these cases raises grave questions about the future of the contract compliance program. The law cannot be what the personal judgement of one official may determine it to be at a particular time. An effective compliance program involving hundreds of companies and billions of dollars cannot be conducted on the basis of personal oral assurances between a defense official and private industry officials. Nor can subversion of orderly procedures result in anything other than vitiation of the underlying policies and goals of the law.

Mr. Packard's actions are disturbing for still another reason. They totally negate the substantial expenditure of effort and money which several government agencies and private groups have invested over thepast year and a half to achieve compliance in these textile mills. I would like to briefly summarize for this committee the background of the textile investigation. The textile compliance program was a joint EEOC-OFCC-DoD project launched in January, 1968 1967 as part of a carefully designed, comprehensive, interagency effort which began in the spring of 1966 and which was an unusual attempt to coordinate federal and private agency programs to achieve equal employment opportunity. Frustrated by the limitations of a case-by-case approach to compliance which relies on individual complaints, the EEOC commissioners, led by Commissioner Samuel Jackson, a Republican, decided to try to eliminate patterns of discrimination by working on an industry-wide basis to achieve affirmative action agreements. The textile industry was chosen as a pilot project because its geographic concentration made it manageable in scope, because of its clear history of racial discrimination (I will attach for the record the Department of Defense's own specific findings of various discriminatory practices as of 1968 in Dan River Mills as related to Mr. M.A. Cross of that company by Mr. Shafer of the Defense Supply Agency in a letter of September 10,1968 (Attachment I), because it had a labor shortage: because of its heavy involvement with Federal contracts

(during 1968 when negotiations were going on with these companies, the DoD awarded contracts of approximately $77.5 million to these three firms), and because textile mills can offer jobs to unskilled, ex-farm workers. Moreover, the large roles textile companies play in the southern economy could, if employment patterns were changed, have a broad impact on job opportunity for minorities throughout the area. For example, EEOC data shows that in 1964, 49.4% of manufacturing jobs (or 136,400 jobs), in South Carolina were in textiles, in 1965, 41.2% of manufacturing jobs (or 253,200 jobs), in North Carolina were in textiles.

Great effort was expended on the project including extensive documentation of the mills' discrimination by EEOC's research staff; a public forum on textile employment practice in Charlotte, N.C., in January, 1967; exhaustive efforts by federal officials to get voluntary cooperation from corporate leaders in the industry, and a private interagency effort of six civil rights groups which complemented the government's effort and reflects the strong interest of civil rights groups in this project. Over a year of negotiations ensued between the government and these mills without a satisfactory affirmative action program being agreed upon. I am attaching for the record a detailed chronology of the steps which were taken in the attempt to bring these companies into compliance with the Executive Order. (Attachment II).

It is in the face of all this that Mr. Packard's action must be judged. What is truly shocking is the fact that between the February 8th awards of $9.4 million and March 26th, DoD has continued to award contracts to these same three firms -- Burlington, Dan River and J.P. Stevens. The total amount of these additional contracts is $13 million.

This continuing disregard of the Executive Order by DoD is indefensible and can only reward violation of the law and compound the errors already made in these cases. It seems to me that thepublic has a right to expect more and must ask more of the federal government.

It is particularly ironic that the Defense Department -- which so freely uses the energy, skill and lives of black Americans in Vietnam and which daily calls for more sacrifices from all Americans--is the first federal agency in the new Administration to impede efforts for racial justice here at home.

I hope that this committee hearing will result in a commitment on the part of DoD and other federal agency officials to enforce fully Executive Order 11246 and the rules and regulations thereunder. To do so would make a decisive difference in how minority groups view the federal government's willingness to enforce the law, and it will open up jobs to many who need them most. As of 1966, employers with federal contracts employed an estimated 24 million persons, approximately one-third of the labor force. It is evident what leverage the federal government has through federal contracts for constructive results in the jobs area if it would only use it.

Second, I hope that this committee will insist that federal agencies respect procedures established under the law, for without them justice will be an illusion.

Third, it is crucial that an adequate enforcement staff be hired and an adequate reporting system be implemented for monitoring compliance among government contractors. Moreover, information should be provided to the public about programs and progress in this area.

Finally, I call upon Secretary Shultz and Deputy Secretary Packard to take immediate action to correct the violation of the Executive Order occurring in these textile cases and to hold yp any pending contracts until the companies are in real--not paper--compliance. As Mr. Packard himself stated in his letter to Secretary Shultz: "Actual results in terms of employment of minority applicants and treatment of employees without regard to race, creed, color or national origin determine whether a contractor is in compliance with the Executive Order." We have a right to see these "actual results" before further federal money is given. That is the law. And I specifically call upon Secretary Shultz to exercise his authority in these cases. As I stated on an earlier ocassion:

> If the Department of Labor does not exercise its authority in this matter, the Federal Executive Order calling for nondiscrimination in hiring, promotion, and other areas by firms doing business with the government is dead and buried and with it one of the nation's last best hopes for ending discrimination in employment.

FOR IMMEDIATE RELEASE
March 28, 1969

STATEMENT OF SENATOR EDWARD M. KENNEDY
CHAIRMAN, SUBCOMMITTEE ON ADMINISTRATIVE PRACTICE AND PROCEDURE OF THE SENATE JUDICIARY COMMITTEE

I want to begin by expressing my thanks to the Administration officials who will appear today, not only for taking the time to join us, but also for the assistance they and their staffs have provided to the Subcommittee. I want to pay special recognition to the Department of Defense, a department which we normally think of as being closed and secretive. In this case it has been most open and candid. It has provided us with all the information and documentation we needed to fulfill our task of analyzing the decision-making processes that led to a most important Department decision. Despite the risk that the release of this information might prove embarrassing, the Department had the confidence, and the faith in the constructive effect of hearings like these, to open itself to scrutiny and to let the chips fall where they may. Such courage and sense of public responsibility should not go unnoticed, and I want to commend you, Mr. Packard, and all those who were responsible for implementing so well in this case President Nixon's wishes for an open government.

I want also to note at the outset that nothing which will be asked or said here today is meant to cast any aspersions on the proved and total personal commitment to equal opportunities of the three principal witnesses. Secretaries Packard, Shultz and Volpe have each in their own enterprises and activities, taken a direct and forceful role in the effort to remove racial barriers from American life.

What we are concerned with today, however, is their institutional commitment, the commitment of their Departments to orderly procedures and to full enforcement of Congressional and Executive policies. Fear abounds in the nation that the trend toward equal rights and open opportunity may have reached a crest, that the new government places a low priority on the vindication of civil rights, that seemingly minor procedural changes mask basic shifts in the government's determination to eliminate segregation and discrimination. And it is not difficult to understand where this fear breeds. When Cabinet and Sub-Cabinet officials make critical decisions in the civil rights field, they do so under a microscope in a bright light. If they do not act firmly, clearly and openly to carry out their civil rights responsibilities, then they suffer a loss of credibility. Unfortunately, that is what has happened to the men who will appear here today. I do not believe they intended it to happen or wanted it to happen, or even knew it would happen. But it has. And our task is to help them see how and why, and then to help them rehabilitate themselves and restore the public confidence in their Departments' full commitment to the principle of equal opportunity.

As we heard yesterday the Government's role in equal employment opportunity dates back 20 years. In 1941, 1961, 1963, 1964, and 1965 three Presidents and one Congress established a structure for insuring job equality in federal employment, federal contracts, federally-assisted contracts, and general commerce. The division of responsibility is clear and logical, although perhaps not perfect or optimal -- Justice has responsibility for all court suits, the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission tries to handle general commerce, primarily through administrative proceedings, each agency handles its own employment and its own contractors, with government-wide supervision by the Civil Service Commission for federal employees, and by Labor for federal contracts, so as to provide consistency and a source of expertise.

Beginning in early 1967 many of these lines of responsibility converged on one industry -- textiles. It was an important one because it employed large numbers of people, had a high turnover in employees, had skill progressions which were relatively easy, held huge amounts of Defense contracts, had plants in areas of population emigration, and had a grossly poor record in employment discrimination and segregation. Private civil rights groups formed a supporting outside team. EEOC, Labor, and Justice divided up the task of reviewing and obtaining compliance. The Department of Defense joined the effort in November of 1967 and began its reviews in January of 1968. During that month officials of Labor, Defense, and EEOC met with the top textile industry corporate executives to acquaint them with the goals of the compliance program and with the government's hope of achieving these goals with all possible mutual cooperation and understanding. By informal understanding Dan River Mills was made the prototype. The chronology was discouraging:

January 1968 -- First compliance reviews -- company found in non-compliance -- affirmative action plan requested.

April 1968 ---- Conciliation conference -- no affirmative action plan submitted.

May 1968 ------ Second conciliation conference -- first plan submitted -- found not satisfactory.

May 1968 ------ Third conference -- 2nd plan submitted -- plan not responsive in achieving compliance.

June 1968 ----- New proposal -- still not responsive.

July 1968 ----- New plan submitted.

August 1968 --- Proposals found unacceptable.

Aug.-Sept. 1968 Compliance reviews of Stevens & Burlington.

Sept. 1968 ---- Stevens & Burlington found in non-compliance -- affirmative plan requested.

Sept. 1968 ---- New Dan River Plan requested by 27th.

Oct. 1968 ----- Dan River says no plan until November 15.

Oct. 1968 ----- DoD requests plan by 28th.

Oct. 1968 ----- Dan River says not until November 15.

November 1968 - New Dan River plan filed -- Burlington, Stevens plans filed and found unacceptable.

December 1968 - Defense Supply Agency recommends rejection of plan.

January 1969 -- OFCC, Justice, DoD meet to evaluate plan and unanimously recommend rejection.

January 9,1969 DoD advises DAS to conciliate further and report on Jan. 31, and in the meantime to award no contracts to Dan River.

Jan. 16-17,1969 DoD meets with and makes final request to Dan River, Stevens, and Burlington for meaningful affirmative action plan.

I go through this chronology in some detail because it brings out several clear facts. The textile industry was a priority one for government action and that action was two years in the making by January of 1969. All of the agencies involved -- and the private groups as well -- worked hard and closely on the project and thus had invested much time, effort, and morale. The agencies had clearly given the industry every opportunity for personal meetings, conciliation, negotiation, revision, and had been in contact with the top executives of the companies.

In short as of January 1969, all eyes, inside the government, in industry, in unions, and in minority communities were on the Department of Defense. A careful groundwork had been laid for the imposition of sanctions and there had been a unanimous agreement among the federal agencies that sanctions were called for. A precedent -- one way or the other -- was in the making, and the viability of the entire federal compliance effort lay in the balance. The memos inside the government reflected this. Assistant Secretary Fitt wrote on January 9:

> The resolution of this compliance case will strongly influence all other efforts in the Textile Project. A comprehensive written plan with Dan River will be an example for the industry.

Deputy Assistant Secretary Moscowitz wrote:

> To upset (DSA's) factual determination would impair the future of the compliance operations and create a justified adverse reaction.

And the Washington Post reported:

> The case is regarded as a precedent-setter and policy test for the Nixon Administration by both industry officials and Government civil rights agencies...Approval or disapproval of the Dan River contract is expected to set the pattern for the industry and, perhaps, for all contract compliance decisions by the Nixon Administration.

The Times said:

> In some respects the issue is even more significant than school integration. It is an issue on which all the Negro and civil rights groups are united...

And so, that was the posture of things on January 20 when the new Administration took office. What happened next can be divided into four problem areas:

1. The question of non-compliance
2. The alternative courses of action
3. The need for a written plan
4. The need for consultation with the Department of Labor.

1. The Issue of Non-Compliance

In granting the contracts to these three textile companies, Deputy Secretary Packard overruled a finding of non-compliance by the Defense Supply Agency. He rejected the recommendations of his own procurement and civil rights advisors.

The long negotiations I have described provide ample evidence of a clear case of non-compliance.

On August 22, Deputy Assistant Secretary Moskowitz spelled out in a memorandum to DSA:

"The Dan River Mills' proposals are unacceptable as presented."

He stressed further:

"The affirmative action plan that results from these discussions with Dan River Mills is of prime importance."

After more months of negotiations, the Defense Supply Agency reported back:

"The company has submitted its plan for achieving compliance; however, it falls short of being sufficiently specific in its details for implementation."

On January 9, 1969, in a memorandum to the Director of the Defense Supply Agency, Assistant Secretary Fitt indicated remaining deficiencies in the Dan River Mills' proposals, and concluded:

"In the mean time no additional contract awards are to be made to Dan River."

On January 23, Dan River Mills said in a letter to Mr. M.R. Shafer, the Contract Compliance Officer in DSA:

"We are not now prepared to make a final commitment nor to submit language relating to the specific proposals made to us."

J.P. Stevens also refused to comply, and on January 30, Lt. Gen. Hedlund sent a memorandum to the Assistant Secretary of Defense for Manpower and Reserve Affairs concerning these two companies:

"This agency has conducted extensive and prolonged conciliation conferences with both of these companies...Areas of disagreement still remain...

"I have determined, pursuant to paragraph V A - 1e(i) of DoD Directive 1100,11, that Dan River Mills and J.P. Stevens have failed to comply with the provisions of Equal Employment Opportunity Clause contained in the contract... It is recommended that you recommend to the Secretary of Labor that sanctions be imposed against each company."

Lt. Gen. Hedlund made the same finding and recommendation on Burlington after its final plan was submitted.

In a February 5 memorandum to the Secretary of Defense, after analyzing the impact of the Equal Opportunity program on textile procurement, Lt. Gen. Hedlund recommended that these three companies be passed over on the immediate contract.

On February 4, Deputy Assistant Secretary Moskowitz recommended to the Acting Assistant Secretary:

"I would proceed with a finding of non-compliance, notice of intent to find ineligible for future contracts and the opportunities for a hearing."

He reiterated this recommendation in a memorandum to Packard himself, in which he said that approval of the compliance plans "would not be consonant with the facts." He said in that memorandum: "The DSA requests were appropriate and what was required for the achievement of compliance by the companies."

Notwithstanding all of these adverse findings and recommendations, Deputy Secretary Packard chose to ignore the finding of non-compliance by DSA and the recommendations of his Equal Employment Opportunity Advisors.

2. Packard's Options

Several reasonable options, other than overruling the DSA finding, were open to Deputy Secretary Packard, as evident by the recommendations made to him.

-- Continue further negotiations, delaying award of the contract until the matter was resolved one way or the other;

-- In the absence of an acceptable written plan, pass over these three companies and award the immediate contract to the next lowest acceptable bidders;

-- Pass over the companies, give notice of debarment from future contracts, and afford opportunity for a hearing;

-- Pass over the companies, and ask Department of Labor to initiate procedures leading to sanctions.

I might add that it was clear that an immediate, incompletely considered decision was not necessary, and that Mr. Packard had time for further consideration and negotiation before taking so drastic a step as overruling DSA and his EEO officers. Packard's own procurement officer, Assistant Secretary for Installations and Logistics Barry J. Shillito, was one of many to advise that "a week or two delay beyond this date (February 10) would be acceptable." Instead, Packard actually moved the decision date forward by three days.

3. Need for Assurances in Writing

Yesterday, Mr. Bierman, OFCC's Chief Compliance Officer, and Mr. Moscowitz, Deputy Assistant Secretary of Defense for Civil Rights and Industrial Relations, stressed again and again the absolute necessity that any federal government contractor's affirmative action plan be in writing.

A written assurance prevents any present or future misunderstandings between the government and the contractor. It provides an instant frame of reference for further negotiations if any defects appear in the assurances as given. A written plan in itself stands as a declaration of the contractor's equal employment policy, and can be incorporated by reference into the contract. Finally, and perhaps most importantly, if the contractor should in any matter stray from his assurances, only if they are written can the government confidently enforce those assurances.

These policy reasons are important, but they are not the only reasons that an affirmative action plan must be in writing. The regulations promulgated by the Office of Federal Contract Compliance (Sections 60-120 and 60-140) both of which were placed in the record yesterday, clearly provide that before a contractor can be found to be in compliance with the order, "it must make a specific commitment, in writing," to correct any deficiencies. The commitment must include the precise action to be taken and dates for completion. These regulations were issued under the direct authority of Executive Order 11246 and provide the legal boundaries within which any governmental action can be taken.

A Defense Procurement Circular [illegible] 67, issued on January 31 of this year -- just seven days before contracts were awarded to the three textile firms we are concerned with in these hearings -- contained specific revisions to the Armed Services Procurement Regulations. This circular points out that among the "major changes in the regulations is the following: "contractors are required in section 12-815 to develop and maintain a written affirmative action compliance program for each of their establishments." Two sections of these regulations are taken almost verbatim from the OFCC Regulations quoted above. In addition, Defense Supply Agency booklet published in November of 1968 -- a booklet sent to each firm doing business with the federal government -- states the requirement that the company equal employment policy exists in writing in precise terms.

Surely these regulations have the force of law in the Executive Branch and provide a clear mandate that affirmative action plans, even when agreed to among gentlemen, must be in writing.

Even if we go back a few years, we find emphasis on the desirability of putting every compliance assurance in writing. Mr. Bierman, who testified yesterday, wrote to the Defense Department's Director of Equal Employment Opportunity Policy on August 28, 1967, that to be in compliance, a government contractor "must make a specific commitment, in writing." And if we bring this matter up to date -- to January 9 of this year -- we find a memorandum from the Assistant Secretary of Defense for Manpower and Reserve Affairs observing that "a comprehensive written plan with Dan River will be an example for the industry." It is inconceivable to me that in the face of two sets of regulations, such specific correspondence, and the employment histories of the three textile firms involved, anything less than a precise written assurance would be accepted as a basis on which multimillion dollar contracts would be awarded. And it is just not fair to the thousands of other contractors who filed written plans that these companies would be given special treatment. Moreover the Administration's attempt to gloss over this entire issue completely is almost as astounding. For in an opinion letter from the Office of Legal Counsel to Secretary Shultz at the end of February not a single line was addressed to the question whether the Deputy Secretary of Defense acted within the law when he accepted vague oral assurances instead of precise written ones from the three textile firms.

4. Responsibility of DoD to Consult with Labor Department

Both the Executive Order and the OFCC regulations make clear that the Department of Labor plays a central role in all federal contract compliance policies. The E.O. says "the Secretary of Labor shall be responsible for the administration" of the federal contract compliance provisions. And the OFCC regs require prior submission of all other agencies regs and orders for prior approval of OFCC.

From the inception of the special textile program in 1967, the Office of Federal Contract Compliance in the Department of Labor has been in a key position. OFCC has been in constant contact with the Department of Defense in attempting to bring the textile mills into compliance. During 1967 and 1968 a number of letters passed between DoD and OFCC reaffirming the need for joint approval of decisions in the textile program. And this past Wednesday the Senior contract compliance officer from OFCC participated in the negotiations that resulted in approval of Burlington Mills' written affirmative action program.

With this background it would be most surprising if contracts were awarded to non-complying textile mills without the approval -- in fact without the knowledge -- of the Office of Federal Contract Compliance. Yet this is exactly what happened. On February 6, 1969, the Acting Director of the OFCC wrote the Deputy Secretary of Defense and stressed the importance of the textile program. He also volunteered the sanction power of OFCC in dealing with non-complying companies. Yet this same man, the Director of government-wide efforts in the contract compliance field, was to learn of the award of three textile contracts only after the fact through the news media.

In fact a number of memoranda sent to Mr. Packard advised him that consultation with Secretary Shultz would be in order. Yet the Secretary of Labor was apparently consulted only at the last moment, before the companies were called together and awarded the contracts. The following day, February 8, Mr. Packard circulated a memorandum to various offices -- including Mr. Shultz's -- stating that " the contractors involved have assured me they will take further actions in connection with the problems involved."

This February 8 memorandum relayed no specifics, and, as if it never existed, Secretary Shultz wrote Deputy Secretary Packard on February 12, 1969, as follows:

> As of the last meeting at which OFCC participated, following a number of conferences with top officials of firms involved, it was agreed by DoD and Labor that the contractors were not in compliance with the Executive Order. On February 7 you informed me that you had met with the top officials of these firms and had satisfied yourself that they had taken affirmative action in respect to both their employment and company housing policies. In view of our continuing interest in this matter, and in accordance with various provisions of the rules and regulations of EO 11246, would you please send me a full report of the assurances the companies have given you and the steps they have taken which will put them into compliance with the Executive Order.

Mr. Packard's reply of the next day outlined deficiencies found by DSA in the three companies' plans and concluded that the mill officials "have assured me that their companies will implement affirmative actions plans to achieve the results contemplated under the Executive Order." In orher words, Mr. Packard's reply specified no precise assurances given by the companies.

Secretary Shultz was apparently unconvinced of the validity of Mr. Packard's action, for he then requested from the Justice Department an opinion on its legality. On March 5, following the receipt of that opinion, which I have mentioned previously, the OFCC and DoD agreed on a format for following through on the Packard agreement, and Secretary Shultz released a statement that he intended to see that the contractors comply with the regulations against discrimination and take appropriate affirmative action. That was interesting, but it reflected the fact that for most of a month he had been in the dark as to what was unfolding in his domain.

I want to say one word about the broader context of the questions we are raising in this hearing. This committee is interested in the enforcement of equal opportunity in employment by federal government contractors because the law requires it. But the law does not require it only for the benefit of our black citizens or other minority groups. The ability of people to find work is central to all our hopes for preserving peace in our cities, for cutting down the welfare rolls, and for our other domestic priorities. When the McCone Commission investigated the riots in Watts, it found the number one cause was lack of jobs. This was also the case with riots examined all over the country. When we look at our growing welfare burden, it is obvious that the best solution is to help people get off welfare and give them work. If a man wants a job and is qualified for it, but cannot get it because he is discriminated against, I do not see how we can ask him to be satisfied with his community. I do not see how we can ask him to be a peaceful and contented citizen if he cannot feed his family. If our minority citizens feel the federal law is not being enforced, this can result in grave problems for all of us. But if the citizens know that the laws concerning equal opportunity in employment are being enforced, this will be very important toward reducing racial tension in this country. That is why this area of inquiry is so very important.

The Southern Labor 'Shortage'

Lawyer's Advice Not Intended to Overcome It

SPOKESMEN for the southern textile industry have made a practice of complaining about the "labor shortage." They observe many of their erstwhile employees leaving for better jobs in more progressive industries and they are disturbed; so they wring their hands and complain.

The latest apologist for the industry to weep in public over this situation is Frank Constangy, who is described in the textile trade press as "the South's leading labor authority." Actually, Constangy is an attorney who specializes in helping southern textile employers prevent their workers from forming unions.

Whenever southern textile workers become fed up with their working conditions and try to form a union, they are likely to encounter Constangy—or other lawyers who have adopted his tactics. Workers may not actually see him or his imitators, but they will surely come across the legal roadblocks which he advises their employers to place in their paths. And if they stick to it long enough to establish a union, they will be likely to meet him or other practitioners of his tactics of delay at the bargaining table.

But Frank Constangy is concerned with important matters these days. In a recent interview, Constangy said that "textile mills may be . . . under-emphasizing the labor situation. . . . Reduction of available labor is especially hard on mills in or near large cities where job competition is greatest."

What is Constangy's solution?

"Textiles," he says, "needs a more glamorous image. It should tell the world about its air-conditioned plants, personnel benefits and working conditions."

No doubt the image of the textile industry needs improvement. But it's hardly likely to be accomplished through public-relations' puffs. The facts are too obvious for the industry to get away with telling phony stories about how lovely it is to work in the mill.

If the industry were to tell the world the truth, it would have to admit that thousands of textile mills are not air-conditioned, while those that are have set their conditions to meet fiber processing requirements, rather than the needs of human comfort.

The industry's "personnel benefits" are so substandard that it is difficult to see how they could be used to impress the waiting world.

- Average straight-time hourly earnings for southern textile mills are $2.11 —83¢ or 28% below the average for all factory workers.
- The maximum paid vacation provided in southern textile mills is generally two weeks compared to four weeks in most other industries.
- The typical southern textile provision is for two or three paid holidays while employees in other industries receive eight to 10 holidays a year.
- The workers have to pay most of the cost of insurance benefits in southern textile mills while other industries generally provide higher benefits and the employer pays the entire cost.
- Most southern mills have no pension plans and, where they do exist, they are generally dependent upon profits rather than fixed obligations. By contrast, most other industries provide employer-paid guaranteed pensions.
- Shift premiums are limited to the third shift in southern textiles and amount to 5¢ an hour. Premiums of 5-15¢ are common for second-shift work in other industries and, on third shifts, the premium is generally between 15 and 25¢ per hour.
- The total cost of these fringe benefits in southern textiles averages 14¢ an hour compared to an average of 41¢ in all manufacturing industries.

Constangy's desire to tell the world about textile working conditions is especially puzzling. The fact is that the workers in most southern mills are required to work at a pace which is aptly described as "stretched out." Unlike workers in other industries, they generally have no scheduled rest periods. Indeed, they even have to eat their lunches while tending their machines. It would be surprising if these conditions were to prove attractive to workers who compare textile jobs with the growing opportunities in other industries.

It is time the southern textile industry faced up to reality. No amount of image-building publicity will wipe out the hard facts. The industry's failure to attract more workers is due to the outmoded policies which management pursues:

It pays substandard wages. It provides inadequate fringe benefits. It stretches out its workers and makes no provision for regular rest periods or decent working conditions. And it engages in a conspiracy to use coercion and outright intimidation to suppress every attempt by textile workers to exercise their democratic right to join unions of their own choosing—so they can do something about making the textile industry a good place in which to work.

What the Bosses Say in Private

When leading textile mill executives talk "within the family," they generally do not kid themselves with the Constangy evaluation of what is needed to overcome the industry's labor shortage. The Constangy approach is strictly for public consumption.

The Daily News Record, the textile trade paper which originally carried the interview with Constangy, reports further that it is the concensus of leading textile mill men that "despite the frequency of wage advances in recent years, the industry is still behind the general industrial wage level."

"Despite the improvements in textile mill working conditions, the labor supply gets tougher with each passing day, they declare," says the trade paper. "No longer is it merely a walk down to the mill gate or yard for a plant foreman to pick up an 'extra' hand. Time was when a foreman could pick up any number of replacements for absentees —but this is a thing of the past. 'Blue Mondays' have become 'blue weeks' and the shortage of workers becomes more troublesome each day."

Daily News Record reports that "mills have introduced all types of programs to recruit workers: educational programs, high school seminars, community lectures, worker training programs, aptitude tests for job classifications and many other movements are used to attract new personnel."

Everything, that is, except union conditions—even though southern textile employers are finally conceding that employees of textile mills want a five-day week at the six-day pay basis, and that they are envious not only of higher wages in other industries, but want more time for relaxation and recreation.

In other words, employers are finally getting around to admitting that southern textile workers are not satisfied with the way things are and that, like other American workers, they want the same kind of benefits that unions have brought to employees of more progressive industries.

Packaging Act Falls Short Or Pity the Poor Shopper

Despite more forthright labeling under the two-year-old Federal Fair Packaging and Labeling Act, housewives still can't compare prices in the supermarket, says Consumers Union, the nation's largest consumer advisory organization.

Accordingly, it is recommending an amendment to the law, which would require stores to put unit prices on every package, along with the package price. Unit price is the price per pound, pint or other standard unit of consumption, and is already used for the pricing of meat and poultry at most supermarkets.

CU reached its conclusion after repeating a well-publicized shopping experiment conducted in 1962 by the California Consumer Counsel. Five college-educated housewives were sent to a supermarket with a shopping list of 14 everyday items and told to buy, without regard to brand, the package in each category giving the largest amount at the lowest price.

In 1962, the housewives made 34 wrong choices out of a possible 70. In late October 1968, when CU repeated the test, another five housewives with similar educational backgrounds made 38 wrong choices.

"Why shouldn't all packages be labeled with the price per pound or pint or other relevant unit?" CU asks.

Such a requirement was considered when the law was written but rejected, says the consumer organization, because the drafters of the act decided it might be too costly for the small, independent grocer.

CU says, however, that the requirement could be fulfilled without much difficulty:

"Since manufacturers could not usually print prices on their packages without violating the laws against price-fixing, the price labeling job would fall, as it does now, to the retailer. But regional offices of supermarket chains could readily include unit prices on the master price lists sent to all store managers, and suppliers could equip small groceries with easy-to-use price tables. The extra cost, if any, would probably prove negligible."

The consumer organization suggests that the price unit "should represent the quantities customarily purchased . . . price per pound, per pint, per 100 paper towels and so forth."

Under Packaging Act regulations, net quantities must be printed in standard form in a well-defined place and in reasonably large type on the front or main panel of every package entering interstate commerce. Also, the quantity must be stated in two ways—total ounces and ounces and pounds (or equivalent units of volume or count). State packaging laws are being revised to conform with the Federal one.

Nonetheless, the number of brands, types and sizes of most of the 14 items on CU's test shopping list—which also included such things as rice, salt, canned tomatoes, toilet tissue and shampoo—had proliferated since 1962. The women this time had to consider 286 different selections, an increase from 246 in 1962. Canned dog foods and pancake mixes were singled out as having greatly proliferated.

Within a two-hour limit for the shopping test, the women took an average of 50 minutes to select the 14 items—seven minutes longer than in 1962. "Not only didn't the shoppers make a reasonable number of correct choices," CU says, "they couldn't—not in any practical terms. It took the five-woman project staff six hours and the services of an electric calculating machine to get all the answers figured out."

'Fair Employment' Isn't Always Fair

William Raspberry

ONE OF THE HARDEST concepts to get across, to private and government employers alike, is the difference between integration and nondiscrimination.

It is for this reason, more than for reasons of overt racism, that many employers who warmly endorse the idea of fair employment go into an absolute tizzy over anything that hints of what they describe as "reverse discrimination."

The fact that "fair employment" has come to be accepted as a matter of routine hiring policy represents a good deal of progress, it must be acknowledged.

But for many employers, the progress has stopped at that point. Except for dyed-in-the-wool racists, most employers will, when confronted with a black applicant who is even marginally better qualified than a white one, hire the black applicant. Those who consider themselves enlightened may hire the black applicant even when he is only equally qualified or perhaps marginally less qualified.

This is "fair employment," and many employers are reluctant to go beyond it.

Even those who see the necessity of going further find it difficult to talk about it. Someone is sure to confuse matters by introducing discussions of "merit" hiring and promotion and "reverse discrimination."

The concept behind merit employment is that, given two applicants for the same job, the better qualified one should be hired. It is this concept that has resulted in so many holders of master's degrees delivering mail for the Nation's post offices.

THE REASON for this is that we have somehow decided that a man with a master's degree is better qualified for any job than a man who has only a high school diploma. Common sense tells us it ain't necessarily so.

It may be talking out of school, but an illustration of the difference between nondiscrimination and integration is what is happening at newspapers across the country, including The Washington Post.

When the long hot summer became an American institution, big-city newspapers discovered that it was to their advantage to have black reporters on their staffs. Without either acknowledging any past discrimination against black applicants or any decision to lower standards, these newspapers managed to find black newsmen.

(Those papers that have found it advantageous to have black distributors of their product likewise have hired them.)

These same newspapers, however, have made substantially less progress in their clerical, accounting and advertising departments —not because they have been discriminating against Negro applicants but because they have been relying on mere nondiscrimination.

BECAUSE nondiscrimination and integration aren't the same thing, they require different techniques for their implementation.

The newspaper that decides to be scrupulously nondiscriminatory in its advertising department will weigh carefully the qualifications of every applicant. If no Negro happens to apply, well, whose fault is that?

But let that same newspaper decide that it is in its own best interest to have an integrated news staff. No longer do its executives sit back and wait for "fair employment" to work its way. They look for ways to achieve integration.

If the long hot summers have demonstrated anything, it is the need to show to members of minority groups that they, like all Americans, have a stake in the society. One way to accomplish this is to make certain that the society, at every level, is a fair reflection of its components.

That is to say that integration is an important goal in its own right. Once the decision is made to integrate the Nation's work forces, in government and out, it is a simple matter to do so.

IN THE ABSENCE of such a decision, integration is at best an intolerably slow process.

So strong is the grip of past discrimination that it will take a good deal more than mere nondiscrimination to break it now.

Newspapers and police departments, among others, have discovered the value of an integrated work force, and their progress has been amazing. Somehow, without tampering with their standards, they have managed to find the hitherto elusive qualified black applicants.

It is time now that the rest of our society made the same discovery. The dividends may include the very survival of the Nation.

YOUNG TUTORS TRY SLUM EXPERIMENT

Fifth-Graders' Help Is Basic in Coast Primary School

By STEVEN V. ROBERTS

Special to The New York Times

PACOIMA, Calif., June 14—Ronnie Celestine, a 5-year-old with a broad smile and thick glasses, was carefully pasting a series of letters on a piece of construction paper. When he put one down backward, the teacher gently showed him the mistake.

"Is that the right way?" asked the teacher, Larry White. "Does that look like the other ones?"

It was a normal kindergarten scene, except for one thing. Larry White, the "teacher," is 10 years old.

He and 75 other fifth and sixth graders in the Pacoima elementary school are participating in an experimental program run by the Systems Development Corporation, a nonprofit research organization and financed by the Ford Foundation.

"Ghetto" in Suburbia

The town chosen for the experiment is a "pocket ghetto" in suburban Los Angeles, and the school is 45 per cent Negro, 40 per cent Mexican-American, and 15 per cent white.

Since September, the youngsters have spent one hour a day tutoring kindergarten and first-grade pupils. The ultimate objective of their efforts, according to the project directors, "is a radical change in the total atmosphere — the school must become a learning community with its various members joined in a common effort to improve the learning of all."

"The biggest need throughout education is for a teacher to deal with individual students," said Dr. Ralph J. Melaragno, one of the co-directors. "But it is physically impossible for even the best teacher to do that when she has a class of 30. Using these tutors is a way of reaching individual students with individual needs."

Young tutors have been used before in elementary education, but usually for remedial or extra-enrichment programs. In Pacoima, the tutors are a basic part of the everyday school experience.

"Kids relate better to other kids than to adults" explained Dr. Melaragno, who, with his colleague, Gerald Newmark, has been experimenting in elementary education for a decade. "Most of what kids learn is from their peers anyway, so we're trying to capitalize on that and teach what the schools want them to learn."

How tutors and students "relate" to each other was evident one morning recently in the kindergarten classroom of Miss Judy Walsh, 25.

The class was grouped into six centers of activity, each supervised by a tutor. Larry White was directing the "academic table" and its alphabet exercises. Kate Suda, a 10-year-old, was overseeing a painting corner. Some youngsters were making paper ties and writing messages on the back to their fathers. Other groups were reading, studying alphabet cards, and playing with puzzles.

"I was very skeptical at first," said Miss Walsh, "and we had our problems."

"But now they're like an extra set of right arms; I could not do without them," she said.

On Reading Achievements

The specific achievements of the kindergarten classes they have not yet been tested, but Miss Walsh said that at least 10 youngsters had already finished the second first-grade reader. In her four previous years in the school, no child had ever been able to read the book at all.

Miss Walsh also feels that the tutorial system has created a more positive attitude toward learning.

"I had one child who had been wrestling with a problem, and when he finally finished it, he marched out of the class and right into his tutor's room to show him," the teacher said. "And the kids really like having a "big friend" who says hello to them all the time."

Tutors also have benefited from the experience. "Their parents are overhwelmed by their new poise and sense of responsibility," said Miss Walsh. "Some of them tell me they're even tutoring their brothers and sisters at night."

"These kids show us how to improve ourselves," said Len Marshall, who was working with a slow reader. Kate Suda added: "I like to look at their paintings. They have some real creative ideas. Sometimes they say some real weird things, but it's nice."

At first, teachers found it difficult to have extra people in ther classrooms and did not know how to use them. Some of the tutors lost patience with their youthful charges. But the teachers report that these problems are working themselves out.

Next year, tutoring will take place in all grades. The seven-year project intends to create a self-sustaining structure that will continue when the extra professional staff leaves. The directors also hope to provide a model for other school districts. Philadelphia has already sent an observer to study the experiment and numerous other areas have made inquiries.

What's ahead . . .

Rising living costs are prompting unions to talk about reopening wage negotiations this year and limiting future contracts to a year or two.

Runaway prices are also making unions even more insistent about cost-of-living "escalator" clauses in new labor agreements.

The International Ladies' Garment Workers' Union, among others, is seriously considering asking employers to bargain for higher pay this fall. ILGWU's three-year contract allows one wage reopening before late 1971.

Meanwhile, the International Chemical Workers Union is urging its locals to work toward annual negotiations (they now have three-year agreements) to provide "a better opportunity to catch up with the inflationary spiral."

Even before John L. Lewis's passing, leadership problems were developing in the United Mine Workers.

Although Mr. Lewis, long retired and inactive, has been little more than a symbol in UMW, his departure may make the incumbent regime of W. A. (Tony) Boyle even shakier. Mr. Boyle moved up to the union's presidency with Lewis support.

For some time, a rank-and-file revolt against Mr. Boyle was largely disorganized. Now Joseph Yablonski, an international official from Pittsburgh since 1942, has announced that he'll oppose Mr. Boyle in UMW's election this fall. He is expected to have strong backing from Eastern locals that objected to Mr. Lewis's choice of Mr. Boyle, a staff man, over someone from the coal mines when new leadership was considered.

Cracks are showing up in the barriers that have long stood in the way of low-cost, factory-built housing.

In the past, construction unions have insisted, militantly, that construction work must be done on the site.

Now 12 building-trades unions in the Detroit area have signed what they call a "pioneering" agreement with Lebon Homecorp., headed by Negro builder Lebon Walker. The pact covers factory manufacturing and on-site erection of low-cost homes.

The unions call the agreement a "recognition of realities"—of the need to provide large numbers of inexpensive homes quickly.

As a national pattern, they say this pact could have "far-reaching implications for the entire housing industry."

But more might be involved. It's significant that the prefabrication agreement is in an area where Walter P. Reuther and his United Automobile Workers are strongest. They've been threatening to move into factory-built housing if the building trades won't sanction prefabrication.

Detroit is also an area where black militants have been condemning the crafts for a role in retarding low-cost housing and for race bias.

Trends . . .

The United States Department of Labor recently helped nine young men go down to the sea—as shrimpers.

The group, trainees from the Houston area, were given eight weeks of basic training under the federal Job Opportunities program.

Initial stress was on handling trawl gear, repair of nets, seamanship, first aid, engine and machinery care, navigation, and the handling and care of the catch.

Now they have jobs on vessels in a fleet operated by Felix Burney of Houston. They are earning $1.60 an hour at the start, with advances scheduled every 12 weeks.

Can a mainland worker find happiness picking pineapples in Hawaii?

The Dole Company, the Hawaii State Labor Department, and the Department of Labor in Washington weren't sure. But they decided to experiment by recruiting and flying in about 50 mainland workers to fill a gap in Hawaii's pineapple fields.

The pickers have a six-months' contract to work on Oahu or on Lanai. Like the shrimpers, they're making $1.60 an hour, with an incentive plan for higher earnings.

The men have a variety of backgrounds, often not in agriculture. One admits he thought pineapples grew on trees.

Most are glad they came. Many plan to stay on in Hawaii when their contracts expire.

Dole has high hopes this program will develop a much-needed new source of labor during the crucial harvesting months.

You may think they went out with the kerosene lamp. But the Labor Department's report on manpower needs says otherwise.

Among "growth occupations," it notes an annual need for 600 new horseshoers and 1,700 railroad telegraphers who know the Morse code.

Employers Reminded On Rights

By Ellen Hoffman
Washington Post Staff Writer

Several major Washington employers have lagged in providing equal employment opportunities for Negroes, a top Federal official said yesterday.

"It is reasonable to expect that a company whose consumers are 70 per cent black" and that is located in and serves Washington "would have a comparable number of black employes," the newly appointed head of the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission said.

William H. Brown III, who has been in office for about five weeks, addressed about 60 employment specialists from Federal and local agencies yesterday afternoon. Law forbids him from identifying these employers, he said.

He suggested that the employment specialists scrutinize Washington's city government and local industries to determine whether they are hiring Negroes for many jobs above the clerical level.

"Equal opportunity is nowhere near where it must be" in Washington or in the Nation, he said.

Too much emphasis has been placed on training "hard-core unemployed" persons, Brown said, instead of getting at the causes of the unemployment.

Referring again to Washington, Brown noted that Federal agencies are moving to the suburbs and creating a "glutted inner-city labor market."

Some employers have set up programs to train hard-core unemployed persons "as a stalling tactic" against removing discrimination, Brown charged.

He also said that some companies discriminate against members of minority groups inadvertently.

Thompson Report Exposes Extent Of Violations by Textile Bosses

By PAM WOYWOD
Staff Writer

It was the second morning of the 1968 TWUA convention. The mood of the delegates up to this time had been one of pride and rejoicing for the past years' achievements. In addition, there was enthusiasm and hope for the future.

However, as the morning wore on, the mood shifted drastically. The speaker for that morning session was Rep. Frank Thompson Jr., (D.-4th) of New Jersey. It was his speech to the assembled delegates which caused the shift in mood. The speech was the result of his having chaired the House special subcommittee on labor during 1967 and 1968.

Much of it was a grim account of the testimony he had heard over those long months. It was obvious that those months had shaken his faith in the National Labor Relations Act and its power to deter unfair labor practices.

He first explained that he and his fellow subcommittee members had heard that some employers deliberately flouted the law and got away with it. Therefore, they decided to hold public hearings in order to test the truth of these "rumors."

"We were ably assisted by officers, employees and members of this great union," he reported. "President Pollock was one of our lead-off witnesses. He presented an overall picture of labor-management relations in the southern textile industry which was almost unbelievable. The testimony left no doubt that some employers deliberately violated the law."

The complete report of those hearings has now been published. Most of our readers are fully aware of the horrors that were testified to in those hearings even though they, themselves, might not have had the same miserable experiences. Textile Labor readers don't have to be reminded what their brothers and sisters have gone through.

However, what our readers would be interested in learning from that report is the large part TWUA members and staff played in helping the congressmen come to the above judgment, how the report spurred the congressmen into making recommendations for solving the problems. One has only to read the report to realize that TWUA has made a significant contribution to the future history of labor and legislation for justice for all of the employed in this nation.

In his testimony, Pollock clarified the entire malicious plan that employers carried out against employees who wanted and needed union representation (See TWUA pamphlet, "Conspiracy in Southern Textiles").

The subcommittee's report borrows heavily from his testimony. He recounted the fact that all of these employers followed the same pattern in stopping or breaking union activity: the language of the propaganda was the same; there was a predictable schedule of harassment and job-firings; the same unacceptable demands were offered by management in any negotiation; and, if a company had plants in the north and south—these practices usually took place only in the south.

Finally, the same law firms and management-consultant firms popped up in each case.

The testimonies that followed documented TWUA's premise that there was a well-planned and determined conspiracy to defraud workers of their rights and to disregard the law. It was also clear that the penalties for so doing were less than the gains made from union-busting and the domination of employees.

Page after page of the report features TWUA members and organizers telling their stories of beatings, arrests for leaflet distribution, refusals from local organzations to rent halls to them and intimidation from foremen and other company officials. They also told of community "big-shots" discriminating against them by using bank loans or doctor bills to force union members into a corner. Criminal acts by police and local sheriffs occurred in every testimony. Jobs lost, suits filed, delays, delays and delays—and when the last ruling was made, those who had survived got little more than their back pay.

Our people were not the only ones to tell these stories. An organizer from the United Auto Workers told of his experience in Nebraska where no one would rent a motel room to him until he got 50 miles away from the target town. Then the local banker called in the loans of workers who signed cards. A local lawyer called men in to warn them of what would happen to them if they didn't stop trying to organize.

Meat cutters in Tennessee and clothing workers in Georgia were fired and their organizers beaten.

Everything that has happened to us has happened to other unions . . . and not just in the south. It was obvious that the tactics learned in the southern mills were creeping into newer and wider areas. The employers learned that the Labor Relations Act could be ignored. And, if these tactics aren't stopped, labor will be forced back into the decades of the pre-Wagner Act.

TWUA and all union members should give great credit to the foresight of the subcommittee members for their immediate grasp of this fact. Their recommendations would go far in stopping this galloping rush toward the garbage trough that employers consider to be employees' rights.

PAGINATION INCORRECT

Report Is Searing Indictment of . . .

Textile workers can take further pride that these recommendations follow closely those that TWUA outlined in a brochure entitled, "The Hollow Promise":

- Double and treble damages to be assessed against violators of the law;
- Disqualification from government contracts for repeated violators;
- Immediate reinstatement for employees who have been found to be improperly discharged—even if an appeal is to be made;
- Those who live or operate in the community and are acting in the employer's interest should be considered in the same category as agents of the employer.

In addition to the above recommendations that TWUA asked for in direct testimony, the congressmen offered others. These arose from hearing the long recitals of woe and hardship from TWUA and other union members.

- Enforcement of the Civil Rights Act that forbids surveillance and beatings of persons pursuing their rights;
- In those localities which forbid leafleting or contain traffic ordinances prohibiting the same on roads and highways, "NO TRESPASS" signs on the company property will not be considered reasonable and could cause the NLRB to rule an election invalid;
- If an organizer, etc., is arrested under unconstitutional ordinances, he may remove his case to a federal court immediately;
- The NLRB can deny the right to counsel or practice before itself to any law firm which advises violation of its laws;
- The NLRB can delegate greater finality to its examiner's decisions and refuse to review unless two or more of the board decide a case warrants review;
- NLRB rulings should be self-enforceable and not dependent on court rulings.

It was the testimony of these four TWUA members plus that of General President William Pollock, second from right, and others, which stunned the Special House Subcommittee on Labor during hearings in 1967 and 1968 into realizing the extent of violations of the law by textile employers.

What these mean in relation to a union person's life can be illustrated in the following fictitious but easily identifiable case:

Jim West and Bill Cord telephone the nearest TWUA office and ask for some help with their problems in their mill. The employees of Storm Mills are upset about the low pay, promotion by favoritism and the meanness of some foremen. They had agreed that a union could help.

After a call, an organizer from the union arrives in town and calls a meeting. At the meeting, the organizer explains how an organizing campaign is carried on, and all agree to work.

It is discovered that their town prohibits leaflet passing on the streets. The plant is located on the highway and there is a law against slowing traffic, etc. The only available place to pass their leaflets inviting workers to an organizing meeting is at the gate. Bob Merritt, the organizer, and a few of the men who are free during the morning shift, stand out at the gate on Wednesday morning and hand out the leaflets.

The next morning, when they arrive at the gate, there are "No Trespass" signs everywhere and five or six guards at the gate. They leave. (*Under the recommendations, the signs could become an immediate cause for an NLRB ruling. See below.)

On Friday, the director of the community hall phones Jim and says that their rental permit has been canceled. The men decide to hold the meeting in the supermarket parking lot, which is empty after 7 p.m. While the speeches are being made, the chief-of-police and eight policemen appear and order the people to go home. When some angry shouts are directed at the police, the chief gives the "go-ahead" and arrests are made, plus some beatings.

Those arrested remain in jail for a week because the judge cannot seem to be found to arrange bail. (Under the recommendations, a lawyer, representing those arrested, could go to the federal court and immediately remove these cases to the federal court, thereby releasing the people from jail and later exonerating them during the trial—violations of the right to assemble.)

That night, Bob observes a car following him everywhere he goes. When he returns to his motel, it pulls in the motel court and four men go into the motel coffee shop. Bob goes into his room and tries to get a few hours of sleep. It is 3 a.m. A half hour later, a knock on the door jolts him awake. No one answers his, "Who's there?" He doesn't open the door. Finally, "Sheriff's office" reassures him and he opens the door. The four men, one in a deputy's uniform, enter and start hitting him with rubber hoses. His papers are torn up and some are stolen. Although no bones are broken, he is badly bruised and has a slight concussion.

(The recommendations state that this is a civil rights case and can be prosecuted under the 1968 Civil Rights Act. The rights violated in this case are free speech, free assembly and the right to organize a union.)

Therefore, Bob could and should file a suit in the federal court.

In spite of all this harassment, 72% of the workers in the plant sign the cards and these are filed with the NLRB, calling for an election. During the waiting period until the board can order an election, company officials and their lawyers force the workers to attend meetings in the plant. The lawyers warn the workers that their jobs are in jeopardy if they continue to organize.

(The report would have the lawyers and their firm barred from any further practice before the NLRB again. Now a firm cannot retain a client if one of its functions is eliminated, so this is a real threat.)

Jim and Bill are fired and an unfair practices suit is filed. While they are awaiting the hearing, the election is held and the union loses. (The recommendations would allow a new election because of the signs.*)

Four months later, the trial examiner hears Bill's case and he wins. (Now, under the recommendations, two things can happen. First, if the trial examiner has more finality, Bill's case probably won't be reviewed and if the NLRB's decisions are self-enforceable, the case won't have to go to court. Secondly, Bill will be reinstated immediately. This would be true even if appeals were made. He would be working while they are in progress.)

The second point is of greater importance. In addition to the problems it solves for the discharged employees, it cuts into the central nerve of the employer's strategy, as quoted within the report, "It's cheaper to fire employees mixed up in union affairs, even if you have to pay their back pay."

Reinstatement will offer them no advantage to fire the employee. Being fired will not work as a scare tactic nor as a means of cutting-out the leaders. The salary lost hurt the discharged employee so much that it had been the main terror tactic, much more than physical abuse. If there were a number of firings, there also were corporate savings in interest and tax losses.

(The recommendations would double or triple any back salary losses, which would be a further deterrent. None of these recommendations would affect the honest employer who discharges an employee for a validated evaluation of his performance on the job.)

We come next to those community "leaders" who harassed the employees —the bankers who threatened them with foreclosures on their mortgages; the doctors who refused treatment unless cash was prepaid from men and women whom they knew had no money; the merchants who harassed the workers about their bills and counseled "making up" with the boss; the minister who preached sermons about "union servants of the devil, bent on destroying the town"; etc., all of these are presently untouched by the law as they do not fall within the definition of "agent". The congressmen would change that definition and also consider their actions an unfair labor practice.

The biggest "club" of all, the one that would be the deciding factor in stopping these practices, is to prohibit these employers, such as J. P. Stevens, for example, from bidding on federal contracts. As repeated violators of the law, they finally would be treated as the criminals they are. (See page 6).

This is what these recommendations would mean to working men and women everywhere, but especially in the south. The undersigned of the report, Reps. Thompson, James O'Hara, Hugh Carey, James Scheuer, John Brademas, William D. Ford, Carl Albert and Ogden Reid, are willing to fight for these recommendations in Congress.

However, as one informed source stated in an interview, "This Congress is not going to pass any labor legislation on the employees' side. The subcommittee was dissatisfied with its original bill after the hearings, but even that bill could not have made it through. They hope to hold further hearings this year on the sections controlling "negotiations in good faith," after the parent committee (Labor and Education) is finished with its business."

He further pointed out, "Except during the hearings, there has been little publicity on the report. We are in great need of articles of the type your union is doing and the publicity TWUA and other unions can give to these issues. Only then can voters return congressmen to Washington who will enact fair legislation for employees."

TWUA returns the compliment and pledges to spread the important information contained in the report to its membership and, through them, to the greatest number of voters it can reach.

At a TWUA rally in Charlotte, N.C., on Feb. 24, 1968, Rep. Frank Thompson Jr. gave his wholehearted support to workers who were illegally discharged by J. P. Stevens. Here, the Congressman congratulates Shirley Hobbs for the courage she displayed after being harassed and then fired by Stevens. For an account of the vicious way Stevens treated Mrs. Hobbs, see page 6.

Stevens Contemptuous?

Is the Sky Blue?

J. P. STEVENS, like the villain in a 19th Century melodrama, may be on the verge of getting its just desserts. . . . for the NLRB has asked a federal Appeals Court to find the company guilty of contempt for disobeying two previous orders to stop violating the rights of its employees.

As TWUA members well know, Stevens is the nation's most notorious union-busting firm with a long series of NLRB findings and court orders against it. Though the contempt motion asks no criminal penalties, if Stevens —the nation's second largest textile concern and government - approved cloth contractor—is found to be in contempt, it will face criminal charges.

Though it would be impossible to reproduce the NLRB's 13-page petition against Stevens in a single page, a number of specific charges will be detailed so that the "unmitigated gall" of Stevens will not be lost in a sea of generalities.

On Sept. 1, 1967 the court entered its 13-point decree against Stevens, the essence of which was for the firm to stop discharging, forcing the termination of, spying on, interrogating, interfering with, restraining or coercing its employees in the exercise of their right to form, join or assist TWUA.

Just how flagrantly Stevens flouted this decree is recorded in the NLRB's report of the occurrences at Stevens' plant in Rock Hill, S. C., from Dec. 22, 1967 to March 22, 1968:

(1) On about Dec. 22, 1967, Stevens, through Max Bowers, its personnel manager, interrogated Gerald Rodgers as to Rodgers' knowledge of the union activities of a co-worker, Bobby Thompson; solicited Rodgers to report anything he heard about Thompson's activity on behalf of the union; and further interfered with and coerced Rodgers in the exercise of his protected rights by warning that the company would terminate the employment of union activists.

(2) Approximately seven days later, Bowers questioned Thompson as to his union activity; threatened Thompson with reprisals and encouraged Thompson to withdraw from the union.

(3) On about Feb. 7, 1968, Stevens, through Charles Ford, its weaving-room overseer, interferred with and coerced Thompson, and discriminated against him by (a) preparing and reading to him a "write-up" relating to Thompson's conduct on Dec. 19, 1967; (b) by imposing a restriction of Thompson's movements throughout the plant.

(4) Three days later, or thereabouts, Ford warned Thompson of the futility and uselessness of his activities on behalf of the union, accusing Thompson of causing "trouble" by soliciting for the union. Ford then fired Thompson.

(5) Approximately Feb. 9 and March 13, 1968, Stevens, through Bowers, interrogated Rodgers concerning the union activity of other employees; on the latter occasion, Bowers questioned Rodgers as to Rodgers' participation in concerted activity and solicited Rodgers in surveillance of the union activities of his co-workers and to report those activities to Stevens.

The NLRB report then goes on to list 25 violations at other Stevens' plants.

But perhaps the most notorious example of the virtually totalitarian, almost sadistic way in which Stevens treats employees who exercise their lawful right to join a union is the case of Shirley Hobbs:

On about Feb. 6, 1968, Pete Rawlings, acting on behalf of Stevens, interrogated Mrs. Hobbs — who had been previously reinstated by the court's decree—concerning the tape recording she had made on her own time of a notice posted by Stevens on the bulletin board which dealt with the union and the court's decision, and Rawlings demanded that she relinquish her tape recording, thereby interfering with, coercing and restraining her in the exercise of her right to engage in protected union activity.

The next day, Mason Lee, acting on behalf of Stevens, issued Mrs. Hobbs an adverse written personnel action report because of her ties with the union.

At various times from her reinstatement on Jan. 3, 1968, to her second discharge on March 13, 1968, Mrs. Hobbs was harassed and intimidated by Stevens through Rawlings, James Alston, assistant overseer, and other Stevens' officials with the intent of forcing her to terminate her employment.

From about Feb. 20, 1968 to March 13, 1968, Stevens, through Ray Mabry, distributed the production work so that reinstatee Shirley Hobbs was given the more difficult work to do and could not make her production quota.

Finally, on approximately March 13, 1968, Stevens, through Rawlings and Mason Lee, unlawfully discharged reinstatee Shirley Hobbs and thereafter refused to rehire her because of her continued support of the union.

It's a sad commentary on the 20th Century when a company with 19th Century concepts is allowed to perpetrate such grave injustices. It's even more lamentable that the current Administration, in what might be described as something less than infinite wisdom, has seen fit to encourage these injustices by granting Stevens a fat government contract.

If ever a company deserved to be taught the meaning of justice, that company is Stevens. As for the word contemptuous, it is not a word that merely describes Stevens. It is a word that is synonymous with Stevens. Therefore, let us hope the court will find Stevens guilty of contempt, thus paving the way for criminal action and also permitting Justice to get up off the ground.

TEXTILE INFORMATION

AMERICAN TEXTILE MANUFACTURERS INSTITUTE, INC./1120 CONNECTICUT AVE., N. W.
WASHINGTON, D. C. 20036

FOR IMMEDIATE RELEASE

Washington, Feb. ___ --Employment of Negroes in the textile industry has advanced eight times faster than the average for all manufacturing industries since 1960, the American Textile Manufacturers Institute reported today.

An analysis of U. S. Department of Labor statistics shows that of the 984,000 people employed in the textile industry in 1968 some 94,000 were Negroes. This is an increase of 10,000 over 1967.

all jobs or just non-salary?

Latest figures available from the Department of Labor of the State of South Carolina, one of the major textile-producing states, show that Negroes constituted 14.3 percent of the textile mill labor force in South Carolina in 1967. This is a 31 percent increase over 1966.

In 1967, the South Carolina textile industry employed 20,068 Negroes and 120,632 whites. Negro employment in 1967 increased by 6,251, while white employment fell 3,776.

According to the Bureau of Labor Statistics, 3.3 percent of the textile and apparel workers nationally in 1960 were "non-whites." This figure rose to 8.7 in 1967. The all-manufacturing average for "non-white" employment in 1960 was 7.6 percent and 9.3 percent in 1967. In the textile industry, most "non-whites" are Negroes.

Quality of Employment

TEXTILE INDUSTRY FOLLOW-UP BY OTA TASK FORCE

During April 3 thru 11, a task force from the Office of Technical Assistance visited eleven textile companies including twelve facilities in nine counties in the Piedmont area of South Carolina. The current total employment revealed 4,384 jobs including approximately 19.1 percent or 840 held by Negroes.

Despite management's frequent assurances that Negroes are now performing on jobs once considered for whites only, the task force's general impression of the plants visited was that whatever efforts had been expended by management in this direction little tangible results were produced. In those plants where Negroes were in production type jobs, their number was small in comparison to total Negro employment.

The task force found that most of these textile companies rely heavily on referrals of the families of present employees. This practice, undoubtedly, serves to perpetuate the imbalance of Negroes and whites in operating categories. The majority of the companies had never made contact with Negro leaders in seeking minority group applicants.

While most of the companies claimed that there was no formal on-the-job training, it was found that informal training did exist, and in some instances training extended for as long as six months. Only one company had written employment practices and procedures to guide in the supervision and treatment of employees.

The task force made many recommendations to individual companies; in general those recommendations included the following:

1. that management formulate and issue effective written policies regarding equal employment opportunities

2. that management open entry level jobs in the manufacturing process to Negroes, since there is virtually no progression between job categories and departments

3. that management close the communication gap between the company and the Negro community, by utilizing the lists of community contacts submitted by the task force.

Judging from the reception accorded the task force, and the expressed willingness of management to incorporate many of the recommendations into present employment practices, the task force believed that a positive impact was made as a result of the visits.

The outlook for jobs for Negroes in the plants visited is encouraging because of the amount of turnover caused by new industry locating in many of these areas.

To better assess the manpower resources in the areas visited, as well as any company contacts in the communities, the task force spent considerable time in the communities talking with individuals and organizations, a technique found beneficial in the New Plants and Expansion Program.

In September 1968, companies were contacted regarding current employment. From these contacts it was revealed that total employment for eleven companies visited had increased by 269 employees (from 4,384 to 4,653). Total Negro employment reported in September was 1,119 persons - an increase of 279 since the April OTA Task Force visits.

At the time of the April visits Negroes represented 19.1 percent of total employment in the eleven companies. As of September 1968, the percent of Negroes employed in these companies was 24.5 percent - an increase of 5.4 percent in this five month period.

In weighing the significance of the total Negro employment of the companies visited and figures reported during September 1968, it clearly shows that the companies are making sincere efforts to demonstrate credibility by increasing their Negro employment roll.

It should be noted that the total Negro employment during April 1968 was 840 as compared to September, which is 1,119.

Recent staffing of this establishment afforded an excellent opportunity to demonstrate affirmative action on the part of the company. Despite the opportunity, no minority group members were employed in this establishment above the rank of Service Worker. Continuing expansion of this corporate unit will afford opportunities for affirmative action in the area of recruitment and placement.

Textile Mills Hiring More Negroes

By HUGH E. GIBSON
Special Assignment Editor

COLUMBIA — Negro employment in South Carolina textile mills has increased dramatically in the last five years under the joint stimuli of civil rights legislation and labor shortages.

Latest estimates place the number of non-whites holding textile jobs as of June 30, 1968, at 23,700 — or 16.6 per cent of the total 142,700 textile labor foce.

On that same date in 1963, non-whites totaled only 6,357 in the textile mills and accounted for just 4.9 per cent of that industry's total labor force.

The huge jump came in non-white male employment, up from 5,919 and 4.6 per cent of the total labor force in 1963 to an estimated 17,500 last year that accounted for 12.2 per cent of the employment total.

Simultaneously, non-white female employement rose from 338 and .3 per cent of the total work force in 1963 to 6,200 last year, 4.4 per cent of the work force.

Unquestionably, those figures have grown considerably in the intervening months as textile management pushed an active campaign to recruit both Negro men and women.

At two Columbia plants, one reported Negroes constituted 75 per cent of its new hirees in the past six months and the other said they were an even 50 per cent.

WHITE WORKERS

White male employment meanwhile has skidded from 60 per cent of the textile work force in 1958 to 49.4 per cent last year. The comparative figures for white females are 35.3 per cent and 34 per cent, respectively.

Should this trend continue, although no one in the textile industry is saying so, it is not inconceivable that in the not too distant future non-whites will outnumber whites in some textile plants.

Furthermore, although no non-white now is known to hold an executive post, the door is clearly open. And training programs in which non-whites participate equally with whites unquestionably will produce an ever-broadening stream of supervisory personnel.

That was the general picture that emerged Tuesday as The News and Courier probed the validity of charges that the textile industry deliberately discriminates against Negroes.

ACCUSATIONS

The accusations led the Pentagon early this year to withhold defense contracts from J.P. Stevens & Co., Dan River Mills and Burlington Industries.

The contracts, totaling $9.4 million, have since been released and will be executed in part at five South Carolina plants. But the Pentagon has come under severe fire for that action from the congressional civil rights and labor union sectors.

First District Rep. L. Mendel Rivers fired back at the chief critic, Sen. Walter F. Mondale, D-Minn., and issued a "put up or shut up" challenge to document the discrimination charges.

Five years ago, Sen. Mondale could have found all the ammunition he needed in Section 40-452 of the South Carolina Code. It forbade persons of different races from even working together in the same room, simultaneously using the same toilets or even stairways, or appearing together at the same textile pay window.

The penalty was $100 or 30 days in jail, or both, for each offense.

"This section shall not apply to employment of firemen as subordinates in boiler rooms, to floor scrubbers and those persons employed in keeping in proper condition lavatories and toilets or to carpenters, mechanics and others engaged in the repair or erection of buildings," the law stated.

That was the "law of the land" in South Carolina textile plants until Congress enacted the 1964 Civil Rights Act. Atty. Gen. Daniel R. McLeod thereupon declared the state statute "null and void" in an opinion quietly circulated to concerned textile executives.

LITTLE TIME

It was a second "emancipation proclamation," insofar as Negro textile employment was concerned. And Tuesday, surveying what the impact has been, John K. Cauthen, executive vice president of the S. C. Textile Manufacturers Association, marveled that so much has been accomplished in so little time.

"So we really haven't had much time," he pointed out. "I don't see how we've added that many Negroes (in the time available)."

In part, at least the progress has been due to Cauthen's own energetic actions and imagination.

With enactment of the 1964 civil rights law, Cauthen arranged a panel discussion for textile personnel directors. To explain the "realities" of the new situation, he brought before them the current U. S. district attorney, the state's attorney general and a labor relations expert from Greenville.

CAMPAIGNS

The briefing proved so popular it was twice televised over facilities of the S. C. Educational Televison Commission.

In the textile plants themselves, white workers were "prepared" in advance to accept the fact that Negroes would begin working beside them.

There were dire predictions of "trouble" from some quarters, but Cauthen and the textile management people had done their advance work well. Plant integration has been "remarkably successful."

"We've had no problems of any consequence, as among Negroes and whites working together," Cauthen said. "They (management) have been amazed and delighted by it."

The retention rate among new Negro employes has been even higher than among their white counterparts, Cauthen said.

By June 30, 1967, an even 20,000 Negro men and women were employed in the textile mills and shared a payroll that totaled $635.3 million.

The ensuing year saw 3,700 additional Negroes employed and unquestionably well over 23,700 now are sharing in the $2.20 average textile hourly wage.

POPULAR BRIEFING

Active recruiting campaigns to attract and employ Negroes in textiles are commonplace in South Carolina.

"Yes, I think most of your plants now have established relationships with the predominantly Negro schools where they're looking for promising youngsters," he said.

"The same is true for the technical education centers," he added.

Practically all plants now have Negroes in basic textile training and in that training that leads to promotin.

"We'vd been doing that of years," Cauthen commented.

The executive vice president knew of no non-whites in executive positions.

"But I'm satisfied we've got some (as) supervisors," he said.

TEXTILE OFFICES

Negroes also are employed in textile offices in supervisory and clerical positions, but in "minimal" numbers, Cauthen said. Their numbers would be larger, he indicated, if it were not for the difficulty in locating persons with the necessary qualifications.

The number of Negro women employes — a sore point with Sen. Mondale and other critics — would be larger if there were more who could qualify as clerks and stenographers, Cauthen said.

Most Negro textile workers now are in spinning or weaving operations.

"You find them in jobs traditionally performed by (white) women," Cauthen said. "That's even run into the offices, minimally."

Automation, too, has helped to swell the number of Negro women employes by opening to them jobs that were formerly held exclusively by the physically more robust males.

On its face, the only practical limitation on "Negro textile employment appeared to be the fact that a majority of the state's 400 plants are located in the Piedmont, where non-whites are relatively scarce.

Asked whether there are any plans to bus Negroes to the Piedmont mills from such famous "poverty" pockets as Beaufort County, Cauthen smiled and shook his head.

"I doubt that Greenville wants a ghetto," he observed.

ONAL STATEMENT BY SENATOR KUCHEL

TOWER. Mr. President, I ask mous consent that I may yield to enator from California for a few nts, without losing my right to the PRESIDING OFFICER. With- bjection, it is so ordered.

KUCHEL. I thank my able friend Texas.

President, I desire to have the show that the senior Senator California is present. I regret that as detained and could not reach the mber before 20 minutes elapsed dur- the last quorum call. I believe the or Senator from California has a rea- bly decent record of attendance in Senate.

thank the distinguished Senator m Texas.

Mr. TOWER. It was a pleasure to d to the Senator from California. I uld not want anything to be a blot his marvelous escutcheon.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, I thank y able friend.

CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1963

The Senate resumed the consideration the bill (H.R. 7152) to enforce the onstitutional right to vote, to confer isdiction upon the district courts of United States to provide injunctive ief against discrimination in public ccommodations, to authorize the Attor- y General to institute suits to protect onstitutional rights in public facilities and public education, to extend the Com- mission on Civil Rights, to prevent dis- crimination in federally assisted pro- rams, to establish a Commission on Equal Employment Opportunity, and for other purposes.

Mr. TOWER. Mr. President, I wish to address myself in some detail to the Fair Employment Practices section of the bill, H.R. 7152, which, although the mat- ter certainly should be considered sepa- rately, has been included in the pro- posed omnibus legislation as title VII.

The FEPC would subject a great part of American industry to bureaucratic whims, prejudices, and caprices to a de- gree never before contemplated. A hun- dred times a day an employer makes de- cisions affecting his employees. Under this title, every one of those decisions would be subjected to the scrutiny of a Government agent to determine the em- ployer's state of mind when he made such decisions.

If he is a successful businessman, an employer is guided by the primary test of what, is his singular opinion, is best for his business. The employer dis- charges, promotes, demotes, transfers, and gives his orders with that thought as his controlling motive.

Each such act on his part requires se- lection and discrimination among his employees. Each such act is, therefore, subject to the charge that the race, reli- gion, color, national origin, or sex of the employee or employees affected thereby determined, in part, his selection.

Unfortunately, most of us, when passed over for another, are prone to ascribe some reason other than that of relative competence. This bill would open the door for the continual harassment of the employer. The disappointed employee would have a Federal bureaucracy await- ing his beck and call into duty against the employer.

Managing one's business under the conditions of this Fair Employment Practices title would present an unhappy prospect to the employer who desired to comply with the law.

Employers have sometimes found it difficult under the National Labor Rela- tions Act, which imposes the restriction that an employer not discriminate be- cause of his employees' union activity. When a union was attempting to orga- nize under this plan, any discharge or demotion of a union member, irrespec- tive of the justification, insured a visit by a National Labor Relations Board in- vestigator. The employer soon learned that to the test, "Will it be good for my business?" he had to add, "Will it sub- ject me to a possible unfair labor practice charge?"

Mr. President, it is proposed to add five more considerations for the employer to worry about: race, religion, color, na- tional origin, and sex.

There was one solution open to the em- ployer under the National Labor Rela- tions Act: He could sign a closed shop contract with the union, and, with all his employees members of the union, there could no discrimination. Of course, that discriminated against all prospective em- ployers who were not members of the union, but that did not violate the law.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Texas yield?

Mr. TOWER. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. McCLELLAN. The Senator from Texas said the employer could evade or avoid the responsibility under the bill by signing a contract for a closed shop. I believe there are approximately 20 or 21 States in which an employer is forbidden by law from agreeing to a union shop. So in those States he could not agree to a union shop without violating the State law.

Mr. TOWER. That is absolutely cor- rect.

Mr. McCLELLAN. So if an employer undertook to sign such a contract, he would find himself in another predica- ment; would he not?

Mr. TOWER. That is true.

Of course, under the National Labor Relations Act of 1935, immediately fol- lowing its enactment this possibility would have been available to a greater number of employers than it is now, be- cause at that time less than 20 States had on their statute books right-to-work laws.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Yes; I think only 11 States then had such laws.

Mr. TOWER. Yes. But, since that time, approximately 20 States have put on their statute books right-to-work laws; and in such States an employer cannot sign a closed shop contract. Therefore he is subject to a great deal of harassment by the unions and by the Federal officials who are charged with the responsibility of implementing our labor laws.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Texas yield further to me?

Mr. TOWER. I yield.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Assuming that an employer undertook to do that in a State which had enacted a right-to-work law, and assuming that he undertook, let us say, to make an agreement for a closed shop, in a State which had a right-to- work law, would not that action raise a legal question—which would have to be resolved by the courts—as to whether these fair employment practice statutes in effect repealed section 14(b), I believe it is, of the Taft-Hartley Act, which au- thorizes the States, if they desire to do so, to enact statutes prohibiting a closed shop? Would not the question then arise as to whether that statute was repealed or whether the fair employment prac- tice provision, or whatever it is called——

Mr. TOWER. It is called "equal em- ployment opportunity," but it is the old "fair employment practices" proposal.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Yes. Would it not then raise the question of whether the new statute now proposed, by means of the pending bill, had preempted State laws already in existence?

Mr. TOWER. Yes. It would open up a whole Pandora's box of possibilities. Certainly, under section 14(b) of the Taft-Hartley Act, any State is competent to enact a right-to-work law, if it wishes to enact one and to enforce it, without any inhibition by the Federal Govern- ment.

I think the Senator from Arkansas has correctly pointed to the very interesting possibility that we might be getting into some implied repeal of section 14(b) of the Taft-Hartley Act, by means of the proposed enactment of the pending very extensive "fair employment practice" law.

Mr. McCLELLAN. If an employer in a State which had a right-to-work law entered, in dealing with a union, into a contract for a closed shop, could not a prosecution or litigation to restrain the employer from entering into such an agreement be based on the allegation that such an agreement would be in vio- lation of the State law; and, in response, would not the employer be able to plead—although whether he could plead it successfully or not, I do not know— the defense that the pending bill—if then enacted—would, in effect, by implication, have repealed that provision of the Taft- Hartley Act, and thus would have pre- empted the States from enacting a right- to-work law?

Mr. TOWER. It is altogether conceiv- able that he might raise that as a de- fense; and if the matter were pursued through the Federal courts, and if ulti-

Appendix of the RECORD. I am most grateful for the Senator's welcome.

Mr. KUCHEL. I am delighted to see the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I thank the able senior Senator from California.

Mr. TOWER. Mr. President, I am very glad that our good friend from West Virginia has returned to the Chamber. We welcome him. We are glad to observe that he seems to be in robust health.

Mr. RANDOLPH. The Senator from Texas is thoughtful, and I appreciate his remarks.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, the distinguished Senator from Texas [Mr. TOWER] and I serve on the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare with the distinguished Senator from West Virginia. During his recent absence, we missed him greatly. We deeply sympathize with the ordeal he had to go through; and we are delighted to have him back with us. All of us know full well of the very fine work he does in our committee; and all of us know full well, too, of his exceedingly fine work in the Senate itself.

We salute him, and are extremely happy to have him back with us.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I thank the Senator from Alabama. I cherish our friendship of many years, extending back into the 1930's when we were colleagues in the House of Representatives. It is a privilege to serve on the Labor and Public Welfare Committee under his competent leadership.

Mr. BAYH. Mr. President, will the Senator from West Virginia yield briefly to me?

Mr. RANDOLPH. I yield.

Mr. BAYH. Mr. President, I wish to second the remarks of the Senators who have paid their respects to the distinguished Senator from West Virginia.

As a relatively junior Member of the Senate, I wish to state that I have always regarded the Senator from West Virginia as one of the pillars of the Senate; and I have been very happy to serve with him on the Committee on Public Works.

All of us have sent him our prayers.

Now that you are back with us, Senator RANDOLPH, we are more than delighted; and we trust that you will now be able to return to the harness.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, I appreciate the remarks of the Senator from Indiana, and I thank my friends and colleagues, all. Their remarks have been expressed in much too generous terms.

Mr. President, I wish to comment on what the Senator from Indiana [Mr. BAYH] has said about prayer. We know the skill of the surgeon's hands. There are other powers that are very real. Strength comes to a person through prayer, and hope, and faith. I know this through a time of testing.

I recall some lines written by Ella Wheeler Wilcox:

Say you are well, or all is well with you;
And God shall hear your words and make them true.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, will the Senator from West Virginia yield again, briefly, to me?

Mr. RANDOLPH. I yield.

Mr. HILL. Concerning what the distinguished Senator from West Virginia has said, I may say that my father was a physician and a surgeon for 50-odd years. He performed many surgical operations. He always said he could do only 10 percent, and that the good Lord did the other 90 percent.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I thank my friend the Senator from Alabama. I am reminded also of the lines by John G. Whittier which were quoted to me by our beloved Chaplain, Dr. Frederick Brown Harris, as follows:

The healing of His seamless dress
Is by our beds of pain;
We touch Him in life's throng and press,
And we are whole again.

Mr. President, 1 week ago today I entered the Chamber for the first time since my hospitalization. It is a genuine privilege to return again today. I anticipate increasingly frequent attendance.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. TOWER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas.

Mr. TOWER. I should like to address myself again today to the equal employment opportunity section of the civil rights bill. First, I wish to propound a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. TOWER. Are Senators at this moment bound by the germaneness rule?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct.

CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1963

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H.R. 7152) to enforce the constitutional right to vote, to confer jurisdiction upon the district courts of the United States to provide injunctive relief against discrimination in public accommodations, to authorize the Attorney General to institute suits to protect constitutional rights in public facilities and public education, to extend the Commission on Civil Rights, to prevent discrimination in federally assisted programs, to establish a Commission on Equal Employment Opportunity, and for other purposes.

Mr. TOWER. Mr. President, for the benefit of Senators who would probably like to know when the next quorum call will be, in all probability my remarks will take up until about the hour of 2:15, at which time I am reasonably sure there will be a live quorum call.

Again addressing myself to title VII, the equal employment opportunity section of the civil rights bill, on which there was extensive discussion on Monday last, title VII will attempt to impose upon private employers, who are also private citizens, an unprecedented legal obligation by defining a so-called right in other individual citizens, purporting to free them from discrimination by employers in the field of private employment.

Nowhere in the Constitution is there to be found authority giving Congress, by Federal law, the right to control private employment practices to the extent of declaring specifically who an employer may employ in his, the employer's, business. We must not forget that the employer is himself a private citizen with constitutional rights; he should not be deprived of those rights simply because he is an employer.

Some of those who expressed support of this civil rights package prior to reading through it carefully were surprised to find under the equal employment opportunities section, that there is no necessity whatsoever that the employment have something to do with the Federal Government.

This title makes it unlawful for anyone covered by the act to deny so-called equal employment to anybody. Equal employment is defined as all inclusive, covering hiring, all work rules and activities, recruitment, training, and participation in labor unions.

More than 40 million Americans would be covered under this radical law, as would every business engaged in interstate commerce, all labor unions, all Federal contractors, and private contractors in every field in which the Federal Government is active.

I have, in the past, voted against discrimination in Federal programs, and I believe that it is morally wrong to discriminate in employment. But I am opposed to this portion of the administration's civil rights bill because, in its eagerness to protect one civil liberty, the proposal casts aside other fundamental and well-established civil liberties of at least equal importance.

This fair employment practices bill proposes the destruction of the liberties guaranteed to Americans under at least six of the amendments in our Bill of Rights.

The amendments of the Constitution which the bill appears to violate are the 1st, 5th, 9th, 10th, and 13th. They are as follows:

The first, by abridging freedom of speech, religion, and association.

The fifth, by denying freedom of association; denying liberty of contract; denying equal protection under the laws—would operate to guarantee favors to some groups.

The ninth, by proposing that Congress usurp liberties retained by the people.

The 10th, by proposing Federal assumption of a power reserved to the States.

The 13th, by imposing a form of involuntary servitude upon certain groups of employers.

This FEPC proposal vests massive enforcement powers in a Federal Administrator—a nonjudicial officer—and even allows him vast investigative powers.

I have several serious objections to this proposal which, in the name of civil rights, seeks to appallingly expand the control of the Federal Government over citizens and businesses.

there has been persistent effort to include subversive intervention in the concept of aggression by calling it "indirect aggression" and thus to justify military action by states or by the United Nations to stop it. It seems clear that such an interpretation would be contrary to the primary purposes of the United Nations to prevent "the scourge of war" and "to suppress acts of aggression or other breaches of the peace."

The charter makes it clear that any use of armed force by a state in international relations, which includes attacks against public ships on the high seas and across armistice lines, as well as across established boundaries, is forbidden unless necessary for defense against an "armed attack"; unless authorized by the United Nations when faced by a "threat to the peace, breach of the peace or act of aggression"; or unless invited by a state. The recognition in the charter of the "sovereign equality" of states clearly permits a state to use armed force in the territory of another state on the invitation of the latter, but this permission is subject to the conditions that the invitation, even if based on a preexisting treaty, is made freely by the government of the inviting state at the time the force is sent in, that the inviting government is in uncontested control of the state when the invitation is given, and that the forces are used only within the territory of the state issuing the invitation, unless that state is the victim of an "armed attack" from another state justifying "collective self-defense." International law does not permit the use of force in the territory of another state on invitation either of the recognized or the insurgent government in times of rebellion, insurrection or civil war. Since international law recognizes the right of revolution, it cannot permit other states to intervene to prevent it. The United Nations itself cannot intervene to stop civil strife, unless it concludes that such strife threatens international peace and security or violates an internationally recognized cease-fire line.

Mr. MORSE. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MUSKIE in the chair). A quorum is present.

CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1963

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H.R. 7152) to enforce the constitutional right to vote, to confer jurisdiction upon the district courts of the United States to provide injunctive relief against discrimination in public accommodations, to authorize the Attorney General to institute suits to protect constitutional rights in public facilities and public education, to extend the Commission on Civil Rights, to prevent discrimination in federally assisted programs, to establish a Commission on Equal Employment Opportunity, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending question is on agreeing to the modified amendment offered by the Senator from Montana [Mr. MANSFIELD], on behalf of himself and the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN], as a substitute for the amendment relative to jury trials, offered by the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. TALMADGE], on behalf of himself and other Senators.

During the delivery of Mr. MORSE's speech on South Vietnam,

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oregon yield?

Mr. MORSE. I yield to the distinguished minority leader with the understanding that the interruption will appear elsewhere in the RECORD, and without losing my rights to the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, in introducing the Mansfield-Dirksen amendment this morning, there was a technical mistake made as to line and page. In order to make it an exact substitute, I ask unanimous consent that it be corrected in that respect.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The amendment as modified was ordered to be printed as follows:

AN AMENDMENT IN THE NATURE OF A SUBSTITUTE FOR THE AMENDMENT NO. 513 OF MR. TALMADGE

In lieu of the language of the amendment substitute the following:

"SEC. 1101. CRIMINAL CONTEMPT PROCEEDINGS; PENALTIES; TRIAL BY JURY.—In all cases of criminal contempt arising under the provisions of this Act, the accused, upon conviction, shall be punished by fine or imprisonment or both: Provided however, That in case the accused is a natural person the fine to be paid shall not exceed the sum of $1,000, nor shall imprisonment exceed the term of six months: Provided further, That in any such proceeding for criminal contempt, at the discretion of the judge, the accused may be tried with or without a jury: Provided further, however, That in the event such proceeding for criminal contempt be tried before a judge without a jury the aggregate fine shall not exceed the sum of $300 nor any cumulative imprisonment exceed 30 days. If the trial is by a jury, the procedure shall conform as near as may be to that in other criminal cases.

"SEC. 1102. Section 151 of the Civil Rights Act of 1957 (41 Stat. 638) is amended by striking out the third proviso to the first paragraph thereof, and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"'Provided further, however, That in the event such proceeding for criminal contempt be tried before a judge without a jury the aggregate fine shall not exceed the sum of $300 nor any cumulative imprisonment exceed 30 days. If the trial is by a jury, the procedure shall conform as near as may be to that in other criminal cases.'"

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, on this question, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, the trial by jury concept is a cherished and revered institutional process in our society. Its history and heritage, recently reviewed in this Chamber, are well known to all. Equally cherished and revered, equally adorned by the vine of history and heritage, equally essential to any civilized society, is the power of the judiciary to resolve in a full and complete fashion the disputes of the litigants before it. The most severe and lethal attack on this mainmast of our society is the willful and contemptuous disobedience of the final order of the court. It is for this reason that willful and contemptuous acts of disobedience of court orders historically have been treated as attacks on the basic structure of the judiciary, and have been punished by the courts, without the assistance of a jury. It has always been considered one of the necessary incidents of the power of the courts to vindicate their own dignity, enforce their own orders, and protect themselves from insult in each case, without assistance. The cases on this power of the judiciary are legion, not only in the Federal Courts, but also in those of the several States. The Supreme Court has recently reviewed this history and this inherent power of the courts in United States against Barnett, decided but 2 weeks ago.

In facing this issue of the alleged conflict of these basic institutional processes of our jurisprudence, the proposed amendment of the distinguished minority leader and myself strikes a balance between these conflicting viewpoints, so that in cases arising under this act, when an order of the court has been willfully and contemptuously violated, the court will be able to fine such person up to $300 or imprison him for a period of up to 30 days, without a jury. The provisions of this amendment will extend to each and every title of this act under which a possible criminal contempt proceeding could arise. The Supreme Court in the recent Barnett case intimated that some upper limit should be established on the power to try a criminal contempt without a jury. It is for this reason that the upper limit of 30 days—$300—is extended to all titles of the bill, thus modifying the bill itself in this regard. It will, in addition, amend the existing law embodied in the Civil Rights Act of 1957, which provided a 45-day $300 limitation on the court in any criminal contempt arising out of voting cases.

I urge that the provisions of this proposed amendment be adopted by a vote in the not too distant future.

DALLAS AND THE STATE OF TEXAS

Mr. TOWER. Mr. President, I have received a copy of a letter from Mr. Robert D. Moore, of 3511 Eighth Avenue South, in Great Falls, Mont., that was addressed to the editor of the Dallas Morning News. I believe it carries a message that should be read by the Members of this Senate, as well as editors across our land. For that reason I shall ask to place it in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD so that it too may become a part of history.

Mr. President, as Mr. Moore notes, the irresponsible attacks upon the city of Dallas and the State of Texas continue from many quarters. The reasons are quite obvious to all who are knowledgeable in the ways of politics. Dallas is generally a conservative city, and at the same time a growing, dynamic, progressive city. It seeks to solve its problems Route to . . .

Pre-Employment Inquiries

EEOC views with "extreme disfavor" the asking of job applicants about their race, color, religion, or national origin, although Title VII of the Civil Rights Act doesn't expressly prohibit such inquiries.

In an interpretation of Title VII on pre-employment inquiries just released by EEOC Chairman Franklin D. Roosevelt, Jr., the Commission says that the asking of an applicant's race, religion, and the like are "totally irrelevant to his or her ability or qualifications as a prospective employee" except in those "infrequent instances where religion or national origin is a bona fide occupational qualification reasonably necessary for the performance of a particular job." The fact that such questions are asked, the Commission states, "may, unless otherwise explained, constitute evidence of discrimination, and will weigh significantly in the Commission's decision as to whether or not Title VII has been violated."

Full text of the interpretation will appear in the next issue of FEP.

Testing Qualms

Employment tests that may result in a widespread exclusion of Negroes from jobs have caused uneasiness at EEOC, triggering a Commission search into the problems involved. EEOC Executive Director Herman Edelsberg urges employers to take a hard look at the tests they are using. There is a "kind of mythology . . . a great unreality . . . a great irrelevance about testing," he suggests.

The Tower amendment to Title VII allows employers to "give and act upon the results of any professionally developed ability test, provided that such test, its administration, or action upon the results, is not designed, intended, or used to discriminate because of race, color, religion, sex, or national origin." The amendment was inspired by the Motorola case (see p. 451:329), in which an Illinois FEPC hearing examiner found that a preemployment test used by Motorola discriminated against the "culturally deprived."

Application of the amendment probably will have to be decided ultimately by the courts. Meanwhile, the Office of EEOC General Counsel Charles Duncan has the amendment under study. At the present time EEOC officials indicate they see no bar to the Commission's finding "reasonable cause" to believe a violation of Title VII has occurred if an employer is using an aptitude test as a means to discriminate against someone because of race or national origin.

EEOC's Research Director Charles B. Markham says his office has begun some preliminary research on testing. Material has been gathered on testing for study by Commission members and staff, with some help from the American Psychological Association.

There are tests that are used to study ability rather than reading skill. The Raven test, for example, may be given to illiterates, regardless of language or cultural background, to test judgment in observation. But a psychologist at the American Psychological Association says no test by itself can completely measure the potential of a culturally deprived person. The ability of the person giving the test is important, he stresses.

EEOC's Liaison Office, headed by Ben D. Segal, has let a $165,000 contract to Wayne State University to conduct research nationally on patterns of discrimination in employment. Wayne State has sublet a share of the contract to the California FEPC to make a study of testing.

Segal cites a case involving an oil refinery and a union that found Negroes were being excluded by a test, so they changed the test and found some qualified Negroes. The Negroes were hired and are working out satisfactorily. Some companies, however, are eliminating tests entirely and depending on interviews and on-the-job trial periods in selecting employees.

Segal says that employers must make "a self-conscious effort to hire more minority people."

Help in Handling Complaints

EEOC borrows 25 investigators from other federal agencies to help handle nearly 3,500 complaints charging violation of Title VII. Most of them journeyed to North Carolina early this week to begin investigating more than 400 charges of employment discrimination.

Last week, the new investigators attended a two-day training session where they were given a comprehensive review of the agency's experience during its first six months of operation. All five EEOC commissioners and some of the agency's administrative officials participated in the training sessions.

Meanwhile, EEOC Chairman Franklin D. Roosevelt, Jr. , announces a new action program designed to expand equal employment opportunities and to train persons to qualify for jobs. The Manpower Administration of the Department of Labor has assigned Neil McArthur, a manpower developer, to work with the Commission on this project.

According to Roosevelt, McArthur will lend expert advice to employers and unions seeking to develop training programs under the Manpower Development & Training Act. He will work with employers on clearances with appropriate federal and state agencies.

Reporting Form

Although the proposed EEOC reporting form has gone to the printers, Commissioner Aileen Hernandez indicates that changes will be made in the form as originally proposed in response to suggestions received at a hearing on the form. (See FEP Summary No. 22.)

Addressing the National Retail Merchants Association, Commissioner Hernandez says the Commission has adopted a number of their proposals. For example, the requirement that multi-unit firms file separate reports for each individual store with 50 or more on its payroll has been changed to call for only one report for all stores within a standard metropolitan statistical area. EEOC has gone one step further, and will require only one consolidated report for stores outside the statistical area. Here, the firms will list the names and locations of individual stores as an attachment to the reporting form.

In addition, the new form will not request data on seasonal work applications and will require only a six-month retention of data, instead of the 12 months originally proposed.

One rejected suggestion asked that employers not be required to list all agreements with labor unions where there are formal or informal hiring-hall arrangements. EEOC is of the opinion that labor organizations cannot supply that information better than the employer.

Ultimately there will be only one federal reporting form on employment practices, Commissioner Hernandez predicts. She reports that the Commission is in the process of working with state groups, too, to produce a federal form that will satisfy their FEP reporting requirements.

Discrimination is not only a moral issue, Mrs. Hernandez explains, but also one of dollars and cents in lost buying power. We are paying a tremendous price in human suffering and financial loss for bad personnel practices, she remarks. She urges the retailers to move beyond the letter of the law to the spirit of it, and offers EEOC's assistance in an affirmative campaign to eliminate discrimination.

Experience under Title VII

Title VII of the Civil Rights Act has caused employers relatively little difficulty with job applicants, but many are experiencing or expecting difficulties in adjusting to the ban on sex discrimination. These are among the findings in a nation-wide survey conducted by the National Association of Manufacturers among 600 employers who attended Title VII seminars conducted by NAM prior to the effective date of the Title.

Here's a rundown of some of the findings:

▶ Over 45 percent of the companies have initiated positive action programs or have broadened and accelerated plans already in existence during the initial six months Title VII has been in effect. These range from revision of testing procedures to active cooperation with groups like the Urban League in seeking out qualified applicants from minority groups.

▶ Changes in hiring or promotion procedures have been undertaken by 34 percent of the companies as a result of Title VII.

▶ Cost increases as a result of Title VII are noted by a tenth of the companies. The most frequently mentioned added cost factor is an increase in the ratio of interviews to actual job placements. Where they had been operating on a five to one ratio, some companies noted, the ratio now is closer to 10 to one.

▶ Less than 4 percent report having difficulties with job applicants that could be traced to Title VII requirements. Fears that civil-rights groups would deliberately provoke incidents seem groundless at least to this point, NAM says.

▶ Nearly four in five companies do not anticipate trouble in living with Title VII. Even in the South, nearly 70 percent expect to be able to comply without too much trouble. Larger companies (over 500 employees) tend to be somewhat more concerned, perhaps because they consider themselves more likely to become targets of protest by crusading minority action groups.

▶ About 23 percent of the respondents said they have either experienced difficulties under the sex discrimination provisions of Title VII or they expect them. Problems cited include changed requirements in help-wanted advertising, adjustments in group-insurance programs, introduction of women into previously all-male departments (and vice versa), training and retraining, fringe-benefit adjustments, and the like.

Statistical Suspicion

"Pure statistical evidence" or "statistical suspicion" may be enough to prompt a member of the EEOC to file a charge under Title VII against an employer, according to Herman Edelsberg, Executive Director of the Commission. This sort of suspicion might arise, he explains, if it were learned that an employer with a major plant in an area containing a sizable proportion of Mexican-Americans had no employees of Mexican-American origin.

Speaking to the Washington Society of Association Executives, Edelsberg says that although there is a "vast reservoir" of good will in business, labor, and the general community with respect to equal opportunity, the EEOC is asking Congress for the power to issue cease and desist orders and the extension of Title VII coverage to employers of eight or more.

Extension of coverage is sought, he says, because one of the greatest areas of employment growth expected in the coming decade is in the service industry, which is characteristically made up of employers with relatively few employees.

As for complaints of discrimination against unions in the construction industry, Edelsberg says: "We treat a complaint against a construction union the same as one against an employer." Complaints against building trades unions have "more symbol than substance," he observes, because the industry is not one of rapid employment growth.

Edelsberg urges the association executives to inform their members about the federally sponsored training programs offered to industry. Many Negroes are not even in the job-hunting market, being part of a "dispossessed, submerged class." But many can be reached and trained, he says.

The "best single thing to be done is to give Negroes jobs." The EEOC's affirmative action program, developed by its Technical Assistance Office, will dwell mainly on "persuading the laggards" in business to follow the leaders who are giving jobs to Negroes, Edelsberg says.

News Notes

► White and Negro Musicians locals in Chicago officially merge. Former Musicians' President James C. Petrillo is working toward integration of locals in 22 other cities.

► Identical bills to amend Title VII to bar job discrimination based on age are introduced by Congressmen Price (D., Ill.) and Roncalio (D., Wyo.)

► Chamber of Commerce of the U.S. is working out arrangements with local chambers and EEOC for a series of meetings on EEOC rules and regulations. Meetings start January 31 in New Orleans. Others will be February 1, 2, and 3 in Memphis, Atlanta, and Charlotte, N. C.

► Wisconsin Commission drops a proposed rule barring listing of help-wanted ads in "male " and "female" columns.

► Six male employees of the American Tobacco Co. file charges of sex discrimination under Title VII, claiming women have been assigned to machines they ran and that they have been relegated to lower-paying jobs.

Dear Harold:

Just a quick note to give you some idea about Saturday. I met Taylor and we talke for an hour or so. My guess is that his real reason for being in Milwaukee was to help drum up support for Johnson's J-J Dinner appearnace there on Saturday. We did not get very farinto each other partly because I early made it clear that I was not immediately available and that it would be sometime before I could even consider anything even if it were of special interest.

What he says he is looking for is of interest considering your comments to me by phone the other day. He has asked for and been given(as I understood it) a new position: research director. He recognizes that most of his staff is fully occupied with the organizations routine, that he is not a race relations type by training, and that he is not putting in much reflective time. He says (I'll go to single space) that he doesn't want the research person to just organize the statisites, but that he wants some one to look at the data analytically, and more importantly — imaginatively, to come up with concepts that will hopefully be operative and bring much more meaning out of the operation. He has an "academic advisory" committee, or some such, which evidently feels this is a good move. At least one of these guys knows me through labor education, Ron ~~Heston~~ Haughton, but not well. However, he suggested that Taylor be in touch with me.

This is what the man said. I'm sure his interests were really with the other problem. However, I felt that he had made some analysis of his situation or had accepted someone else's, and was fishing for a solution. At the present time he does not see the researcher as having a staff under him. He is after an idea man, but one in touch with facts, especially the facts that flow into the committee. He wants this guy to be free from phones, conference arrangements, etc.

I would be surprised if had checked me out. He said that he had and had great reports. He seemed surprised to find I had "come from" Atlanta. We did not even get into such obvious items as SRC, J. Hope, etc. I would hate to judge his seriousness or how he would really proceed in making such a staff function operational. It was a pleasant time. I will probably look him up when I come to Wahs to Washington.

I would be interested, then, or sometime in hearing whether you think such a shoring up of his operation would stand to help. I would certainly think that I would be in a position to pass a suggestion along, if there is an appropriate person who should get into such a situation.

For several reasons I would not like my meeting with him or this report bandied about.

Please overlook the usuals when I sit down to the typewritter, especially without any refining process.

Sincerely,

Emory F. Via

I would be interested in who else is on his "academic Advisory" group. He mentioined besides ~~Horton~~ Newton, Bill Forsyth and Long neither of whom do I know.

I did indicate to him that I would be interested in cooperating in any way that seemed feasible and indicated my willingness to be called upon.

So now you know as much as I do, and about my business, yet.

Regrds to all.

Employment of Negroes in the Federal Government

THE CIVILIAN WORK FORCE of the Federal Government increased by 3.3 percent from June 1961 to June 1964, as the number of Negroes in that work force increased by 5.9 percent. This increase of 16,911 raised the total of Negro employees to 299,527, or 13.2 percent of all Federal workers.

Negroes were almost equally distributed among the Government's three major pay systems, but made up a larger proportion of the work force under the Wage Board and Postal Field Service pay systems than under the Classification Act. Within each pay system, Negroes were employed predominantly in lower paid jobs. However, the proportion of Negroes employed, and their grade and salary levels, varied substantially by agency and location. These and other findings of the 1964 Minority Group Study are discussed in this article.[1]

[1] The study, the fourth in an annual series conducted by the President's Committee on Equal Employment Opportunity, is based on tabulations prepared for PCEEO by the U.S. Civil Service Commission. The study covered all Federal executive departments and agencies (except the National Security Agency and the Central Intelligence Agency), the General Accounting Office, and the Government Printing Office. Alaska, Hawaii, and Puerto Rico were excluded; however, U.S. citizens employed overseas were included.

Although not discussed in this report, the study provides separate information on the employment of other minority groups (American Indians, Mexican Americans, Orientals, and Puerto Ricans) in selected areas.

Employment in June 1964

Negroes made up a larger proportion of the Federal Government's work force in June 1964 (13.2 percent) than they did of the Nation's population or of its civilian nonagricultural employed labor force (approximately 10 percent each).[2] This difference largely reflects the Government's hiring policy which has motivated large numbers of Negroes to seek Federal employment. Another factor contributing to this difference is the disproportionate concentration of Federal jobs in areas having a relatively large Negro population. The six metropolitan areas having the largest number of Federal jobs accounted for 28.2 percent of the total Federal employment in the United States and 50.8 percent of the Negroes (chart 1). As indicated in the following tabulation, the ratio of Negroes in the total nonagricultural civilian employed labor force was higher, for the six areas as a whole, than for the remainder of the country:

Metropolitan areas having largest number of Federal jobs	Negroes in the nonagricultural civilian employed labor force, as a percent of the total, 1960
United States, total	9.2
Six areas, total	11.4
Washington, D.C.	24.5
New York	11.5
Philadelphia	14.7
Chicago	11.9
San Francisco	7.1
Los Angeles	6.5
Remainder of United States	8.6

[2] Negroes made up 10.6 percent of the population and 9.2 percent of the civilian nonagricultural employed labor force in 1960. Although these proportions may have increased slightly by 1964, it seems certain that they have not approached 13 percent. See Census of Population: 1960, Final State Reports, Detailed Characteristics, Series PC(1)D (U.S. Bureau of the Census).

By Pay Plan. In June 1964, approximately one-third of the Negroes in the civilian work force of the Federal Government were employed under each of the three major pay systems.[3] Negroes, however, accounted for a substantially smaller proportion of the Government's white-collar employees, whose pay is determined by the Classification Act, than of its blue-collar workers, whose pay is generally determined by Wage Board action or of the workers in the Postal Field Service. In each of the major pay systems, Negroes held a much larger proportion of the lower paid jobs than of those in the higher pay categories, as the following tabulation indicates:

By Grade and Salary Level. In all three pay systems, the proportion of workers whose jobs were in the lower pay categories was greater among Negroes than among other employees. This pattern primarily reflects the concentration of Negro Federal employees in jobs requiring limited skills and responsibilities.[4] The following tabulation illustrates this occupational disparity:

NOTE: Because of rounding, sums of individual items may not equal 100.

About 3 of every 5 Negroes under the Classification Act were in the four lowest grades, where the bulk of clerical jobs are found. In contrast, less than 3 of every 10 other employees held these grades. Almost an equal proportion of Negro and other employees were in the middle range GS-5 through GS-8, which covers upper level clerical and entry level professional, technical, and administrative jobs. Only about 10 percent of the Negroes, compared with nearly 45 percent of all other employees, were in jobs classified GS-9 or above.

The Wage Board system also displayed a similar gap. Almost 1 of every 3 Negro workers earned less than $4,500 per year, compared with only 1

[3] These 3 major pay systems accounted for all but 2.1 percent of the total and 1.3 percent of the Negro full-time civilian employees in the 1964 Minority Group Study.

[4] Information on job content is not available in the Minority Group Study. However, Federal pay levels generally correspond to the degree of skill and nature of responsibility involved in the performance of Federal jobs. For this reason, the grade and salary level distribution of Federal employees may be considered a guide to their relative occupational status within each of the Government's pay systems.

of every 12 other employees. Again, while only 11.3 percent of the Negroes held jobs paying $6,500 or more a year, 43.9 percent of all other Wage Board workers were so employed.[5]

By Agency. In June 1964, almost all the 2.3 million workers included in the Minority Group Study were employed in the 19 Federal departments and agencies shown in table 1. The three largest agencies—Department of Defense, Post Office Department, and Veterans Administration—accounted for almost three-fourths of the total (73 percent), and for slightly more than the same proportion of Negro employees (77.3 percent).

Negro employment ratios varied widely among Federal agencies. These wide variations reflect to some extent differences in the location and occupational staffing requirements of the agencies. For example, the Government Printing Office, with a large proportion of Negroes among its employees, was almost entirely concentrated in Washington, D.C., where Negroes represent almost one-fourth of the civilian nonagricultural labor force. The Department of Agriculture, an agency with a much smaller proportion of Negroes, had employees widely scattered throughout the Nation in many areas with a relatively small Negro work force.

The proportions of employees working under the different pay systems—and in the various grade and salary levels within those systems—may indicate differences in the occupational structure of the agencies and in agency requirements for professional, clerical, and other skills, which in turn may influence the proportion of Negroes employed. The following tabulation shows the percentages in five agencies:

	GPO	VA	HEW	FAA	NASA
Percent of all employees—
Working under—
Classification Act	18.1	74.9	85.2	92.9	77.5
Wage Board	77.7	23.2	8.1	7.0	20.9
In lowest pay category of—
Classification Act (GS 1–4)	59.2	47.0	37.1	6.8	15.1
Wage Board (less than $4,500)	32.3	53.3	44.2	3.7	4.8
Negro employees as a percent of all employees in agency	39.8	24.2	19.7	2.9	2.9

[5] The relative pay level of Wage Board employees may not indicate corresponding differences in job characteristics, since wage rates are set in line with prevailing rates for similar jobs in local areas, and thus employees in the same job classification may fall into different pay categories depending upon the geographic area in which they work. Nonetheless, within the overall pay system, there is a general relationship between broad skill requirements and levels of pay.

Chart 1. Proportion of Federal Employees Located in Six Metropolitan Areas Having Largest Number of Federal Jobs, June 1964

Chart 2. Percent Distribution of Classification Act Employees by Grade Level, June 1962 and June 1964

Other factors contribute to agency variations in Negro employment. These include differences in the growth of the agencies, the degree of implementation of the Government's equal employment opportunity policy, and the extent to which Negroes meet the educational requirements for many professional and scientific jobs in the Federal service.

By Location. Almost all Negro Federal employees worked in the United States;[6] approximately one-fifth were employed in the Washington, D.C., metropolitan area and another fifth in the Chicago civil service region.[7] Almost a sixth of the Negroes holding Federal jobs were in the Philadelphia region. The Atlanta, New York, and San Francisco regions each had about a tenth. No other region had as much as 6 percent of the Government's Negro employment.

There was considerable variation among these locations in their contribution to Negro employment in the three pay systems. As illustrated in the following tabulation, the Washington area accounted for a third of the Negroes in the Classification Act, compared with a fifth of the Negro Wage Board employees and less than a tenth of those in the Postal Field Service. These proportions were notably higher than those for all employees, among whom 18 percent of Classification Act employees, 7 percent of Wage Board employees, and 2 percent of those in the Postal Field Service were in the Washington area.

NOTE: Data exclude employment in Alaska, Hawaii, and Puerto Rico.

As indicated in table 2, the proportion of Negro employees to all Federal employees varied widely among the different sections of the country, ranging from nearly a fourth in the Washington metropolitan area to less than 5 percent in the Boston, Denver, and Seattle civil service regions. These variations were due largely to regional differences in the proportions of Negroes in the labor force. In most of the regions, the proportion (of Negro employees to all employees) in the Federal Government was greater than the proportion of Negroes in the nonagricultural civilian labor force. As indicated below, however, this relationship did not hold in the Atlanta and Dallas regions:

Civil service region	Percent of Negroes— Among Federal employees, June 1964	Percent of Negroes— In the nonagricultural civilian labor force, 1960
United States	13.4	9.2
Washington, D.C., metropolitan area	24.3	24.5
Atlanta	11.1	21.6
Boston	3.4	2.1
Chicago	18.8	7.3

New York	15.0	8.5
Philadelphia	17.7	10.5
St. Louis	7.7	4.6
Seattle	2.3	1.0

In Washington, D.C., and in each of the civil service regions, Negroes accounted for a much larger proportion of Wage Board and Postal Field Service employees than of those under the Classification Act.

A substantial part of the 1964 Federal employment was located in Standard Metropolitan Statistical Areas (SMSA). The 41 areas for which separate data were collected[8] accounted for one-half of all employees (49.9 percent) and almost four-fifths of the Negro employees (78.0 percent).

Metropolitan areas, like civil service regions, displayed wide variations in the proportion of Negro employees to all employees (table 2). The proportion of Negro employees was higher in most metropolitan areas than in the regions or in the Government at large.

A notable characteristic of metropolitan area employment was the high proportion of Negroes in Wage Board and Postal Field Service jobs, compared with the proportion in Classification Act jobs. This pattern is illustrated in the following tabulation of 10 metropolitan areas, each having 5,000 Negro Federal employees or more. Together, these areas accounted for 32.2 percent of the total employment, and 60 percent of the Negro employment, included in the study.

In each of these areas, except New York, Negroes held one-fourth or more of all Wage Board jobs, and one-fifth or more of all those in the Postal Feld Service. But Negroes held less than one-fifth of all Classification Act jobs in each area except Chicago and Detroit. In each of the areas except Norfolk, however, Negroes held a higher proportion of Classification Act jobs than they did in the total survey.

Trends in Negro Employment

During the 3-year period, there was a slight change in the distribution of employees among the three pay systems. The proportion of employees under the Wage Board system declined, largely as a result of Defense Department economies, while increased requirements for professional and technical personnel in many Federal agencies raised the proportion of all employees working under the Classification Act. The employment of Negroes followed this general pattern as indicated in the following tabulation:

	Percent distribution by pay plan: All employees 1961	All employees 1964	Negro employees 1961	Negro employees 1964
All pay plans [1]	100.0	100.0	100.0	100.0

An examination of changes in grade and salary levels shows the relative progress of Negroes in the Federal Government, compared with other Federal employees.[9] As the Government's require-

[9] This comparison is limited to the Classification Act and Postal Field Service pay systems. Because of changes in the reporting system between 1961 and 1962, comparisons are limited to the years 1962 and 1964.

[2] Civil service regions are defined as follows: Atlanta—Alabama, Florida, Georgia, Mississippi, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Tennessee; Boston—Connecticut, Maine, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, Rhode Island, and Vermont; Chicago—Illinois, Indiana, Kentucky, Michigan, Ohio, and Wisconsin; Dallas—Arkansas, Louisiana, Oklahoma, and Texas; Denver—Arizona, Colorado, New Mexico, Utah, and Wyoming; New York—New Jersey and New York; Philadelphia—Delaware, Maryland, except Montgomery and Prince Georges counties, Pennsylvania, Virginia, except Alexandria and Falls Church cities and Arlington and Fairfax counties, and West Virginia; St. Louis—Iowa, Kansas, Minnesota, Missouri, Nebraska, North Dakota, and South Dakota; San Francisco—California and Nevada; Seattle—Idaho, Montana, Oregon, and Washington.

[4] Includes 32,437 employees (of whom 3,041 or 9.4 percent were Negroes) under pay plans other than the Classification Act (or similar pay plans), Wage Board, and Postal Field Service.

NOTE: Data exclude employment in Alaska, Hawaii, and Puerto Rico.

ments for relatively unskilled workers declined, there has been a notable shift of employment from the lower to the middle and upper grades of the Classification Act system.[10] This shift has been more pronounced for Negroes than for all other employees. In 1964, however, as shown in chart 2, more than three-fifths of the Negroes were still in the lower grades. A little more than a tenth of the jobs held by Negroes in 1964 were in grades 9 and above (an increase of 2.6 percent from 1962); close to half of all other employees were in these grades (an increase of 4.7 percent).

In the Postal Field Service, employment increased by 12,334 from 1962 to 1964. Negroes accounted for nearly two-thirds of this increase. Compared with the Classification Act employment, the distribution of Postal Field Service employment among the various grade level groupings remained about the same during the 2-year period.

What Is The Personnel Policies Forum?

The Editors of The Bureau of National Affairs have invited representative personnel and industrial relations executives to become members of the 1965-66 Panel of the PERSONNEL POLICIES FORUM. These Panel members are top personnel officials in all types of companies, large and small, in all branches of industry and all sections of the country.

At regular intervals throughout the year BNA editors ask the members of the Panel to outline their policies and procedures on some important aspect of employment, industrial relations, and personnel problems. From these replies, the editors complete a survey report on the problem, showing prevailing practices, new wrinkles and ideas, and cross-section opinion from these top-ranking executives.

In many cases, the comments, suggestions, and discussions are reproduced in the words of the Panel members themselves. In effect, survey users are sitting around a table with these executives and getting their advice and experience on the major problems in this field facing all companies this year.

Results of each PERSONNEL POLICIES FORUM survey made during 1965-66 are printed in a special survey report which is sent, as part of the service, to users of these BNA labor reports:

INTRODUCTION

Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 is now in effect. It's designed to insure equal employment opportunity to all persons regardless of race, color, religion, sex, or national origin. Its principal provisions for employers are those which make it unlawful to fail or refuse to hire, or to discharge or otherwise discriminate against, any individual with respect to compensation, terms, conditions, or privileges of employment because of race, color, religion, sex, or national origin.

Shortly before the effective date of the Civil Rights Act (July 2, 1965), the editors of BNA decided to send a questionnaire to personnel and industrial relations executives who make up BNA's Personnel Policies Forum to find out the practices in their companies regarding the recruitment, selection, placement, training, and development of but one of the minority groups, specifically, Negroes. The information that follows is based on replies received from 140 executives on the Forum. In the survey, first in the 1965 series, "larger" company refers to one with over 1,000 employees; "smaller" company, to one with 1,000 or fewer employees.

Negroes are employed on a full-time basis in practically all Forum companies. A much higher percentage of them, however, employ male Negroes than female Negroes; this is especially true in smaller companies, where over nine in 10 of them employ Negro males, and less than half employ female Negroes.

What types of jobs are being held by Negroes in Forum companies? They hold down blue-collar jobs in 94 percent of the companies, white-collar jobs in just over seven in 10 companies. A third of the companies have Negroes employed as foremen or first line supervisors and nearly the same percentage have them working in middle management or executive positions. Negroes are employed in scientific, professional, or technical positions in exactly two in five Forum companies.

The percentage of Negroes in the work force is less than many would expect. When asked what percentage of their companies' total work force is Negro, a sizable majority (58 percent) reported that it was 3.9 percent or less. Nearly three in 10 executives, however, reported the figure at 9 percent or more.

Has there been any increase in the number of Negroes in Forum companies since the passage of the Civil Rights Act? According to over three in five executives there hasn't been, but many who reported otherwise were quick to point out that the increase had nothing to do with the passage of the law.

Positive steps to recruit Negroes reportedly are being taken in nearly three fourths of Forum companies. The principal method used by these firms is contacting federal and state employment services for Negro help. The only other methods used by a majority of Forum companies are to seek referrals from Negro employees currently on the payroll and to advertise in newspapers or magazines with a high Negro circulation.

Less than a fourth of Forum companies have been approached by a civil-rights group to hire Negroes, and those that have report very "courteous" or "pleasant" meetings.

Other highlights of the survey include these:

(1) Nearly nine tenths of Panel members whose companies administer mental-ability tests don't agree that such tests are unfair to many Negroes--as has been claimed--because they are based on cultural and educational levels that some Negroes have not encountered and thus underestimate the Negro's learning ability.

(2) The vast majority of Panel members stated that no special steps were being taken to demonstrate to a Negro job applicant--any more than any other job applicant--that he was refused employment simply because he wasn't capable of doing the job or because he lacked the necessary qualifications for doing the job.

(3) Very few companies have experienced problems in integrating Negroes into certain occupations.

(4) Just a handful of companies are making a special effort to encourage Negro employees to enroll in training and development programs.

> NOTE: The first questionnaire sent to Panel members in 1965 concerned the training of first-line supervisors and will be published shortly. Because of the importance of the Civil Rights Act to many executives, it was decided to publish this survey first.

COMPOSITION OF WORK FORCE

What percentage of Forum companies employ Negro workers? Male Negro workers? Female Negro workers? What types of jobs are held by Negroes in these companies? What percentage of the total work force is Negro? Has the number of Negro employees increased since the enactment of the Civil Rights Act? These and other questions were put to members of the Panel to find out the status of Negroes in these companies today. The data that follow summarize the responses.

Negroes Employed: Male & Female

Almost all Forum companies--98 percent of the larger and 92 percent of the smaller ones--employ Negroes on a full-time basis. From a sex standpoint, however, a much greater percentage of Forum companies employ male Negroes. Males of this minority group are full-time employees in 95 percent of the companies, females in 70 percent. However, while 83 percent of the larger companies have female Negroes on their payrolls, just 46 percent of the smaller ones do.

The following table gives a percentage breakdown, by sex, of the Forum companies that employ Negroes on a full-time basis:

Employment of Negroes by Sex

	All Cos.	Larger	Smaller
Employ Negroes	96%	98%	92%
Employ male & female Negroes	69	81	46
Employ male Negroes only	26	15	46
Employ female Negroes only	1	2	--
Do not employ Negroes	4	2	8

Most Panel members in those Forum companies that do not employ Negroes, either male or female, submitted reasons for their companies' practices. Here's what they had to say:

> We are located in Bryan, the county seat of Williams County, Ohio. No Negroes live in the county. The nonwhite minority group averages less than 1 percent of the population.--L.E. Bigler, Personnel Manager, The Aro Corporation, Bryan, Ohio.
> Our work force is composed presently of all white employees. Over the past 20 years we have had only one colored male employee. This man retired six years ago because of age. Our community is all white with the exception of this one retired Negro employee. Over the past years we have had three job applications from Negroes, and they were not qualified to do the work we had to offer. --R.H. Tenley, Personnel Manager, Penberthy Manufacturing Co., Prophetstown, Ill.

One executive whose company doesn't employ Negroes replied that there were no Negro residents or workers in the community. He added, however, that the company recently published a statement of policy with reference to no discrimination because of race, color, religion, sex, or national origin, and that he believed that a "qualified Negro applicant, who met the company's hiring standards, including tests when applicable, would be accepted by the employees on the same basis as any other newly assigned employee."

Another executive whose company doesn't have a Negro on the payroll at the present time makes this comment:

> Our experience in hiring Negroes, though limited, has been good. For instance, F.A. was hired as an assembler learner, became a welding utility man, and then a drill press operator. He was with the company for two-and-a-half years, but was laid off because of lack of work. We tried to rehire him, but he was working elsewhere.
> T.M. came to work as a drill press operator and was promoted to a turret lathe operator. After four years with us, he entered the Navy. A good man in electronics. After his Navy discharge he applied for re-hire. I counseled him at great length, encouraging him to enter the electronics field. This he did and is doing well.
> J.P. was hired as a finish cleaner and rose to the top drill press classification in two years. He quit to accept a job in Washington, D.C. His problem--no social life in Bradford (Pa.) for him.
> These men were all good employees, but J.P. was tops. We have few Negroes in the community. The latest census shows 75 in McKean County.--Thom Williams, Manager of Personnel, Bovaird & Seyfang Manufacturing Co., Bradford, Pa.

Types of Jobs Held by Negroes

It's one thing to know what percentage of Forum companies employ Negroes, but we also wanted to find out what types of jobs are being held by Negroes in these companies. To this end, executives on the Panel whose companies employ Negroes were asked if members of this minority group were working (1) in blue-collar jobs; (2) in white-collar jobs; (3) as foremen or first-line supervisors; (4) in middle-management positions; (5) in executive positions; (6) in scientific, technical, or professional positions; (7) as salesmen; (8) as clerks in the employment office; and (9) as recruiters.

Replies from respondents whose companies employ Negroes showed that well over nine in 10 Forum companies (91 percent of the larger and all of the smaller ones) have Negroes in blue-collar jobs on their payrolls. In the white-collar field, however, the situation is quite different, especially in the smaller companies. To illustrate, just about the same percentage of larger companies that employ Negroes in blue-collar jobs have Negroes in white-collar jobs. In contrast, just 37 percent of the smaller Forum companies have Negroes working in white-collar positions.

Following is a table which gives a percentage breakdown of Forum companies that employ Negroes in blue-collar and white-collar jobs. It also shows the percentage of companies that employ Negroes as foremen or first-line supervisors, in middle-management positions, in executive positions, as salesmen, as clerks in the employment office, as recruiters, and in scientific, technical, or professional positions.

Types of Jobs Held by Negroes

	All Cos.	Larger	Smaller
Blue-collar	94%	91%	100%
White-collar	72	89	37
Foremen or first-line supervisors	33	44	13
Middle-management	22	28	9
Executive	8	11	3
Scientific, technical, or professional	40	47	25
Salesmen	18	25	3
Clerks in employment office	14	20	--
Recruiters	8	13	--

Percentage of Negroes in Work Force

A sizable majority of executives (58 percent), when asked what percentage of their company's total work force is Negro, replied that it was less than 4 percent. However, 27 percent (a fifth of those with larger companies and 39 percent of those with smaller ones) responded by saying that at least one in 10 of their company's employees is a Negro. Following is a breakdown of the percentage of Negroes in the work force as reported by Panel members:

Percentage of Negroes in Work Force

	All Cos.	Larger	Smaller
Less than 1 percent	7%	8%	6%
1.0 to 1.9 percent	16	18	13
2.0 to 2.9 percent	20	20	20
3.0 to 3.9 percent	15	16	13
4.0 to 4.9 percent	6	9	--
5.0 to 5.9 percent	7	9	3
6.0 to 6.9 percent	1	--	3
7.0 to 7.9 percent	--	--	--
8.0 to 8.9 percent	--	--	--
9.0 to 9.9 percent	1	--	3
10 percent	11	4	23
Over 10 percent	16	16	16

Of those executives who replied that the percentage of Negroes in their company is over 10 percent, two reported that it was 12 percent and two said 15 percent. Other percentages mentioned by executives were the following: 10 to 12, 11, 13, 14, 12-15, 16, 17, 18, 25, and 33 1/3.

Highest Job Held by a Negro

As a corollary to the last inquiry, executives on the Panel were asked to name the highest job held by a Negro in their company. For convenience, we have grouped the many job titles listed in the responses under a few broad categories. These, and the percentage of companies that report the employment of at least one Negro in each category, appear below. Job titles typical of each category also are shown.

Unskilled (13 percent--5 percent of the larger companies and 29 percent of the smaller ones)--Enamel sprayer; lead janitor; truck driver; comb tender; pre-press worker; mill operator; chemical operator.

Semi-Skilled (3 percent)--Rolling mill operator; machine operator.

Skilled (9 percent)--Machinist; tool and die maker; electrician; press operator; welder; color maker.

Clerical (11 percent)--General clerk; senior cashier; production control clerk; secretary; production control expediter; staff assistant; messenger-driver; shipper and receiver in charge; department clerk.

Sales (2 percent--3 percent of the larger companies, none of the smaller ones)--Sales clerk, salesman.

Professional (18 percent--21 percent of the larger companies, 13 percent of the smaller ones)--Engineer; design engineer; process engineer; chemist; senior editor; auditor; pilot; supervisory engineer; attorney; accountant; registered nurse; head nurse; scientist.

Technical (10 percent)--Engineering draftsman; drafting technician; inventory analyst; systems analyst; marketing coordinator; market researcher; lab technician; electronics technician.

Foreman and Assistant Foremen (13 percent--18 percent of the larger companies, 3 percent of the smaller ones).

Managerial (18 percent--21 percent of the larger companies, 13 percent of the smaller ones)--Assistant divisional manager; manager-research; industrial relations assistant; store manager; laboratory director; executive; unit personnel administrator; research section head; assistant data servicing manager; plant supervisor; director of industrial relations; buyer; sales supervisor.

Management Trainees (2 percent--3 percent of the larger companies, no smaller ones).

Unclassified (5 percent) (Job duties not specified with sufficient clarity to permit classification)--group leader; "skilled machine operator."

Negro Employment Since the CRA

In order to find out what effect, if any, the Civil Rights Act had on Negro employment, Panel members were asked this question: "Since the enactment of the Civil Rights Act in 1964, has the number of Negro employees increased in your company?"

According to slightly more than three fifths of the executives, there hasn't been any increase in the employment of Negroes since the passage of the law. This reply was given by 54 percent of the executives with larger companies and 76 percent of those with smaller ones. All of the remaining executives reported that there are more Negroes on their payrolls, but a few of them were quick to point out that the increase had nothing to do with the new law. As one executive phrased it: "The increase is due to participation in Plans for Progress, and not legislation."

Those Panel members in Forum companies in which the number of Negroes had increased since the Civil Rights Act was passed further were asked to give the percentage increase. Here's a summary of their replies: Just under three in 10 of these executives answered that the increase was small, insignificant, minimal, or the like; a fifth reported the increase as 1 percent or less; 12 percent set the increase somewhere between 1.1 and 2.0 percent; 16 percent reported increases between 2.1 and 5.0 percent; while virtually all of the remaining executives reported the increase as over 5 percent. The executives in the last category gave these percentages: 8 to 10 percent, 10 percent, 20 percent, and 25 percent. One executive, it should be noted, replied that his company had no Negro employee prior to the passage of the Civil Rights Act.

RECRUITMENT OF NEGROES

There's been a lot of talk recently concerning the difficulty in recruiting Negroes. Some companies have said that they haven't encountered any problem in finding qualified Negro employees. Others explain that their company hires on the basis of merit alone and without regard to an individual's race, creed, color, or national origin, but that the company has been faced with a problem of finding qualified Negroes. Many of these companies are members of the Plans for Progress program, others are not.

A few executives--whose companies have based employment strictly on merit--strongly object to the idea of going out and finding qualified Negroes, because this approach, they feel, is giving "preferential treatment" to the Negro population. One of these executives--whose company is a member of Plans for Progress but which did not agree to seek out qualified Negroes as did other such companies--leveled a strong jab at BNA's questionnaire, while expressing other viewpoints on the Negro question. Here's what he had to say:

> With all due respect to the Bureau of National Affairs, I believe that this is the most poorly conceived questionnaire that I have ever seen emanate from your great institution.
> Initially, the purpose of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act was to create employment opportunities on the basis of merit, yet many of your questions are ill-conceived and imply preferential treatment for Negroes and I, personally, resent this approach on your part very much.
> The American public has been badly misled; employers have been duped; and our obligations under the Plans for Progress program is to employ . . . as we have for many years . . . on the basis of merit only. Currently, many of the people responsible for administering the progress under Title VII and Plans for Progress are interested in statistical improvement in the percentages of Negroes on their payrolls. I must say that, in my opinion, the percentage of Negroes on our payroll will probably be reduced and not increased as a result of the necessity of upgrading our employment standards to keep abreast of technological changes occurring within our industry. If we were hiring Negroes for the first time, obviously our statistics would improve, but I resent the following and predict that there will be substantial opposition to these points:

(1) Paying a premium salary to Negro college graduates just for the sake of getting a Negro on the payroll.

(3) Seeking out, exclusively, Negro employment sources just for the purpose of getting Negroes on the payroll.

(4) The emphasis on culturally deprived being applicable only to Negroes, because it is equally applicable to culturally deprived whites.

(5) The lack of intestinal fortitude on the part of businessmen to make the merit employment concept a reality and not use it for the purpose of preference to Negroes.

You will note in the document signed by President Johnson and our President and Chairman of the Board that we did not agree to seek out qualified Negro applicants as did many companies, since we feel that this is contrary to the American way of life and to the merit employment concept.

Again, I must repeat that your questionnaire is "lousy" and only misguides an already naive group of employers who yield to government pressure as a price of doing business.--John R. Hundley, Vice President, Industrial Relations, Granite City Steel Co., Granite City, Ill.

A few other Panel members voiced their concern in this manner:

I believe most people in the Northeast respect the Negroes' rights and view this as a moral issue. However, government interference and pressure to get more Negroes employed at all levels regardless of qualifications--the so-called "affirmative action" required by Executive Order 10925--has caused some apprehension of Title VII. The idea that employers will be pressured into discriminating for Negroes is a fear that I sense among groups of employees and applicants.

We have set high, but not unreasonable, employment standards and uniformly require all applicants to measure up to these standards. This helps offset the fear that Negroes will be hired because of pressure rather than qualification and it makes good business sense to hire the best qualified people regardless of color. I believe this is basically what the Negro community wants and expects.--Gerald C. Burdick, Director of Industrial Relations, Mesta Machine Co., Pittsburgh, Pa.

We have not made any special efforts to seek out Negro applicants any more than we make extra efforts to seek out Mexicans, Jews, Catholics, Chinese, or what have you. Nor do we discriminate against anyone solely because of race, religion, etc. We have actively cooperated with the President's Committee on Equal Employment Opportunity, and have revised written policies and union contracts to specify company policy.

We do not believe special considerations, specific quotas, or reverse discrimination is the answer. If the qualifications of Negro applicants are comparable to whites, they will be hired. We know that increasing pressure will be placed on us to hire Negroes because they are Negroes and not because they are qualified. The answer lies with the Negroes themselves to pull themselves up by their bootstraps, without reliance on special government pressures.--Herman Harrow, Director of Industrial Relations, The Welch Grape Juice Co., Inc., Westfield, N.Y.

The vast majority of executives didn't condemn the questions asked by BNA on its questionnaire and didn't score government "pressure" or "interference," although conceivably many of them could have had thoughts along these lines but didn't go out of their way to express their feelings. Many of the respondents, however, did say that they have in the past, and will continue, to hire without regard to a person's race, creed, color, or national origin, thus implying that the Civil Rights Act and the Executive Orders concerning the employment of Negroes weren't necessary in the first place.

To find out what Forum companies actually are doing to recruit qualified Negroes, if anything, these questions were asked: "Has your company taken any positive steps to recruit qualified Negroes, and if so, what steps are being taken?" "Has your company taken any steps to insure that private employment agencies aren't being discriminatory in their referrals?" And "Has your company been approached by any civil-rights group to hire Negroes?" The answers to these and other questions appearing on the questionnaire, as given by members of the Panel, appear below.

Action Taken to Recruit Negroes

Close to three in four executives on the Panel--77 percent of those with larger companies and two thirds of those with smaller ones--reported that their company takes positive steps to recruit qualified Negroes. How do they go about it? The principal method, according to over four in five of these Panel members, is by contacting federal and state employment services for Negro help. The next most widely used method is to seek referrals from Negro workers currently employed by the company. The only other method used by a majority of Forum companies is to seek referrals from such organizations as the NAACP, CORE, and the Urban League, which is the practice in just over three fifths of Forum companies. However, slightly more than one in eight of these executives reported that his company sought referrals only from the Urban League. Other methods used by at least one in five Forum companies in which positive steps are taken to recruit qualified Negroes are to place advertisements in newspapers or magazines having a high Negro circulation to send recruiters to high schools and colleges with predominantly Negro student bodies, and to seek referrals from Negro clergymen.

The following table gives a percentage breakdown of the methods used by Forum companies to recruit qualified Negro help:

Methods Used to Recruit Qualified Negroes

	All Cos.	Larger	Smaller
Making contact with federal and state employment services	83%	86%	75%
Seeking referrals from Negro workers currently employed by the company	78	76	85
Seeking referrals from such organizations as the NAACP, CORE, and Urban League	62	78	25
Advertising in newspapers or magazines with a high Negro circulation	45	51	30
Sending recruiters to high schools and colleges with predominantly Negro student bodies	33	43	10
Seeking referrals from Negro clergymen	22	29	5
Other	22	24	15

Among the "Other" methods used by Forum companies to recruit qualified Negroes are the following: contacting local mayor's panel on equal employment opportunity; contacting other companies for Negro help; contacting influential Negro business and community leaders; seeking referrals from the Youth Opportunity Board; participating in and using the National Urban League Skills Bank; interviewing Negro applicants at times when the company is not hiring, so as to have applications on file when positions open; placing "Equal Employment Opportunity" on all advertisements; and by participating in the Cleveland Occupational Planning Programs and the Seattle Job Fair.

To illustrate, in detail, what certain Forum companies have done to seek out qualified Negro employees, here are a few comments from Panel members in these companies:

> We originally had no Negroes. With the advent of the Civil Rights Act, we hired some Negroes. We have an over-all total of five, four of whom are in production and one in the accounting office.

> We started out by writing letters to all agencies that we contact or use in securing employees, outlining our policies in such matters, and calling on the local state employment office, local business school, chairman of the Mayor's panel, on equal employment opportunities, principal of the local Negro high school (the schools are integrated) . . . the president of the local state vocational school (a Negro institution which has some white students). Letters also were written to the NAACP, and Urban League groups outlining our policies. Notwithstanding any of the above, there has been no appreciable number of Negro applicants.--James Jennings, Personnel Manager, Modine Manufacturing Co., Paducah, Ky.

We have invited representatives of various Negro groups such as HARYU (Harlem Youth Action project) and discussed the problem of attracting skilled Negroes. For example, of the hundreds of industrial engineers, skilled trades--screw machine operators, toolmakers, boring mill hands, draftsmen--we can count on one hand the number of Negro applicants. Negro leaders acknowledge that their people simply do not take advantage of the opportunity to learn such skills and trades--even though the schools are open to all and in most instances are free of charge. We encouraged the leaders to send likely trainee prospects to be interviewed for the few training programs we have. They sent one candidate who we placed in a clerical position, which offers a good opportunity for advancement.--Robert O. Wechtler, Manager of Industrial Relations, Neptune Meter Co., Long Island City, N.Y.

All plant personnel managers and plant department heads with personnel responsibilities were informed orally in November 1963 of our policy on equal employment opportunity. (The policy is to provide equal employment opportunities for all persons regardless of race, creed, color, or national origin.) This same policy also was sent at that time to all other managers and department heads in the company.

The plant managers and department heads at all plants were informed in special meetings personally by the Vice President, Organization & Personnel Division, or one of his representatives (in April 1964) that it was not only their responsibility to see that no discrimination against minority members occurred in their plants, but that they were specifically to seek out qualified colored people and employ them until a significant percentage was working successfully in their plants.

The company's policy regarding equal employment opportunity was presented to all employees in the employee publication in June 1964. Almost all of the plants with significant Negro populations in the community have now been integrated with no unfortunate incidents.--Larger-company executive.

Prior to 1964, there were no Negroes in our employ. We have never found it necessary to recruit employees, as there was always an abundant supply of applicants coming in unsolicited. Contrary to the policy of many companies, we have been quite successful in employing many people from the same family. Hence, many of our new employees have come to us recommended by present employees. With the introduction of the Civil Rights Act, however, we were somewhat at a loss as to how to find qualified Negro help. We decided to stay with our present policy of hiring only from applications, but took care to interview all Negro applicants who could possibly qualify. There were very few Negro applicants and it was several months before we were able to hire our first Negro. We were extremely selective in hiring him, as this employee would have to prepare the ground for other Negroes. We were fortunate in our first selection, and have been able to integrate with no racial problems developing. After the first Negro was hired, she was able to refer other qualified Negroes to us, and we now have seven in our employ.--Smaller-company executive.

Prior to 1964, the company had paid "lip service" to integration and in a period of five years had only hired three Negro applicants. During the summer of 1964, the Personnel Director brought this to the President's attention. He in turn brought it up before the Board of Directors. The Board formally issued an employment policy that there shall be no discrimination against any employee or applicant for employment by reason of race, color, sex, religion, or national origin. Meetings were then held with both the office and shop supervisors and with the union explaining the new policy. From that point on qualified Negro applicants were referred to supervision and, as a result, approximately 40 Negroes have been hired in the last eight months. Except for a few minor cases, the integration has been successful.--Harold F. Young, Preformed Line Products Co., Cleveland, Ohio.

Use of Private Employment Agencies

Seventy-seven percent of Forum companies (85 percent of larger companies and 62 percent of smaller ones) use private employment agencies to recruit employees. And three in four of these companies, according to replies from Panel members, take some type of action to insure that the agencies they use aren't being discriminatory in their referrals.

What definite steps are taken? Virtually all Forum company executives stated that the agencies are informed--mostly in writing, but in some cases orally--that applicants are to be considered on ability alone, that their company is "An Equal Opportunity Employer," that applicants are to be referred without regard to race, creed, color, or national origin, or some such remark. A few of these companies also inform their agencies that they are not to discriminate on the basis of sex, either.

One executive stated that in addition to sending a letter to the agencies informing them that applicants are to be considered on the basis of ability alone, his company also makes telephone calls to the agencies to motivate special effort to find qualified Negroes. Another executive replied that his company requires a compliance statement of those agencies which are used.

One smaller-company executive, who said that his company didn't take steps to insure that employment agencies weren't being discriminatory, stated that a local ordinance prohibits discrimination by employment agencies, and added that he knows "by experience that the agencies used do not discriminate."

Contact by Civil Rights Groups

This question was put to Panel members: "Has your company been approached by any civil-rights group to hire Negroes?" According to the replies, many of their companies have been approached, but not as many as might have been expected. Just under a fourth of the Panel members (35 percent of those with larger companies and 3 percent of those with smaller companies) said that their company had been contacted by at least one civil-rights group. All of the remaining companies hadn't.

Executives in those Forum companies that had been approached by certain civil rights organizations then were asked to describe their experiences. Many of them reported "courteous" or "pleasant" meetings. Here's what they had to say:

> Local human relations council met with us urging additional hirings. Very pleasant meeting. This took place over a year ago--no contact since. They were told that we would continue to hire only qualified applicants.--K.C. Brown, Director of Personnel, Channing-Wolverine Cos., Battle Creek, Mich.

> Contacted by CORE, NAACP, and special local groups. We gave them information they requested, outlined our policy and job requirements, and asked them to refer applicants.--L.C. Alten, Staff Supervisor, Ohio Bell Telephone Co., Cleveland, Ohio.

> Approached by NAACP. They have been very understanding and have not flooded us with applicants. We told them our standards are high for all jobs, consequently they do their own screening.--W.F. Carman, Manager of Industrial Relations, Titanium Metals Corporation of America, Toronto, Ohio.

A few other executives on the Panel reported that they had had problems in dealing with certain civil rights groups and that these problems, for the most part, have been resolved. Here are their comments:

> A civil rights group demanded that we hire a large number of Negroes in a short period of time with the threat of pickets. We did not yield and they did not picket.--Larger-company executive.

> In the summer of 1964, discrimination charge was filed by several Negro school teachers alleging failure to interview for temporary vacation work. The charge was denied and it was shown that we had done no hiring or interviewing at the time of alleged applications. Settled by agreement to give these individual teachers preference in 1965.--Smaller-company executive.

Effective Sources for Recruiting Negroes

Referrals by employees and contacts with federal and state employment services are the two most effective sources for recruiting qualified Negroes, according to nearly two in five Panel members. Of those who mentioned employee referrals, the total was divided this way: 14 percent explained that the referrals were from Negro employees, the rest did not specify the race of the employees who made the referrals, although it may be assumed that in some instances the referrals were made by Negro employees.

Other sources specified as being effective by Panel members, mentioned by at least one in 10 of these executives, were contacts with the Urban League (no respondent mentioned the NAACP or CORE), Negro job applicants walking in off the streets, and recruiting at colleges, high schools, and vocational schools.

Below is a tabular presentation of the most effective sources for recruiting qualified Negroes as listed by Panel members:

Most Effective Source for Recruiting Qualified Negroes

	All Cos.	Larger	Smaller
Employee referrals	38%	27%	61%
By Negro employees	14	10	22
Not specified	24	17	39
Federal and/or state employment services	38	39	35
Urban League	16	22	4
Classified newspaper advertisements	15	16	13
Recruiting at high schools, vocational schools, and colleges	13	18	4
"Walk-in" job applicants	9	8	13
Private employment agencies	5	8	--
Recommendations from influential community and business leaders	5	8	--
Other	11	14	4

Included in the "Other" category are the following: retraining centers, job clinics, community-sponsored workshops, Youth Opportunity Board, Plans for Action in Changing Times, and the clergy. Two respondents listed in this category explained that they haven't found an effective source, while one made this comment:

> We are opposed to recruiting Negroes and object to this question. It implies preferential employment. We engage in merit employment and do not seek out any particular group of people.--John R. Hundley, Vice-President Industrial Relations, Granite City Steel Co., Granite City, Ill.

SELECTION & PLACEMENT OF NEGROES

The material that follows covers a few key questions in the selection and placement of Negroes. In brief, this section shows that (1) nearly nine in 10 Panel members whose companies administer mental-ability tests do not buy the idea that such tests are unfair to many Negroes (as has been claimed) as based on cultural and educational levels that some Negroes have not encountered and as thus underestimating the Negro's learning ability; (2) Panel members can see no particular reason for treating Negroes any differently from other job applicants when informing them that they lack the necessary qualifications to perform the job; and (3) there are very few problems encountered in integrating Negroes into certain occupations.

Administration of Mental-Ability Tests

At least some job applicants are given mental-ability tests in 74 percent of Forum companies--77 percent of the larger companies and 68 percent of the smaller ones.

Executives in those companies that give such tests to prospective employees were asked this question: "Do you believe--as has been claimed--that such tests are unfair to many Negroes because they are based on cultural and educational levels that some Negroes have not encountered, and thus underestimate the Negro's learning ability?" Just one in eight of the Panel members answered affirmatively, and virtually all of the rest gave a negative reply. A few of the executives didn't answer either "yes" or "no," but gave answers such as the following: "If such tests are validated against performance, their use is justified;" "This is a distinct possibility;" and "This may be true, however, you must have some sort of yardstick to measure ability if you are to consider the best applicant."

One executive who answered neither way, gave this reply: "Since we require a high-school diploma, the use of a verbal-type test for mental capacity presented us particular problems; occasional 'double-checks' with a non-verbal test usually correlated well. However, we observed a remarkable tendency of Negro applicants to score low on a mechanical aptitude test which was non-verbal."

Respondents who answered that mental-ability tests are unfair to Negroes for the reasons cited were asked to explain why. Here's what these executives said:

> The validity of these tests undoubtedly is established on the basis of the society group over which they are spread.--Larger-company executive.

Panel members who replied that such tests are not unfair to the Negro population gave a wide variety of replies, including the following:

Turning Down Negro Applicants

In devising the questionnaire, it was assumed that some Negro applicants who failed to meet the qualifications for a particular job would charge that the company was being discriminatory in its hiring procedures. What we wanted to know was if any special steps were being taken, or under consideration, to demonstrate to a Negro job applicant that he was refused employment simply because he wasn't capable of doing the job or because he lacked the necessary qualifications for doing the job.

According to the vast majority of Panel members, no special procedure is taken or under consideration. Virtually all the executives explained the company's position as did the following Panel member who stated: "A Negro job applicant will be given the same explanation as all other applicants who fail to meet the requirements, and that is that they have not met the minimum requirements established by the company or they do not have the required qualifications for the job."

A few executives, however, explained that certain steps were being taken to demonstrate to Negroes that they were turned down only because they weren't qualified. According to one executive, his company is showing them the results of the tests that are given to both whites and Negroes; another stated that the company frankly discusses with Negroes their aptitude and experience as compared with job requirements and available applicants; still another replied that the company conducts "skillful" interviews.

Integration Problems Encountered

Very few Forum companies have experienced problems in integrating Negroes into certain occupations, replies from Panel members indicate. When asked if problems were encountered along these lines, just eight percent of the executives answered "yes"--a tenth of those with larger companies and six percent of those with smaller ones--and all of the rest said "no."

Those executives who were faced with problems of this nature were requested to illustrate the various problems they had and then to explain how the company handled the situation. Their replies follow:

> In departments where no Negroes were employed there has been apprehension but no incident of any significance. Most employees believe it better to hire qualified Negroes than to be pressured into hiring unqualified Negroes because of government or group pressure.--Gerald C. Burdick, Director of Industrial Relations, Mesta Machine Co., Pittsburgh, Pa.

> In office: Although efforts were made to insure acceptance, the Negro girls were not willing to go the needed half-way but, instead, after introductions and invitations to coffee breaks, they grouped by themselves. Further efforts by responsible girls were of no avail.--Smaller-company executive.

A couple of executives whose companies have encountered problems in integrating Negro employees into certain occupations offer advice on how to avoid the occurrence of future incidents. They explain their companies' practices this way:

> We sit down with the group involved and explain that a new Negro employee has been hired. We ask for the group's cooperation and any suggestions they may have that will help make this employee feel accepted.--J.H. Peak, Industrial Relations Manager, Pflauder Permutit, Inc., Elyria, Ohio.
> We had to overcome traditional Southern thinking. Before placing the first Negro in a position other than custodial, we discussed the situation with supervision to anticipate particular questions and problems. Then we held a meeting with employees of that department, explaining that we--from a practical and job security viewpoint--had no choice if we were to continue to enjoy government contracts. After placing the first Negro in a production job, the obvious resentment diminished to the extent that we now place male Negroes in all areas without any fanfare and in exactly the same manner as white employees.--Russell J. Sims, Director of Personnel, Fouke Fur Company, Greenville, S.C.

One executive explains that integration of Negroes into certain occupations isn't a problem because of a "general lack of community antipathy to integration, because of the strong policy in regard to equal opportunity, and because Negroes hired have been competent to perform the jobs on which they have been placed."

TRAINING & DEVELOPMENT OF NEGROES

What percentage of Forum companies have Negroes enrolled in work-study programs? Apprenticeship training programs? Supervisory and management or executive programs? Tuition-aid programs? Scholarship programs? To find out the answer to these questions, Panel members were asked a series of questions. A summary of their responses appears below.

Negro Employees: Training & Development

Executives on the Panel were asked two questions. First, they were requested to indicate if their company conducted work-study, apprenticeship-training, supervisory-training, management or executive training, tuition-aid, or scholarship programs. Those executives whose company conducted such programs then were asked to indicate if Negro employees are enrolled in these programs, or to indicate if their company did not employ Negroes in jobs from which candidates for the various programs are selected.

Following is a table which shows the percentage of Forum companies which conduct the six training and development programs listed above. Under each program listed also are the letters A, B, and C in parentheses. The (A) shows the percentage of companies that have Negroes enrolled in the program; the (B) indicates the percentage of companies that do not employ Negroes in jobs from which candidates for the program are selected; and the (C) shows the percentage of companies that failed to specify whether Negroes are enrolled in the program or whether they employ Negroes in jobs from which candidates are selected.

Motivating Negro Employees

Seven in eight executives on the Panel (85 percent of those with larger companies and 92 percent of those with smaller ones) reported that their company isn't making any special effort to encourage Negro employees to enroll in various training and development programs. The majority of these executives said they encourage all employees equally.

All of the remaining Panel members said that their company does make special efforts to get Negroes to enroll in these programs. How do they go about it? Among the methods mentioned are the following: house organ and bulletin board publicity, stressing that such programs are open to all regardless of race, publishing training opportunities in employee handbooks, etc.

Of those executives who stated that their company does not make any special effort to encourage Negro employees to enroll in these programs, one made the following remark:

> All employees are encouraged to participate in any self-improvement program that would benefit them. No special effort is made to single out the Negro for these programs since this might be considered an overt action indicating he is below par. It is my opinion Negroes and other minority groups must be made to feel they are equal. If this is done properly, these people will want to better themselves on their own by taking advantage of available programs.--J.H. Peak, Pflauder Permutit, Inc., Elyria, Ohio.

Plans for Progress Orientation

To insure that all employees, regardless of race, creed, color, or national origin, get a fair shake, the Training & Development Branch of American Airlines' Maintenance & Engineering facility, Tulsa, Okla., conducts a Plan for Progress Orientation program. Following in full text is the facility's teaching guide, which may be of interest to those who plan similar programs:

PLAN FOR PROGRESS ORIENTATION

A. General Introduction

I am sure it is not necessary in this kind of meeting to spell out all of the reasons why the matter before us deserves our attention; yet it is worth reviewing some of the principles involved, because each of us is going to be called upon from time to time to answer questions and explain the company's position. To do this, we must have a clear understanding of the "why" of American's policy with regard to nondiscrimination . . . and the Plan for Progress.

Basically, it is a matter of human rights--a moral problem, if you will, which each of us must face at some point in time. We all accept the principle that no man has the right to interfere with the rights of another. To do so is unjust and, therefore, morally wrong. Perhaps the whole idea was never better expressed than in that single sentence in the Declaration of Independence: "We hold these truths to be self-evident: that all men are created equal and are endowed by their creator with certain inalienable rights . . ." This is undoubtedly one of the greatest challenges ever raised by man at bigotry, discrimination, and intolerance.

It follows then that to the extent that American Airlines denies to any man the opportunity for a job merely because of the color of his skin, we are doing that man an injustice. We are violating one of the fundamental moral principles upon which our whole free society has been built. In this room there are undoubtedly members of many different religions; yet not one of us would advocate discrimination on that basis. In the same way it is our job as members of management to see to it that there is no discrimination against any man because of the color of his hair, or differences in his manner of speech--or for any other similar reason.

We enjoy an excellent reputation for our record of good relationships among our people. You, as members of management, are certainly chiefly responsible for building and maintaining that reputation. Yet I think we'll have to agree that in some cases in the past, we may have fallen short in our responsibilities in this respect. There is no room whatever in the American Airlines organization for discrimination, intolerance, or bigotry--whether it is based on race, religion, or color. This is the fundamental principle confronting us. It is, if you will, the moral side of the issue. And on that basis alone, our course is clear.

And yet, this isn't the whole story. There are other, additional arguments which must be considered, growing from the fact that the people of this country do not like discrimination, particularly when they are the object of discrimination. By and large, people will approve an institution that is doing the right thing, and disapprove any company that is falling short in some important respect. Call it a matter of public image, if you will, or the image which American presents to its many customers and to the public at large. We have always been known as America's Leading Airline from the standpoint of service, dependability, and technological progress. There is no earthly reason why we should not form the pattern for others to follow in the equal treatment of our employees, and those who seek employment with us.

In following a policy and a program of equal opportunity, based on qualifications alone, we not only help to win the growing economic good will of the Negro business man and vacationer, but of the public as a whole. Thus, as we contribute to the social welfare of our community, we can expect to continue to build the kind of reputation that ultimately pays off in a higher volume of business.

There is yet another aspect of the problem which may affect our business. Let me read to you the government contract clause of an order issued by President Eisenhower: "In connection with the performance of work under this contract, the contractor agrees not to discriminate against any employee or applicant for employment because of race, religion, color, or national origin. The aforesaid provision shall include, but not be limited to, the following: Employment, Upgrading, Demotion, or Transfer; Recruitment or Recruitment advertising, Layoff or Termination, Rates of Pay or other forms of compensation; and selection for training, including apprenticeship. The contractor agrees to post hereafter in conspicuous places, available for employees or applicants for employment, notices to be provided by the contracting officer setting forth the provisions of the nondiscrimination clause." This means, in effect, that as a government contractor, we are subject to the provisions of this clause, just as are the large manufacturing and aerospace corporations who deal largely with government.

There's another, broader problem that affects us just as surely, though a little less directly. Present estimates are that the nation's 16 million Negroes have an annual income of about $15 billion dollars. One out of every ten people in this country is a Negro. If they all had equal opportunities to earn a better living, there would undoubtedly be many billions of dollars of additional purchasing power available. That would increase business activity, expand the demand for all kinds of products, including air transportation. It would help to create a healthier economy and therefore add to the prosperity of American Airlines and everyone associated with us.

Another reason arises from the results of discrimination. In many cases, crime, juvenile delinquency, and other social evils are traceable to the conditions that have been created by prejudice and discrimination. The cost of dealing with these problems, apart entirely from their effect on the society in which we all live, is tremendous. And each of us individually has to pay a share of that cost.

Then, too, American Airlines, like every other major corporation, is competing for the best available talent and experience to strengthen every phase of our operation. There are many highly qualified Negro people who could make a real contribution to this organization if they were selected on the basis of their qualifications regardless of the color of their skin.

There is another even broader reason for offering job opportunities to Negroes, and it has to do with the greatest threat of our times--the slow spread of communism throughout the world. There can be no question but that one of the strongest supports of communist activity in this country has been the fact that certain types of American citizens have been denied the full opportunities of our society. More than that, one of the strongest arguments of the communists in other parts of the world has been that there is discrimination in the United States.

This has helped to win for Soviet Russia the allegiance of people who might otherwise prefer our kind of democracy--and I would remind you that two-thirds of the world's population is colored. We all have a responsibility in this connection, to help eliminate the kind of discrimination that gives the communists ammunition to play up racial bigotry and create anti-American sentiment.

As we meet here today and discuss a problem like this, we may wonder just how difficult such an adjustment in many of our minds might be. The experience of all kinds of organizations--manufacturing, merchandising, and service, and other institutions such as colleges and universities--has generally been this: Once a program of nondiscrimination and equal opportunity is adopted, if it is properly handled, there are virtually no problems whatever. And, I think we have some evidence of this with our own experience to date. Negroes are in our employ as Sales Representatives, Personnel Representatives, Ticket Agents, Ramp Agents, Reservations Agents, Mechanics, Technical Foremen, Office and Clerical workers, and various Management/Specialist positions--and, of course, as Stewardesses. These employees are doing an excellent job of selling American, and are visual evidence of the company's non-discriminatory policies. They have received numerous letters of commendation for excellent job performance from the public and from supervisors. Each, in his own way, has set an example of the ideal toward which we are working.

To sum up, we have a moral obligation here, and what we do about this obligation, how we face it, how we present it to our people, will either help our business, or damage our business, help our community, or hurt our community, help our nation, or help our enemies. The choice is ours--yours and mine--and the course is clear.

Now, in terms of an actual creative effort, and positive action toward the solution of the problem, we must understand that under no circumstances will Negroes be employed just because they are Negroes. All applicants must meet employment standards and be well qualified for their job assignments when hired. Negroes will be placed thoughout the company according to their qualifications and abilities.

As our hiring continues, the Personnel Division will talk with each supervisor requisitioning new personnel, to determine the advisability of placement of a Negro applicant, should one be thoroughly qualified to fill the vacancy. At the same time, we should make it absolutely clear to all of our people that we will not depart from purpose or policy, nor yield to outside pressures of any kind which may develop; that we simply plan to offer greater employment transfer, and promotional opportunity to the Negro employee, according to his qualifications and ability.

We must solicit the cooperation and the understanding of all employees, and from the very few who might oppose this program, we must demand it.

This, broadly, is the company's position. It is of the utmost importance that each of you understand it fully and that you prepare yourself to do your part when the time comes; to transcend whatever personal emotion of resentment or resistance you may feel as a result of attitudes which you may have developed long ago; to work in a positive and cooperative spirit to the good of your company, your community, and your country; to view what we have said here today not as a command directive which forces you to change values and traditions in which you may most sincerely believe--but as policy developed by your company to provide equality and justice to human beings, who, like yourself, wish only to better themselves in a fruitful, productive, and meaningful way.

B. The Plan for Progress -- Background

Now, to discuss in detail the PLAN FOR PROGRESS, we will first distribute additional copies of the plan to you. You will recall that the PLAN was initially issued by mail to all Management and Specialist employees on March 15, 1963. We'll take a few minutes now, to present additional details and clarification concerning the PLAN FOR PROGRESS, and American's commitment to the ideals which the PLAN represents.

American Airlines became the first domestic airline to participate in the PLAN FOR PROGRESS program, which was sponsored by the President's Committee on Equal Employment Opportunity. Mr. C. R. Smith, and Mr. G. Marion Sadler signed a PLAN FOR PROGRESS statement along with corporate officers of other leading companies of the United States, at White House ceremonies on January 17, 1963.

Since then, we have re-emphasized--and pledge to continue--our policies for providing equal employment, transfer, and promotion opportunity for all persons, without regard to color, race, national origin, or creed. In addition these policies relate to equality in training, compensation, conditions and privileges of employment, layoff, recall, discipline, and discharge.

There can be no question of the intent of the company to implement and enforce this policy; it applies to every unit and section, to every station and city, to every function, and there can be no evasion, no lip service, no minimizing its intent or application. The policy applies to all employees, hourly, salaried, Management/Specialist, and Management, and must be activated with no mental reservation on the part of any supervisor in the performance of his duties of managing. You, as a member of management, have the responsiblity for the implementation of this policy. The meaning is clear and understandable. you should make certain that your employees know of this policy, and if they do not know of it, then you should make them aware of it, in a positive and constructive manner, leaving no room for interpretation or misunderstanding.

C. The Plan for Progress -- Specifics

a. General. -- The President of the United States has stated a national policy that all persons are entitled to equal employment opportunity, regardless of race, creed, color, or national origin.

American Airlines intends to follow the President's policy, and has voluntarily embarked on this company-wide program to expand and strengthen its efforts to promote equal opportunity.

This is a long range and a continuing program, and many problems lie ahead--not one of which is unsurmountable if approached openly, and with clear heads, clear thinking, and logic.

b. Policy. -- It should be thoroughly understood by your people that American Airlines continually seeks the best qualified applicants and employees in all categories of employment and work assignment, and that all such employment and assignment shall be made without regard, under any circumstances, to race, creed, color, or national origin. Further, that promotion, training, compensation, and conditions and privileges of employment, discharge, layoff, and recall, shall similarly be made without consideration to race, creed, color, or national origin.

How long has it been since you recommended any of your employees for promotion to a better job? Are there employees working for you now who have done superior work, who hold potential for moves to positions of greater responsibility?

Look around, when you return to your job, and make your recommendations, get them to the Personnel Division--but make certain, as you do this, that you have carefully considered everyone who may be qualified, and that you are not overlooking someone who has the potential we need, but who may have a darker skin, or a name unlike yours.

c. Dissemination of Policy. -- Each member of management has been provided with a copy of our PLAN FOR PROGRESS. In the event yours has been misplaced, we are distributing additional copies in connection with this talk. How many of you have discussed the PLAN with your people? Do your people know and understand the plan? What is their attitude toward the plan? If you haven't discussed the plan with your people as yet, when do you plan to do so?

d. Recruiting. -- In addition to being an "EQUAL OPPORTUNITY EMPLOYER" thru the issuance of the PLAN FOR PROGRESS and this re-statement of our policy of non-discrimination, American will continue to cooperate with educational organizations and school systems with emphasis toward programs designed to raise the level of aspiration of all youths.

e. Transfer, Promotion, Termination, and Recall. -- It has always been American's policy to promote from within the employees who have demonstrated by past performance that they are well qualified for promotion. When opportunities for transfer or promotion occur, careful measures must be taken to make certain that minority group employees receive equal consideration.

Every effort will be made to insure that equal consideration is given to all qualified candidates without regard to race, creed, color, or national origin.

f. Training, Compensation, Facilities. -- Minority group employees will have equal training and demonstrate equal capacity in job performance with regard to compensation. Facilities will continue to be maintained on a non-segregated basis.

g. Implementation of Policy. -- As was stated earlier in this presentation, the responsibility for compliance with this policy of non-discrimination rests with all members of management. It has been delegated from the office of Mr. C.R. Smith. We cannot avoid our individual responsibility in this area.

In addition to the implementation of this policy, all supervisors should examine facilities, bulletin boards, and the work environment to make certain that no documents or printed matter not specifically authorized by the Company or the Union are posted.

It should be generally known that the Company will under no circumstances tolerate displays which tend to discredit or degrade minority groups, and that disciplinary action, when required, will be prompt, direct, and severe, in every case. As a member of management, you are requested to police this very carefully, and to take firm and deliberate action when circumstances such as this occur.

D. Conclusion

The responsibility for the general supervision and coordination in implementing this policy has been assigned to the Vice President - Personnel. You should feel free to call upon the Personnel Division regarding any problems or questions which you may have in regard to minority group relations. Remember, the Personnel Division exists to aid you in the discharge of your duties, and to assist you in meeting your obligations as a supervisor. The Division can also be expected to maintain surveillance of the implementation of the PLAN FOR PROGRESS, and will from time to time, offer constructive recommendations concerning means of applying the PLAN. Above all, in order to succeed as it should, the PLAN requires constant team effort of all managers and supervisors. The success of the plan, lies in your hands as management representatives of American Airlines. We have every confidence in your ability to see it through.

Announcing a new and timely addition to BNA's labor information services . . .

FAIR EMPLOYMENT PRACTICES

If you are responsible for the conduct of employer-employee relations and/or have employment recruitment duties, BNA's new labor information service, FAIR EMPLOYMENT PRACTICES, is a "must" for you.

Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 makes it an avowed objective of the Federal Government to eliminate all employment discrimination based on race, color, religion, sex, or national origin in all industries affecting interstate commerce. The law imposes a new set of obligations upon employers, labor unions, and employment agencies. It gives employees, job applicants, and members of minority groups new rights, and it sets up machinery for enforcing those rights. It creates complex federal-state relationships in the enforcement of its provisions.

The purpose of BNA's FAIR EMPLOYMENT PRACTICES service is to keep you fully informed of the actual requirements of the federal and state laws dealing with "equal employment opportunity" and to acquaint you with the administrative and enforcement procedures already established or newly being developed under these laws.

• FULL TEXTS, CLEAR EXPLANATIONS

FAIR EMPLOYMENT PRACTICES combines textual material with editorial treatment. It provides full text of the applicable laws and regulations, summaries of court rulings, and clear explanations of what management can and can't do in this complex area of employment practices.

The service is divided into six sections. The first contains the text of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act; the executive orders forbidding discrimination by federal government contractors; and the regulations, forms, and administrative interpretations of the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission and the President's Committee on Equal Employment Opportunity.

The next four sections contain explanations of the coverage, prohibitions, administration and enforcement, and the reporting and record-keeping requirements of the Federal Act and orders. The final section contains the text of state laws, regulations and interpretations. The service is fully indexed.

• SERVICE KEPT UP-TO-DATE THROUGH REGULAR SUPPLEMENTATION

Every other week, you will receive a brief report, titled "Latest FEP Developments," covering current trends and events of special significance. And looseleaf supplement pages for the service itself will be issued promptly, whenever it is necessary to add new information or to replace material which has become outdated.

FAIR EMPLOYMENT PRACTICES has been developed as an addition to BNA's LABOR POLICY AND PRACTICE service and is coordinated and identified with that service. It is available, however, as a self-contained service in addition to being a unit of the complete LABOR POLICY AND PRACTICE service.

TITLE VII NEWS BRIEFS APRIL 1967

Highlights of what's happening at EEOC.....

RAISES OF $150 A MONTH, A $500 SETTLEMENT AND A NEW JOB went to a woman working for a metals company in New England.

Before EEOC conciliation, the company refused to promote her to the traditional male job of inventory control leadman. Through conciliation efforts, she was promoted to the job, and got an $80 a month -- or 15% -- raise. Within eight months her salary was raised an additional $70 a month, equal to the previous salary for the job.

The company also awarded her $500 in settlement of the damages caused by her being denied the opportunity to fill the job because of her sex.

* * * * * * * *

REHIRING WITH BACK PAY is what the EEOC calls for in the case of a Negro who was fired from his job in a Birmingham plant the same day that he used the restroom customarily used by white employees.

* * * * * * * *

NO VACANCIES FOR NEGROES, JOBS FOR WHITES is cause for violating Title VII, the Commission rules. A Negro woman was interviewed, tested and found qualified for a job in an Augusta, Georgia chain store. However, she was not hired because there were "no vacancies", even though that very day a white person was hired. The discrimination charge is in the process of EEOC conciliation.

EEOC

NEGRO GETS JOB as a result of EEOC's work. A Negro worker in a Georgia plant, who had been with the company for more than 12 years, was passed over in promotion and transfer opportunities by white men with less seniority and qualifications. He had applied for a cabinet maker's job several times and had been passed by. After the Commission's conciliation agreement was completed, he got the job -- and a lump sum adjustment.

* * * * * * * *

GRANTING EQUAL FRINGE BENEFITS FOR MEN AND WOMEN EMPLOYEES -- and their spouses -- is the law. The Commission found that a transportation company went against the law when it gave pass priveleges to wives of male employees, but not to husbands of female employees.

A CONCENTRATED EFFORT is needed to close the job gap between whites and non-whites, said Stephen N. Shulman, Chairman of the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, at a meeting of business leaders in Detroit. "Equal employment opportunity is a full-time job", he stressed, calling for "the reduction of minority unemployment and correction of patterns of distribution which find minority employees in the low job categories."

FOR RELEASE ON RECEIPT

Washington, D.C. --- Hobart Taylor, Jr., has been confirmed by the Senate as a member of the board of directors of the Export-Import Bank.

Mr. Taylor, Executive Vice Chairman of the President's Committee on Equal Employment Opportunity and Associate Counsel to the President, was nominated for the board by President Johnson on August 26.

Although he will be giving up his two former titles to take the new position, Mr. Taylor will keep in close contact with the programs for which he formerly was responsible.

Vice President Hubert H. Humphrey has asked him to be his personal representative to Plans for Progress and to continue to guide the program as he has in the past.

Plans for Progress is a voluntary cooperative program of the President's Committee in which 316 major American corporations, employing more than 8.6 million persons, have joined together to provide leadership in the field of equal opportunity.

Mr. Taylor will be one of five directors of the Export-Import Bank (Eximbank), which was first created under the laws of the District of Columbia in 1934. It has been a self-supporting independent agency of the Federal Government since 1945.

The job of the Eximbank is to supply credit and other financial services, such as guarantees and insurance, to facilitate our country's foreign trade.

As a practical matter, it handles mainly export transactions and thus can play a large part in keeping the nation's balance of payments favorable.

Since the bank's creation 31 years ago, it has authorized loan, guarantee and insurance transactions totalling more than $18 billion.

In doing so, it has assisted thousands of exporters, manufacturers and sellers of capital equipment, agricultural commodities and consumer goods, as well as suppliers of engineering, construction and shipping services.

Under current legislation, the bank may have outstanding commitments of up to $9 billion. The bank has an authorized capital of $1 billion subscribed by the U.S. Treasury -- on which it has paid dividends at the rate of five per cent for the last several years -- and has the authority to borrow up to $6 billion from the Treasury. It pays interest on these borrowings that are equivalent to the cost of the money to the Treasury.

Most of the bank's borrowed funds, however, are obtained in the private market through the sale of participations in its loan protfolio. The bank's outstanding commitments are limited by legislation to $9 billion.

The charter of the bank directs it to supplement and encourage private capital, not to compete with it. Thus, the Eximbank never knowingly authorizes a loan when private financing is available to the borrower. The bank's credit is used for exports of specific U.S. goods and services. The exports it finances must be paid for in U.S. dollars.

Actually, the dollars the Eximbank lends do not leave the United States -- they go straight to American suppliers.

Eximbank's programs are of two basic types: direct loans to overseas buyers, and guarantees and insurance extended to U.S. suppliers.

The first includes situations where the Bank itself negotiates long-term capital loans directly with potential foreign buyers of U.S. Goods and services. The recipients may be either U.S. or foreign firms, or foreign governments or their agencies. The projects financed involve almost every kind of enterprise which contributes to the economic development of the borrower's country -- manufacturing plants, power plants, mines, bridges, etc. The loans for these projects vary from a few hundred thousand dollars to more than $100 million.

The second type of program -- supplier credits -- embraces all assistance to U.S. exporters who extend credits to their overseas customers, either by themselves or in conjunction with their commercial banks.

Within this area, the bank has two major programs -- first, a system of guarantees issued to U.S. commercial banks which extend credit to U.S. exporters, and second, an export credit insurance plan carried out in conjunction with a group of private American insurance firms. These two programs initiated in 1961, have expanded to the point where they now account for about half of the bank's current commitments.

Besides increasing exports, these programs serve to widen the participation of American private enterprise in the financing of foreign trade.

In addition to these principal programs, the Eximbank also has a variety of other programs, including emergency foreign credits to government that normally are good customers of the U.S.; loans or guarantees for the purchase of U.S. agricultural commodities; advance commitments for U.S. manufacturers who want to bid on specific foreign orders; guarantees to cover political and commercial risks in the sale of technical or professional services abroad; and guarantees against loss on leases of American equipment to foreigners and against loss on goods held on consignment.

During the past calendar year, the gross income of the Eximbank was about $180 million and out of this were paid administrative expenses of less than $4 million; interest on borrowings of about $58 million; dividends to the Treasury of about $50 million; and payments into reserves for contingencies of about $68 million.

EXECUTIVE ORDER

EQUAL EMPLOYMENT OPPORTUNITY

Under and by virtue of the authority vested in me as President of the United States by the Constitution and statutes of the United States, it is ordered as follows:

PART I - Nondiscrimination in Government Employment

SECTION 101. It is the policy of the Government of the United States to provide equal opportunity in Federal employment for all qualified persons, to prohibit discrimination in employment because of race, creed, color, or national origin, and to promote the full realization of equal employment opportunity through a positive, continuing program in each executive department and agency. The policy of equal opportunity applies to every aspect of Federal employment policy and practice.

SEC. 102. The head of each executive department and agency shall establish and maintain a positive program of equal employment opportunity for all civilian employees and applicants for employment within his jurisdiction in accordance with the policy set forth in Section 101.

SEC. 103. The Civil Service Commission shall supervise and provide leadership and guidance in the conduct of equal employment oppoftunity programs for the civilian employees of and applications for employment within the executive departments and agencies and shall review agency program accomplishments periodically. In order to facilitate the achievement of a model program for equal employment opportunity in the Federal service, the Commission may consult from time to time with such individuals, groups, or organizations as may be of assistance in improving the Federal program and realizing the objectives of this Part.

SEC. 104. The Civil Service Commission shall provide for the prompt, fair, and impartial consideration of all complaints of discrimination in Federal employment on the basis of race, creed, color, or national origin. Procedures for the consideration of complaints shall include at least one impartial review within the executive department or agency and shall provide for appeal to the Civil Service Commission.

SEC. 105. The Civil Service Commission shall issue such regulations, orders, and instructions as it deems necessary and appropriate to carry out its responsibilities under this Part, and the head of each executive department and agency shall comply with the regulations, orders, and instructions issued by the Commission under this Part.

PART II - Nondiscrimination in Employment by Government Contractors and Subcontractors

Subpart A - Duties of the Secretary of Labor

SEC. 201. The Secretary of Labor shall be responsible for the administration of Parts II and III of this Order and shall adopt such rules and regulations and issue such orders as he deems necessary and appropriate to achieve the purposes thereof.

Subpart B - Contractors' Agreements

SEC. 202. Except in contracts exempted in accordance with Section 204 of this Order, all Government contracting agencies shall include in every Government contract hereafter entered into the following provisions:

"During the performance of this contract, the contractor agrees as follows:

"(1) The contractor will not discriminate against any employee or applicant for employment because of race, creed, color, or national origin. The contractor will take affirmative action to ensure that applicants are employed, and that employees are treated during employment, without regard to their race, creed, color, or national origin. Such action shall include, but not be limited to the following: employment, upgrading, demotion, or transfer; recruitment or recruitment advertising; layoff or termination; rates of pay or other forms of compensation; and selection for training, including apprenticeship. The contractor agrees to post in conspicuous places, available to employees and applicants for employment, notices to be provided by the contracting officer setting forth the provisions of this nondiscrimination clause.

"(2) The contractor will, in all solicitations or advertisements for employees placed by or on behalf of the contractor, state that all qualified applicants will receive consideration for employment without regard to race, creed, color, or national origin.

"(3) The contractor will send to each labor union or representative of workers with which he has a collective bargaining agreement or other contract or understanding, a notice, to be provided by the agency contracting officer, advising the labor union or workers' representative of the contractor's commitments under Section 202 of Executive Order No. 11246 of Sept. 24, 1965, and shall post copies of the notice in conspicuous places available to employees and applicants for employment.

"(4) The contractor will comply with all provisions of Executive Order No. 11246 of Sept. 24, 1965, and of the rules, regulations, and relevant orders of the Secretary of Labor.

"(5) The contractor will furnish all information and reports required by Executive Order No. 11246 of Sept. , 1965, and by the rules, regulations, and orders of the Secretary of Labor, or pursuant thereto, and will permit access to his books, records, and accounts by the contacting agency and the Secretary of Labor for purposes of investigation to ascertain compliance with such rules, regulations, and orders.

"(6) In the event of the contractor's noncompliance with the nondiscrimination clauses of this contract or with any of such rules, regulations, or orders, this contract may be cancelled, terminated, or suspended in whole or in part and the contractor may be declared ineligible for further Government contracts in accordance with procedures authorized in Executive Order No. 11246 of Sept. 24 , 1965, and such other sanctions may be imposed and remedies involved as provided in Executive Order No. 11246 of Sept. 24 , 1965, or by rule, regulation, or order of the Secretary of Labor, or as otherwise provided by law.

"(7) The contractor will include the provisions of Paragraphs (1) through (7) in every subcontract or purchase order unless exempted by rules, regulations, or orders of the Secretary of Labor issued pursuant to Section 204 of Executive Order No. 11246 of Sept. 24 , 1965, so that such provisions will be binding upon each subcontractor or vendor. The contractor will take such action with respect to any subcontract or purchase order as the contracting agency may direct as a means of enforcing such provisions including sanctions for noncompliance: Provided, however, That in the event the contractor becomes involved in, or is threatened with, litigation with a subcontractor or vendor as a result of such direction by the contracting agency, the contractor may request the United States to enter into such litigation to protect the interests of the United States.

SEC. 203. (a) Each contractor having a contract containing the provisions prescribed in Section 202 shall file, and shall cause each of his subcontractors to file, Compliance Reports with the contracting agency or the Secretary of Labor as may be directed. Compliance Reports shall be filed within such times and shall contain such information as to the practices, policies, programs, and employment policies, programs, and employment statistics of the contractor and each subcontractor, and shall be in such form, as the Secretary of Labor may prescribe.

(b) Bidders or prospective contractors or subcontractors may be required to state whether they have participated in any previous contract subject to the provisions of this Order, or any preceding similar Executive order, and in that event to submit, on behalf of themselves and their proposed subcontractors, Compliance Reports prior to or as an initial part of their bid or negotiation of a contract.

(c) Whenever the contractor or subcontractor has a collective bargaining agreement or other contract or understanding with a labor union or an agency referring workers or providing or supervising apprenticeship or training for such workers, the Compliance Report shall include such information as to such labor union's or agency's practices and policies affecting compliance as the Secretary of Labor may prescribe: Provided, That to the extent such information is within the exclusive possession of a labor union or an agency referring workers of providing or supervising apprenticeship or training and such labor union or agency shall refuse to furnish such information to the contractor, the contractor shall so certify to the contracting agency as part of its Compliance Report and shall set forth what efforts he has made to obtain such information.

(d) The contracting agency or the Secretary of Labor may direct that any bidder or prospective contractor or subcontractor shall submit, as part of his Compliance Report, a statement in writing, signed by an authorized officer or agent on behalf of any labor union or any agency referring workers or providing or supervising apprenticeship or other training, with which the bidder or prospective contractor deals, with supporting information, to the effect that the signer's practices and policies do not discriminate on the grounds of race, color, creed, or national origin, and that the signer either will affirmatively cooperate in the implementation of thepolicy and provisions of this Order or that it consents and agrees that recruitment, employment, and the terms and conditions of employment under the proposed contract shall be in accordance with the purposes and provisions of the Order. In the event that the union, or the agency shall refuse to execute such a statement, the Compliance Report shall so certify and set forth what efforts have been made to secure such a statement and such additional factual material as the contracting agency or the Secretary of Labor may require.

exemptions by rule

SEC. 204. The Secretary of Labor may, when he deems that special circumstances in the national interest so require, exempt a contracting agency from the requirement of including any or all of the provisions of Section 202 of this Order in any specific contract, subcontract, or purchase order. The Secretary of Labor may, by rule or regulation, also exempt certain classes of contracts, subcontracts, or purchase orders (1) whenever work is to be or has been performed outside the United States and no recruitment of workers within the limits of the United States is involved; (2) for standard commercial supplies or raw materials; (3) involving less than specified amounts of money or specified numbers of workers; or (4) to the extent that they involve subcontracts below a specified tier. ? The Secretary of Labor may also provide, by rule, regulation, or order, for the exemption of facilities of a contractor which are in all respects separate and distinct from activities of the contractor related to the performance of the contract: Provided, That such an exemption will not interfere with or impede the effectuation of the purposes of this Order: And provided further, That in the absence of such an exemption all facilities shall be covered by the provisions of this Order.

Subpart C - Powers and Duties of the Secretary of Labor and the Contracting Agencies

SEC. 205. Each contracting agency shall be primarily responsible for obtaining compliance with the rules, regulations, and orders of the Secretary of Labor with respect to contracts entered into by such agency or its contractors. All contracting agencies shall comply with the rules of the Secretary of Labor in discharging their primary responsibility for securing compliance with the provisions of contracts and otherwise with the terms of this Order and of the rules, regulations, and orders of the Secretary of Labor issued pursuant to this Order. They are directed to cooperate with the Secretary of Labor and to furnish the Secretary of Labor such information and assistance as he may require in the performance of his functions under this Order. They are further directed to appoint or designate, from among the agency's personnel, compliance officers. It shall be the duty of such officers to seek compliance with the objectives of this Order by conference, conciliation, mediation, or persuasion.

SEC. 206. (a) The Secretary of Labor may investigate the employment practices of any Government contractor or subcontractor, or initiate such investigation by the appropriate contracting agency, to determine whether or not the contractual provisions specified in Section 202 of this Order have been violated. Such investigation shall be conducted in accordance with the procedures established by the Secretary of Labor and the investigating agency shall report to the Secretary of Labor any action taken or recommended.

(b) The Secretary of Labor may receive and investigate or cause to be investigated complaints by employees or prospective employees of a Government contractor or subcontractor which allege discrimination contrary to the contractual provisions specified in Section 202 of this Order. If this investigation is conducted for the Secretary of Labor by a contracting agency, that agency shall report to the Secretary what action has been taken or is recommended with regard to such complaints.

SEC. 207. The Secretary of Labor shall use his best efforts, directly and through contracting agencies, other interested Federal, State, and local agencies, contractors, and all other available instrumentalities to cause any labor union engaged in work under Government contracts or any agency referring workers or providing or supervising apprenticeship or training for or in the course of such work to cooperate in the implementation of the purposes of this Order. The Secretary of Labor shall, in appropriate cases, notify the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, the Department of Justice, or other appropriate Federal agencies whenever it has reason to believe that the practices of any such labor organization or agency violate Title VI or Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 or other provision of Federal law.

SEC. 208. (a) The Secretary of Labor, or any agency, officer, or employee in the executive branch of the Government designated by rule, regulation, or order of the Secretary, may hold such hearings, public or private, as the Secretary may deem advisable for compliance, enforcement, or educational purposes.

(b) The Secretary of Labor may hold, or cause to be held, hearings in accordance with Subsection (a) of this Section prior to imposing, ordering, or recommending the imposition of penalties and sanctions under this Order. No order for debarment of any contractor from further Government contracts under Section 209(a)(6) shall be made without affording the contractor an opportunity for a hearing.

Subpart D - Sanctions and Penalties

SEC. 209. (a) In accordance with such rules, regulations, or orders as the Secretary of Labor may issue or adopt, the Secretary or the appropriate contracting agency may;

check BNA

(1) Publish, or cause to be published, the names of contractors or unions which it has concluded have compiled or have failed to comply with the provisions of this Order or of the rules, regulations, and orders of the Secretary of Labor.

(2) Recommend to the Department of Justice that, in cases in which there is substantial or material violation or the threat of substantial or material violation of the contractual provisions set forth in Section 202 of this Order, appropriate proceedings be brought to enforce these provisions, including the enjoining, within the limitations of applicable law, of organizations, individuals, or groups who prevent directly or indirectly, or seek to prevent directly or indirectly, compliance with the provisions of this Order.

(3) Recommend to the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission or the Department of Justice that appropriate proceedings be instituted under Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964.

(4) Recommend to the Department of Justice that criminal proceedings be brought for the furnishing of false information to any contracting agency or to the Secretary of Labor as the case may be.

(5) Cancel, terminate, suspend, or cause to be cancelled, terminated, or suspended, any contract, or any portion or portions thereof, for failure of the contractor or subcontractor to comply with the nondiscrimination provisions of the contract. Contracts may be cancelled, terminated, or suspended absolutely or continuance of contracts may be conditioned upon a program for future compliance approved by the contracting agency.

(6) Provide that any contracting agency shall refrain from entering into further contracts, or extensions or other modifications of existing contracts, with any noncomplying contractor, until such contractor has satisfied the Secretary of Labor that such contractor has established and will carry out personnel and employment policies in compliance with the provisions of this Order.

(b) Under rules and regulations prescribed by the Secretary of Labor, each contracting agency shall make reasonable efforts within a reasonable time limitation to secure compliance with the contract provisions of this Order by methods of conference, conciliation, mediation, and persuasion before proceedings shall be instituted under Subsection (a) (2) of this Section, or before a contract shall be cancelled or terminated in whole or in part under Subsection (a) (5) of this Section for failure of a contractor or subcontractor to comply with the contract provisions of this Order.

SEC. 210. Any contracting agency taking any action authorized by this Subpart, whether on its own motion, or as directed by the Secretary of Labor, or under the rules and regulations of the Secretary, shall promptly notify the Secretary of such action. Whenever the Secretary of Labor makes a determination under this Section, he shall promptly notify the appropriate contracting agency of the action recommended. The agency shall take such action and shall report the results thereof to the Secretary of Labor within such time as the Secretary shall specify.

SEC. 211. If the Secretary shall so direct, contracting agencies shall not enter into contracts with any bidder or prospective contractor unless the bidder or prospective contractor has satisfactorily complied with the provisions of this Order or submits a program for compliance acceptable to the Secretary of Labor or, if the Secretary so authorizes, to the contracting agency.

SEC. 212. Whenever a contracting agency cancels or terminates a contract, or whenever a contractor has been debarred from further Government contracts, under Section 209 (a) (6) because of noncompliance with the contract provisions with regard to nondiscrimination, the Secretary of Labor, or the contracting agency involved, shall promptly notify the Comptroller General of the United States. Any such debarment may be rescinded by the Secretary of Labor or by the contracting agency which imposed the sanction.

Subpart E -- Certificates of Merit

SEC. 213. The Secretary of Labor may provide for issuance of a United States Government Certificate of Merit to employers or labor unions, or other agencies which are or may hereafter be engaged in work under Government contracts, if the Secretary is satisfied that the personnel and employment practices of the employer, or that the personnel, training, apprenticeship, membership, grievance and representation, upgrading, and other practices and policies of the labor union or other agency conform to the purposes and provisions of this Order.

Secty 15 Sec'd any?

SEC. 214. Any Certificate of Merit may at any time be suspended or revoked by the Secretary of Labor if the holder thereof, in the judgment of the Secretary, has failed to comply with the provisions of this Order.

SEC. 215. The Secretary of Labor may provide for the exemption of any employer, labor union, or other agency from any reporting requirements imposed under or pursuant to this Order if such employer, labor union, or other agency has been awarded a Certificate of Merit which has not been suspended or revoked.

PART III - Nondiscrimination Provisions in Federally Assisted Construction Contracts

SEC. 301. Each executive department and agency which administers a program involving Federal financial assistance shall require as a condition for the approval of any grant, contract, loan, insurance, or guarantee thereunder, which may involve a construction contract, that the applicant for Federal assistance undertake and agree to incorporate, or cause to be incorporated, into all construction contracts paid for in whole or in part with funds obtained from the Federal Government or borrowed on the credit of the Federal Government pursuant to such grant, contract, loan, insurance, or guarantee, or undertaken pursuant to any Federal program involving such grant, contract, loan, insurance, or guarantee, the provisions prescribed for Government contracts by Section 203 of this Order or such modification thereof, preserving in substance the contractor's obligations thereunder, as may be approved by the Secretary of Labor, together with such additional provisions as the Secretary deems appropriate to establish and protect the interest of the United States in the enforcement of those obligations. Each such applicant shall also undertake and agree (1) to assist and cooperate actively with the administering department or agency and the Secretary of Labor in obtaining the compliance of contractors and subcontractors with those contract provisions and with the rules, regulations, and relevant orders of the Secretary, (2) to obtain and to furnish to the administering department or agency and to the Secretary of Labor such information as they may require for the supervision of such compliance, (3) to carry out sanctions and penalties for violation of such obligations imposed upon contractors and subcontractors by the Secretary of Labor or the administering department or agency pursuant to Part II, Subpart D, of this Order, and (4) to refrain from entering into any contract subject to this Order, or extension or other modification of such a contract with a contractor debarred from Government contracts under Part II, Subpart D, of this Order.

BNA Sec'y's modification ?

SEC. 302. (a) "Construction contract" as used in this Order means any contract for the construction, rehabilitation, alteration, conversion, extension, or repair of buildings, highways, or other improvements to real property.

(b) The provisions of Part II of this Order shall apply to such construction contracts, and for purposes of such application the administering department or agency shall be considered the contracting agency referred to therein.

(c) The term "applicant" as used in this Order means an applicant for Federal assistance or, as determined by agency regulation, other program participant, with respect to whom an application for any grant, contract, loan, insurance, or guarantee is not finally acted upon prior to the effective date of this Part, and it includes such an applicant after he becomes a recipient of such Federal assistance.

SEC. 303. (a) Each administering department and agency shall be responsible for obtaining the compliance of such applicants with their undertakings under this Order. Each administering department and agency is directed to cooperate with the Secretary of Labor, and to furnish the Secretary such information and assistance as he may require in the performance of his functions under this Order.

(b) In the event an applicant fails and refuses to comply with his undertakings, the administering department or agency may take any or all of the following actions: (1) cancel, terminate, or suspend in whole or in part the agreement, contract, or other arrangement with such applicant with respect to which the failure and refusal occurred; (2) refrain from extending any further assistance to the applicant under the program with respect to which the failure or refusal occurred until satisfactory assurance of future compliance has been received from such applicant; and (3) refer the case to the Department of Justice for appropriate legal proceedings.

(c) Any action with respect to an applicant pursuant to Subsection (b) shall be taken in conformity with Section 602 of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 (and the regulations of the administering department or agency issued thereunder), to the extent applicable. In no case shall action be taken with respect to an applicant pursuant to Clause (1) or (2) of Subsection (b) without notice and opportunity for hearing before the administering department or agency.

SEC. 304. Any executive department or agency which imposes by rule, regulation, or order requirements of non-discrimination in employment, other than requirements imposed pursuant to this Order, may delegate to the Secretary of Labor by agreement such responsibilities with respect to compliance standards, reports, and procedures as would tend to bring the administration of such requirements into conformity with the administration of requirements imposed under this Order: Provided, That actions to effect compliance by recipients of Federal financial assistance with requirements imposed pursuant to Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 shall be taken in conformity with the procedures and limitations prescribed in Section 602 thereof and the regulations of the administering department or agency issued thereunder.

PART IV - Miscellaneous

SEC. 401. The Secretary of Labor may delegate to any officer, agency, or employee in the Executive branch of the Government, any function or duty of the Secretary under Parts II and III of this Order, except authority to promulgate rules and regulations of a general nature.

SEC. 402. The Secretary of Labor shall provide administrative support for the execution of the program known as the "Plans for Progress."

SEC. 403. (a) Executive Orders Nos. 10590 (January 18, 1955), 10722 (August 5, 1957), 10925 (March 6, 1961), 11114 (June 22, 1963), and 11162 (July 28, 1964), are hereby superseded and the President's Committee on Equal Employment Opportunity established by Executive Order No. 10925 is hereby abolished. All records and property in the custody of the Committee shall be transferred to the Civil Service Commission and the Secretary of Labor, as appropriate.

(b) Nothing in this Order shall be deemed to relieve any person of any obligation assumed or imposed under or pursuant to any Executive Order superseded by this Order. All rules, regulations, orders, instructions, designations, and other directives issued by the President's Committee on Equal Employment Opportunity and those issued by the heads of various departments or agencies under or pursuant to any of the Executive orders superseded by this Order, shall, to the extent that they are not inconsistent with this Order, remain in full force and effect unless and until revoked or superseded by appropriate authority. References in such directives to provisions of the superseded orders shall be deemed to be references to the comparable provisions of this Order.

SEC. 404. The General Services Administration shall take appropriate action to revise the standard Government contract forms to accord with the provisions of this Order and of the rules and regulations of the Secretary of Labor.

SEC. 405. This Order shall become effective 30 days after the date of this Order.

Dear Mr. Ames:

Too long ago, on August 9, you wrote me a letter. It arrived on the eve of my departure from the University of Wisconsin on a year's leave of absence to be with the Southern Regional Council. Vacation and resettlement have taken their toll in time and so I am just now answering your inquiry.

First off, I have very little that I can tell you. The project to which Joe Mire of the National Institute of Labor Education referred is quite interesting. Nothing is currently underway, however, so that most of your questions must go unanswered. Mire will return from Europe early this month after which an arrangement may be made to start the program which would involve me and the Southern Regional Council.

The NILE proposal is not limited to literacy training but envisions other remedial training, education in basic union courses, and educational approaches to social, political, and economic understanding. The program is aimed specifically towards disadvantaged unionists; although I think it is an important program, I would be reluctant to describe it as a major one. It proposes to run several demonstration projects. We would seek a good bit of outside counsel on anything relating to strictly literacy or remedial work. We are as much, or more, interested in ways of reaching people, keeping them involved, developing social understanding, and developing leadership as we are in specific performance in literacy training or the development of materials. You will understand, however, how the two emphases run hand in hand.

You could do me a real service by supplying more information about your own program. It would be of special interest to know the kinds of materials you are developing, the skills and training needed to properly utilize them, on what basis they are available to others and whether you are looking for groups to cooperate in testing them.

Thanks for your interest in the proposal here and we certainly look forward to hearing about your own undertaking.

Sincerely,

Emory F. Via

Dear Dr. Wallace:

You had written to me at the University of Wisconsin regarding the interests of the Office of Technical Studies. I am on leave of absence from the University working with the Southern Regional Council. I would like to respond to your letter for myself and on behalf of Paul Anthony, Director of the Council, to whom you had also written.

Two suggestions of researchers interested in the same area as E.E.O.C. come readily to mind. I would guess that you have been in touch with both of them.

I am sending under separate cover several items which reflect some of the Council's interest in this area. Three city employment studies will be included which are certainly dated at this point.

We would be pleased to cooperate with you or your advisory committee in future undertakings. Will you let us know the composition of the committee when it has been selected? We would also welcome any listing or summaries of current research which you might prepare.

Best wishes in your new undertaking.

Dear Ben:

I have been in touch with:

Atlanta, Georgia 30303

Eliza Paschal, Director
Atlanta Council on Human Relations
5 Forsyth Street, N.W.
Atlanta, Georgia 30303.

They are interested in meeting with you regarding E.E.O.C. and problems relating to employment in Georgia metropolitan areas.

Since I am away from the office and will be for several weeks I urge you to be in direct contact with these two people.

They will be interested in the general character of the meeting. By and large they will want to get down to cases as to how EEOC and local groups can cooperate for effective action to end discrimination in employment. In part they will need to understand clearly the different governmental avenues available for work on employment discrimination, and then to get a clear picture of what EEOC is and how it operates. But I don't think they will settle for this alone and will want to get down to what actually can be done in the Atlanta employment market.

It could be that the two groups would want two rather than one meeting. I suggest that you simply ask them to make a determination on this and let you know their 'druthers'.

I can be reached at the University of Georgia in Athens, at the Center for Continuing Education.

Best wishes to the family.

Mrs. Eliza Paschall
Executive Director

January 27, 1966

You and your associates are invited to discuss with the Honorable Franklin D. Rooselt, Jr., and the senior staff officers of the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission the Commission's rules, plan and administration of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act, on Wednesday, February 2, at 2:30 p. m., at the Architects and Engineers Institute, 230 Spring St., N. W., (Spring and Harris) 3rd floor.

Mr. Roosevelt and his party will be in Atlanta for the opening of the EEOC Regional office, at 1776 Peachtree St., which will be headed by Mr. Donald Hollowell, as regional director.

In a morning session with Atlanta business men, equal employement opportunity matters will be discussed from the viewpoint of those in management. The afternoon session will take them up from the viewpoint of other groups involved.

The afternoon schedule will be:

2:30 to 3:30	Discussion with panel composed of Mr. Clarence Duncan, General Counsel, EEOC Prof. Alfred Blumerose, Director Conciliation, EEOC Mr. Roger McKenzie, Director of Technical Assistance, EEOC Mr. Ben Segal, Director of Liaison, EEOC
3:15	Coffee
3:30	The Honorable Franklin D. Roosevelt, Jr., Chairman, EEOC
4:00	Adjournment

The Council on Human Relations of Greater Atlanta is pleased to have been asked to issue this invitation and we hope that you will be with us.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH

Ben D. Segal is Director, Office of Liaison, Equal Employment Opportunity Commission. He was formerly on the staff of the Vice President as Special Assistant for Employment, President's Council on Equal Opportunity.

In the area of Civil Rights, he is Chairman of the Community Advisers on Equal Employment. This is an Ad Hoc advisory group which includes representatives of industry, labor, church, civil rights organizations and government in Metropolitan Washington. The Community Advisers recently prepared the published report "Equal Employment in the Nation's Capital."

He has received a number of awards for his work in Civil Rights, including the 1964 Washington, D. C. Annual Award for "His Dedicated and Steadfast Leadership in the Advancement of Human Rights and Equal Opportunity." In 1965 he was named to the annual Afro-American Honor Roll and presented a plaque for his efforts in "behalf of fair employment and fair housing" in the Nation's Capital.

Mr. Segal has written and edited a number of pamphlets, articles and study guides in the field of Civil Rights. Among these are "Racism in the South," "Civil Rights in the Nation's Capital: A Decade of Progress," "Fair Employment in the Nation's Capital," "Report on Washington, D. C.: Employment." He serves on the board of Friendship House and on the boards of numerous Civil Rights and social action organizations. He has served on the executive boards and is now a member of the National Association of Intergroup Relations Officials (NAIRO), the NAACP, the Urban League, etc.

Prior to his employment with the U.S. Government in June 1965, Mr. Segal was the Director of the National and International Affairs Department of the International Union of Electrical Workers, AFL-CIO. In this capacity, he coordinated the union's educational, Civil Rights, political-legislative and international affairs programs. He has also worked for the National CIO and Textile Union Workers of America in the south as well as with the International Ladies' Garment Workers Union. He has served five terms as President of the Workers Education Local of the American Federation of Teachers, AFL-CIO, and is presently a member of their executive board.

While working with the unions, he was extensively involved in international labor activities. He has participated in numerous international conferences and seminars in most of the European countries and Latin America, British Guiana, British West Indies, Israel, etc.

Mr. Segal was awarded a Senior Fulbright Fellowship in 1953-1954. More recently, he has been the recipient of three cultural exchange grants by the U. S. Department of State.

EEOC Team Tours South

by FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT, JR.
Chairman

A Commission team has just completed a tour of four major Southern cities during which workshops were held with business and industry leaders to explain the requirements of Title VII and ways in which voluntary compliance can be accomplished through affirmative action.

The now famous '66 blizzard prevented me from getting to the first meeting at New Orleans, but Charles T. Duncan, general counsel, Alfred Blumrosen, chief of conciliation, and George Butler, education specialist, carried the ball and conducted a successful session with more than 150 business and industry leaders. The workshop was sponsored by the New Orleans Chamber of Commerce.

I was able to reach Memphis in time for a luncheon speech and informal gathering following the morning workshops, which were conducted by Duncan and Blumrosen, with an assist from Robert Gale, our public affairs director, who managed to get to Memphis the night before. More than 250 from Memphis and the Mid-South area of Arkansas, Mississippi and West Tennessee took part in the Memphis sessions and luncheon at the invitation of the Chamber of Commerce.

Roger McKenzie, our chief of technical assistance, caught up with us in Memphis and finally our full team went into action in the third city—Atlanta. Although attendance in Atlanta—almost 100—was not as extensive as it had been in the previous two cities, the sessions were active and the team was well-received as it had been in New Orleans and Memphis. We opened the Commission's first regional office at Atlanta with

Agreements Worked Out With Kaiser Aluminum and A&P

EEOC Chairman Franklin D. Roosevelt, Jr., announced the successful conciliation of a case involving the Kaiser Aluminum Company.

Roosevelt also expressed confidence that a satisfactory settlement of the first employment discrimination lawsuit filed under Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 will result from agreements now being worked out with the Atlantic and Pacific Tea Co.

Details of the A&P case are as follows:

A lawsuit was filed against A&P on behalf of Annie Brinkley who charged she was denied a job because of her race. A&P and the attorney for Mrs. Brinkley have agreed to a 90-day postponement of further proceedings in the U. S. District Court to enable the details of the agreement to be worked out.

Roosevelt was not at liberty to disclose the precise terms of the proposed agreement but he indicated that it included these points: 1. Making it easier for all persons to secure applications for employment, and 2. The establishment of permanent two-way channels of communications between the Negro community in North Carolina and the company.

The Kaiser Aluminum Case involved a complaint charging discrimination in the operation of the seniority system at Kaiser's Baton Rouge plant in Louisiana.

The settlement was worked out with representatives of the Company, and of the Aluminum Workers International and Local Union for the Negro complainants.

Details of the agreement are as follows:

Affirmative Action

The first EEOC-inspired on-the-job training program was initiated last month in Nashville, Tenn., as the result of the conciliation efforts of EEOC-staffer Ken Holbert.

The Nashville firm signed a federal training program agreement and reports that 30 trainees are enrolled. When the trainees finish training they will assume skilled jobs.

May 17, 1966

As a part of its program of stimulating and encouraging greater interest within the social science community in the problems of discrimination in employment, the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission sponsored a conference on priorities in job opportunities research. A copy of the recommendations made by the ad hoc advisory panel is enclosed.

We expect that the recommendations will be considerably refined as a result of their review by government and other researchers. We welcome your comments and suggestions.

EQUAL EMPLOYMENT OPPORTUNITY COMMISSION
OFFICE OF RESEARCH AND REPORTS
WASHINGTON, D. C. 20506

RECOMMENDATIONS ON RESEARCH IN JOB OPPORTUNITIES MADE BY THE AD HOC RESEARCH ADVISORY GROUP FEBRUARY 2, 1966

Introduction

This report summarizes the major recommendations for research in job opportunities that were advocated by a panel of social science researchers that convened at the Commission headquarters on February 2, 1966. Recommendations submitted by Dr. Vivian Henderson, Chairman of the Jobs Panel for the Planning Session of the White House Conference (November 1965) have been included. We hope that the "consensus model" presented below reflects adequately the great diversity of ideas generated by the group.

General Recommendations

1. The Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, to the extent that it can, should encourage, direct, and shape research in equal employment opportunity in the United States. The focus of such research should be on those things which are well beyond the narrow legal powers and stated functions of the Commission.

2. Highest priority was placed by the conference on the kind of research which "pushes and pulls" the Negro through the doors which have been opened by law in some cases and in other instances opened by a new moral climate in the U. S. This research should be geared to the strategy of intervention, that is the technique of change toward certain goals. Although occasional reference was made to the status of other minority groups, the consensus was that the plight of the Negro demanded a major commitment of resources for research.

3. Because the state of research in equal employment opportunities is very good, with considerable research now in progress, there is need for a clearinghouse. Such an operation would undertake an inventory of research completed and relate this to future research needs. This cumulative approach to research would permit us to assess the alternatives and perhaps choose more wisely the priorities for both short and long run analyses. Several advisers have urged that the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission undertake this responsibility.

4. Data already available on job opportunities have not been used very effectively. For example, data from Plans for Progress and other reports filed with government agencies have not been accessible to scholars. With allowance for the confidentiality of specific reports, a strong plea was made for making available some of the data from EEO-1. These data will provide the richest information for a whole range of studies related to equal employment opportunity.

5. Research which focuses on total opportunities in employment at the same time expands our knowledge of the specific problems of minority group employment opportunities. A study of the effectiveness of the private and public employment agencies could provide insights and information relative to problems of disadvantaged groups.

6. Establishment of national and regional research advisory councils to develop and recommend guidelines for research in equal employment opportunity and to offer advice and assistance.

Specific Recommendations

1. Negro's perception of himself as it relates to economic mobility.

(a) How does the disadvantaged individual envision himself?

(b) What kind of image does he have of the world of work?

(c) What effect has self-image on employability? On job preparation?

(e) What happens to discourage or blunt the achievement syndrome? What psychological factors prevent minority group members from taking advantage of opportunities?

(f) How can we best achieve speedy and effective modification of patterns of behavior?

(g) How to extrapolate from perceptions and attitudes toward desired behavior? How do we create an affective environment characterized by psychological incentives?

(h) We need to know much more about the job-seeking behavior of minority group members and this means talking to Negroes themselves.

(i) While self-image is of particular importance for minority and disadvantaged groups, it is also a problem for members of the white affluent majority.

2. Functioning of the labor market

(a) What are the entry points into job markets? More needs to be known about the routes of entry into jobs through both the formal and the "outlaw" mechanism.

(b) How can more effective bridges be built between vocational education on one hand and changing job markets on the other?

(c) Opportunities to mobility are associated very much with the informal network. There is need to know more about the anatomy of informal channels of job-seeking and job-finding. How does the Negro fit into the informal network?

(d) What are the structural and community processes which help the individual to enter the labor market and get his first picture of it?

(e) What does the community offer minority groups in terms of education, training, and more adequate social life that will enable him to compete in the job market?

(f) It may be a propitious time to do research on the functioning of the employment service. The response of the Secretary of Labor to proposals in the task force report on the Public Employment Service indicates that research on how best to shape that institution is needed.

3. Employer's role (Research on unions not seen as promising at this time).

A. Employment procedures

1. There is need to explore the relationship between hiring criteria being applied, especially tests, and job requirements.

2. Are the initial check points established by the employer relevant to what he requires later?

3. Should standards be adjusted to the kind of work force available?

4. What functions do tests serve? We ought to know more about the criterion side when we start examining the validity of our selection procedures.

5. What is to be done about tests that eliminate minority groups? Would a more persuasive device for private employers be a documented study on the validation of federal government civil service tests?

B. Employer's Attitudes

1. What shapes the attitudes of employers?

2. Why are some industries moving ahead of others in complying with the law?

3. Is a company's pattern of nondiscriminatory employment related to whether it operates in a consumer-oriented industry, or whether it is concerned with projecting its image? What are the other factors?

4. How can the jobs be made easier for employers who want to comply and are frightened? What supportive assistance is available?

5. Specifically, what is the potential for wielding influence in the South? We may need to examine expanding employment patterns in state and local government, the effect of pressures generated by voter registration, as well as the impact of accelerated industrialization in the South.

4. Evaluation of present programs

(a) What has been the impact of programs carried on thus far in training and job development?

(b) What are the costs of special educational programs for disadvantaged children and what are the social economic returns?

(c) What are the implications of achieving full employment in various ways? What about the price increase threat to further reductions in unemployment rates?

Respectfully submitted,

Phyllis A. Wallace

Washington, D. C.

Dear Ben:

Did Vivian get a chance to talk with you about the Fisk Institute before he left Washington? I hope so. He and I talked and were both agreed that we very much wanted to make use of you during the Fisk program.

Unfortunately, I had given you the wrong dates. The Institute starts on June 26. This means that the time that I will be teaching will be from July 3 through 9. As I recall, this was the time when it would suit you best to be with us.

Could you let me know soon as to which days you would be available? If Vivian has not already taken care of the other arrangements for getting you to Nashville, between us we will do so shortly.

It was good to have seen you in Washington and I trust we will be together at Fisk.

Best wishes to Lib and family.

NEWPORT NEWS LANDMARK PACT

The nation's largest shipbuilder has signed an agreement with the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission to provide broad new promotion opportunities for Negroes.

The Newport News Shipbuilding and Drydock Company signed the agreement after six days of intensive negotiations at Commission headquarters in Washington. Representatives of the Department of Defense and the Department of the Navy joined with Commission conciliators in shaping the agreement.

The agreement grew out of employment discrimination charges filed with the Commission by 41 Negro employees under Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. The Commission had determined reasonable cause to believe Newport News was violating Title VII. The Departments of Labor and Navy also had determined that Newport News was not in compliance with the Executive Order dealing with Federal contracts.

Under the agreement, an outside expert, approved by the Company and the Commission, will evaluate jobs and pay rates in the Newport News plant to determine whether Negroes are being paid the same rates as whites doing the same or substantially equivalent work. Where it is determined that Negroes are being paid discriminatory rates they will be immediately raised to equivalent levels with whites.

A survey of key departments will be made to determine the promotion pattern of whites over past years. The history of Negro promotions will be compared to the white promotion profile and where Negroes have not progressed accordingly, they will be promoted immediately.

At the time of the agreement, Commission Chairman Franklin D. Roosevelt, Jr., said:

"One effect of this agreement will be an increase in pay for hundreds of Negro employees at the Newport News plant. It will also mean widespread promotions for Negroes. An even more far reaching effect will be the application of this agreement as a model for the correction of discrimination in other industries by the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission. In this case, the government spoke with one voice."

The package of remedial programs which the company and the Commission developed was described by Roosevelt as being "not a grudging agreement to stop discriminating, but a model of comprehensive affirmative action to reach and counteract the effects of prior discriminations."

Secretary of Labor W. Willard Wirtz said: "The successful completion of these negotiations resulted from a concerted government effort to make equal employ-

CRISIS IN THE CITIES AND EQUAL EMPLOYMENT

It is not often that I am taken aback by a newspaper account of progress in the civil rights area, but a recent story in the New York Times had just that reverse effect on me. The story disclosed, a little triumphantly, I felt, the fact that the Acting Police Commissioner of Baltimore had last month directed his men to address all citizens as "Mr. or Mrs." and to "avoid the use of 'wop, nigger, boy or girl'". Any policeman who would not follow his order, he said, should resign immediately.

I was struck by this bit of news because I felt it was characteristic of so much that is wrong in urban America. Here we are in the summer of 1966, mindful of the high unemployment level and the equally high level of bitterness pervading the ghettoes of some 30 to 40 big cities, wondering which city will next be shattered by an explosion of pent-up hate, fear, resentment and despair. Baltimore, with its non-white population of 43% and a Negro unemployment rate more than double that of the white work force, is one of these cities.

Yet, two years after the 1964 Harlem riots set off a series of similar explosions in seven other cities, and less than one year after the first riot in the Watts Area of Los Angeles, the police force of Baltimore had to be ordered to treat Negro and Italian citizens with respect.

I believe this tells us more than the well-meaning Acting Police Commissioner intended for us to infer. It tells us in unmistakable terms how the police of so many cities are accustomed to deal with members of minority groups. It tells us how late -- how very late-- comes the recognition that it must be corrected. It is symbolic of the denial of dignity which the Negro and other minorities have suffered at the hands of the white establishment. And, it is symbolic of the slowness of today's cities to understand and move decisively against the ills which, taken together, constitute what we call "The Crisis in the Cities."

It is probably because of this chronic refusal to anticipate a developing crisis and then to act to avert it, that our major metropolitan areas are being shaken by problems which were being predicted and might have been headed off two decades ago.

As we look back, we can see that four inexorable developments which were becoming visible in the years immediately after World War II have created our present situation:

First: Rural Americans were moving to the cities at an increasing rate. A century ago, our country was one-fifth urban; by 1920, it had become half rural, half urban; and today, two-thirds of us live in the cities. By the year 2000, however, 85% of our population will be concentrated in metropolitan areas which by that time will have grown over into super-metropolises. Visualize the problems of interlapping jurisdictions that are certain to plague a single population mass that extends from Boston to Baltimore, for instance.

Secondly, the postwar baby boom was certainly going to intensify the cities' problems as these youngsters deluged inadequate school systems and flooded the job market.

Thirdly, it was clear to all who cared to see two decades ago that the segregation and job discrimination which met the Southern Negroes on their arrival in the big cities were certain to create a Frankenstein monster which would haunt the nation forever. By foreclosing the Negro from all but the most menial jobs and by sentencing him and his children to live out their lives in the decaying center of each city, society prevented him from following the course which all white immigrants to the city had taken. It barred him from moving up the economic ladder and out of the congestion of the slum. Thus, we have today the problem of the growing ghetto.

The fourth development is that of the flight to the suburbs of the white middle-class families, thus removing from the hard-pressed city its major source of much-needed community leadership and tax revenue. As the people with the dollars ran off to the suburbs, business followed the dollar -- hence the trend of business and industry moving to the outlying suburban areas, industrial parks, etc. -- with the result that the preponderance of jobs will be located outside the city.

Who, then, remains in the city? Among the whites living in the cities, the percentage of aged, poor and handicapped is very high. The dominant group in most of the metropolitan areas is coming to be the Negro, of whom 60% are under 21.

Between 1940 and 1965, 3.3 million Negroes fled the South in search of a better life. (Actually, several times this number of whites left rural areas to find jobs in the cities during this period, but because no discrimination impeded their progress, they and their children are among those who today are moving into the suburbs.)

So rapid was the Negro migration from the South that today 75% of the national Negro population is in cities, where they are still awaiting the promise that America was supposed to hold out to them. Today, they nurse despair and bitterness in crowded, dilapidated, rat-infested housing units for which slumlords can extract from them, on the average, $15 more a month than he could have from white families. In 1960, 44% of all Negro dwellings, nationwide, were substandard; it is not unusual to find units in which six to ten sleep in a room. It need hardly be pointed out that the child who emerges from this cauldron the next morning is scarcely the world's most likely to succeed in school.

In 18 cities of the nation there are Negro populations of 100,000 or more. Washington, D. C. is the only major city to have a Negro majority; but if present population trends continue, it will be joined within the next 15 or 20 years by five other cities which will be predominantly Negro - Baltimore, Cleveland, Detroit, New Orleans and Philadelphia.

By the year 2000, again if present population trends continue, nearly every major city in the United States will have a Negro majority. What this may mean in terms of political power is unmistakable:

Negroes will be able to elect city administrations and Congressmen of their own choosing. They will gain control of the party machinery in the major cities and will wield great power within the national parties and within the councils of whatever administration occupies the White House.

Now there is nothing alarming in such change in itself -- any more than there was reason for alarm when power in some of the great cities passed to the Irish. What must concern us are the attitudes, being forged in today's ghetto, which will motivate tomorrow's leaders.

Throughout my lifetime I have believed in and strived for a truly integrated society. That is my conviction today. However much I may understand the factors which have led to a growth of Anti-white feeling among Negroes; however much I may recognize the reasons for their rejection of the white man's gradualism or worse, his indifference -- I am still convinced that replacing white racism with black racism would be a disaster. Instead of working unitedly toward common goals, we shall be divided into two warring camps -- one inside the city, the other on the outskirts. I cannot conceive of a more destructive way to organize a new society.

Yet, this is certain to be the outcome if we fail to take decisive measures against the hate-producing life of the Negro ghetto, where generations of youngsters grow up with a bitter resentment and fear of "whitey." In their black neighborhoods and their black schools, their only encounter with "whitey" is when he appears in the form of the oppressor -- the white policeman, the white landlord, the white interviewer, the white boss.

In discussing the crisis of the cities, therefore, we are forced to dwell on the tragic condition of our minority group citizens because the solution to the cities' problems lies in how competently and forcefully we set about righting the wrongs which have been perpetrated against these citizens -- and I am referring to Spanish-surnamed Americans no less than Negroes, because although their number is fewer, the crimes against them are as persistent and as numerous.

Former EEOC Chairman Franklin D. Roosevelt, Jr., recently described the Spanish-Americans as "the most neglected, the least sponsored, the most orphaned major minority group in the United States."

Every statistic on their condition bears this out:

San Antonio and Denver, each with large Spanish-surnamed populations, exemplify the misery in which these citizens - many of whose ancestors came here two hundred years ago - continue to live.

Half the population of San Antonio is Spanish-speaking. Some 28.4% - more than one in four - of the city's residents live on less than $3,000 a year. Compare this with a figure of 10.6% for Chicago or 13.4% for New York, both of which have sizeable Negro and Puerto Rican segments.

San Antonio has the highest number of functional illiterates in the United States - 107,000 - which is hardly surprising since the average Mexican-American child will not go beyond the fourth grade. San Antonio also has the dubious distinction of having one of the worst slums in the country. Called "Villa Coronado", it boasts of two-room hovels in which as many as 20 immigrants are housed.

Denver's population of Spanish-surnamed citizens suffers the same discrimination, although some of these families are descendents of men who served in Colorado's territorial legislature and helped in the formation of Colorado's statehood. Today, their unemployment rate is almost 10%, and fully 42% live in substandard dwellings. Only one-fourth of the Spanish-surnamed youngsters of Denver complete high school, and one-fifth go no further than the fourth grade. Spanish-sounding names have been enough to exclude them from virtually all employment except farming, while they have been barred from such public accommodations as restaurants, theaters, and barber shops. Needless to say, enforced poverty has resulted in their having a disproportionate share of the juvenile delinquency, tuberculosis and public welfare dependency.

Whether the victims are Spanish-surnamed or Negro, this type of decay in the cities results in what President Johnson described as " ...the tragic waste, and indeed, the chaos that threatens where children are born into the stifling air of overcrowded rooms, destined for a poor diet, inadequate schools, streets of fear and sordid temptations, joblessness and the gray anxiety of the ill-prepared."

Let us take stock of these ills in the context of our national condition: In general, our national economic indicators are at an all-time high: There are more jobs, more profits, fewer bankruptcies; greater Gross National Product, greater business expansion and greater average incomes than ever before.

It is true, also, that Negroes have partaken to some extent of this affluence: Economic growth and state, local and federal efforts to eliminate discrimination in employment have boosted the number of Negroes employed from 6.4 million to 7.7 million in the past 10 years - - faster than the growth rate for white workers.

Non-whites made exceptional progress in teaching jobs and in such white-collar occupations as postal clerks or telephone operators. Even in the traditionally-segregated crafts, non-white employment increased from 4 to 5.6%.

However, despite this progress, Negro unemployment is still twice the national rate -- 7.6% compared to the national average of 4%. Almost one out of every five Negro young people, age 16 to 21, is out of work and out of school. At the close of last year, two out of five college-trained Negroes were working, not in the professions for which they were educated, but in blue-collar or farm jobs. Viewing the situation, ghetto by ghetto, we encounter even more terrible statistics: In the Watts Area of Los Angeles, unofficial figures indicate that 25% to 35% are unemployed; in Oakland, 15% are jobless, with over 30% of the Negro youth unemployed. In Baltimore, the Negro jobless rate is 8% -- more than twice the white rate.

As bad as these figures are, they, nevertheless, grossly understate the problem. They do not include the many under-employed or the millions who, in despair, have dropped out of the job market, who have just given up. If these members of the work force were included, it is estimated that the true unemployment rate among Negroes would be 12%.

Nor do the figures indicate the real conditions of those who are classed as employed, but whose drudgery-filled jobs pay so little that they remain in poverty, often required to "moonlight" or to seek welfare assistance. While the rest of the nation was enjoying increasing affluence between 1960 and 1966, the median family income in the Watts Area actually fell $800. That segment of our big cities' population which has remained untouched by the general affluence is so substantial that half of all non-white families still live on or below the poverty line. The median income for Negro families is only 56% that of whites.

The Nation's Capital, with 63% Negro population, offers us a view in microcosm of all the problems now plaguing or soon to plague each of the big cities with expanding ghettoes.

Until very recent years, Washington was a rigidly-segregated city -- to the extent that it maintained a dual school system, one for Negroes and one for whites. Following the Supreme Court's school desegregation decision, the Washington schools were integrated, and the city "discovered" for the first time that Negro students were suffering an achievement lag of several years behind white students. This educational lag is now reflected in Negro unemployment statistics:

The District of Columbia is an area of low unemployment -- the rate is 2.1%. That percentage, however, represents 17,000 unemployed men and women - 75% of them non-white.

These constitute the hard-core unemployed -- the ones who are underskilled, unskilled, under-educated, under-trained and untrained. Many have an additional strike against them: they have arrest records. In one neighborhood center, 85% of the males and 10% of the females (among 5,100 interviewed for jobs) were found to have arrest records. Virtually all were barred from employment because no adequate distinction is made between arrest, conviction and prison records.

The requirement of a high school diploma, even for jobs which may not require this much education, hinders many non-whites, for the dropout rate is high.

Tests for employment -- which more often reflect the individual's absorption of a white culture than they do the individual's capacity to do a job -- block many other Negroes from jobs.

Like many other cities, Washington has ordinances prohibiting discrimination in housing and in hiring; but, obviously, something more aggressive is needed now.

Industry and those in charge of apprenticeship training programs need to be convinced that the situation requires more than token adherence to the law; it requires a policy of deliberate hiring, of deliberate seeking-out of the Negro; it may also require special training or a waiving of prerequisites which may not be relevant to the job.

The difficulty of finding jobs for the Negro in the center of the city is further complicated by the flight to the suburbs of industry and new business enterprises. In the Washington area, according to the Employment Service, 63.7% of the construction jobs are now in the suburbs; 52.2% of those in trade; 49.7% of the jobs in manufacturing; 49% of the jobs in finance, insurance and service, and 38.9% of those in transportation, communications and utilities. Virtually all other big cities are experiencing the same loss of jobs.

The city which produced the ghetto now must more aggressively find solutions to the evils created by the ghetto. It must eliminate the poor schooling and stunted motivation imposed on each victim of disadvantage. It must recognize that poverty and segregated housing patterns breed crime, violence, illness, dope addiction, alcoholism and hopelessness. It cannot turn away from the fact that segregated housing patterns also breed de facto school segregation and, invariably, inferior schools.

Although 17 states now have fair housing statutes, very few are seriously enforced. The NAACP last year undertook to break the pattern of discrimination in real estate selling by filing antitrust suits against the Akron, Ohio Area Board of Realtors and against the Board of Realtors in Trenton and Mercer County, New Jersey. More than 1,000 fair housing organizations have been formed, working to open up the suburbs as well as the city to minority group members.

These are problems whose solutions will require the combined efforts of private groups and government agencies. Such cooperative activity might well be mobilized around the many far-reaching recommendations adopted by the recent White House Conference "To Fulfill These Rights", as well as the Administration's trail-blazing Demonstration Cities Program.

Among these conference proposals is the establishment of Metropolitan Job Councils in each urban community with a substantial Negro population. Representatives of business, unions, all levels of Government and community organizations would work together to gather information on the characteristics and needs of minority group members and then to assign responsibility for meeting those needs.

The councils would develop a system of periodic reports for employers in the area to identify job opportunities and training possibilities for Negroes and would undertake the task of fitting the jobless for these openings.

Also proposed by the Conference were:

* A large-scale government-financed program of public works which would provide immediate jobs for Negroes at their present levels of skill.

* Year-round employment, training and counseling programs for minority youth, as well as a federalized employment service.

*Affirmative actions by private employers, labor unions and government to provide more and better jobs.

* The strengthening of all programs which protect workers' incomes, including minimum wage, unemployment compensation; and extension to farm workers and others of the protection of the right to organize.

* Establishing of national standards for public assistance programs.

* Improvement of schools and reduction of racial concentration within them.

In seeking solutions, we should add to these proposals those which would provide the broad physical and social face-lifting that the President envisages in his Demonstration Cities legislation. "I propose," he declared, "a demonstration cities program that will offer qualifying cities of all sizes the promise of a new life for their people.... I propose that we focus all the techniques and talents within our society on the crisis of the American city."

If approved by Congress, such projects would establish, not only low- and middle-income housing (replacing blighted areas) but also schools, parks, playgrounds, community centers and access to all necessary facilities including health and transportation facilities.

There will be those who will complain about the cost of total renewal and the discomfort of eliminating segregated housing, but they must be told of the cost of not taking these steps. Los Angeles, for instance, spends $1.87 in police services and $2.25 for health services in the blighted areas for each dollar it spends in the economically favored areas. Louisville, Kentucky, spends twice as much in the poor areas. The experience is the same in all large cities with the result that metropolitan areas suffered a per capita rise in expenditures of 36% in the years of 1960 to 1963 -- at a time when their tax base was shrinking.

In varying degrees, every major city is now the scene of numerous governmental and private programs designed to alleviate the problems I have mentioned. Some community leaders bring to the problem more understanding than others, however. The police department's relations with the Negro and Spanish-American communities offer a case in point:

Although incidents involving police have served as the spark which set off virtually all of the riots of the past two years, reflecting the Negroes' and in some cases the Puerto Ricans' bitterness toward the police, few big cities have accomplished very much in the way of improving this relationship.

There are now under way many efforts to alleviate the situation in the most poverty-stricken areas: California has established 12 Community State Service Centers in blighted areas where the poor can find, under one roof, access to all the services the community offers: job and family counselling; training; information about educational possibilities; job referrals; health and welfare services, etc. The Watts Center has registered over 13,000 people and has placed 1,400 in jobs thus far.

Oakland, which is likewise the scene of a large body of jobless non-whites, will have such a center when the state budget is approved. Also going forward in Oakland is the effort by local, state and federal agencies to develop industry, promote the hiring of minority group members, provide desperately-needed housing and renew the areas of blight.

In Philadelphia, attention has recently been focused on the Rev. Leon Sullivan, who has established eight Opportunities Industrialization Centers for people in need of job training. Dotting the poor neighborhoods and manned by residents of the area, the OIC project was financed by businessmen whom Rev. Sullivan inspired, as well as by a grant from the U.S. Department of Labor. No applicant is turned away, and all seem to be infused with the minister's evangelical message that success awaits each one who tries. Some 1,500 trainees have already been placed in jobs; an additional 1,700 are now in training; and 6,000 are on the waiting list. OIC trainees are now working at such companies as RCA, Philco, General Electric and Budd. Once they were called "unemployable."

Efforts to stamp out job discrimination will need to be reinforced by a strengthened Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, which requires greater enforcement power to be truly effective, and by stronger, better-financed state and local Fair Employment or Human Relations Commissions.

Sporadic, uncoordinated programs in each community to stimulate economic development, train people for existing jobs, provide decent, low-cost housing, establish good schools and a wholesome environment for every child -- all these will have to coalesce into one thorough-going plan with total renewal as the goal, if we are to succeed.

In this massive effort, no community can afford the exclusion of groups whose philosophy is at variance with "the establishment." On the contrary, it is already apparent that the college-bred social worker or government agency representative is regarded with suspicion and thus cannot establish a dialogue with those most in need of being motivated.

I am convinced that this gulf, in so many instances, can be bridged only by leaders who are themselves products of the ghetto, who speak the language of the disadvanted, who can command the confidence of the wary. Many of these leaders are volatile youngsters, themselves embittered and in search of a proud Negro identity. Their varying expressions of anti-white feeling have created a split within the civil rights movement and a greater alienation, if that is possible, from the so-called "establishment," of which human relations commisions are a part.

I believe that we shall have to gain the cooperation of these angry young men and women, and that it is incumbent on us to actively seek their cooperation. Failure to do so will close to us one of the most important avenues of communication with the poor.

We cannot afford to do less than involve every segment of the community in this effort to save our cities and reclaim lives.

To quote from the President once more:

"If we stand passively by, while the center of each (city) becomes a hive of deprivation, crime and hopelessness; if we devour the countryside as though it were limitless, while our ruins -- millions of tenement apartments and dilapidated houses -- go unredeemed; if we become two people, the suburban affluent and the urban poor, each filled with mistrust and fear one for the other... then we shall effectively cripple each generation to come."

Dear Mr. Via:

I am answering your letter of September 15, 1966, addressed to Dr. Phyllis Wallace. Thank you for sending a copy of New South.

At the present time I am in the process of completing the inventory of research projects which in some way may be related to equal employment opportunities. Since I want to make the inventory as current as possible, I would appreciate your sending me a list of new research projects which your organization has funded during 1965-1966.

Thank you for your cooperation in this matter.

US EQUAL RIGHTS CHIEF IN AUSTIN

Lee Gibson Williams returns to "prettiest place"

Ex-Austinite Back In Job Rights Post

By CHRIS WHITCRAFT
Staff Writer

Job discrimination complaints under US Civil Rights legislation should be filed with two offices, local and federal, Regional Director Lee Gibson Williams of the US Equal Employment Opportunity Commission reports.

Williams, general counsel for the Texas Employment Commission in Austin from 1938 to 1958 and until December last year with the US Department of Labor, has offices on the ground floor of the federal building.

He said complaints should be filed with the local Austin Citizenship Corp. of which Rev. John Barclay is chairman, and with the federal office.

Williams said the reason for filing with the federal office is to protect the person complaining from losing his legal right to take the matter to federal court. He has to report to the federal office within 90 days of any discriminatory act to keep open his access to court action under the law.

Attorney Thomas T. Smith, executive for the Austin Equal Department. He succeeded first chairman F. D. Roosevelt Jr.

Vice chairman is Dr. Luther Holcomb, president of the Dallas Council of Churches.

"EEOC's policies are designed to help the total business, industry and civic leadership of a community exert a common equal employment opportunity effort," Shulman told the Greater Pittsburgh (Pa.) Chamber of Commerce the other day.

Shulman asked the nation's business community "to accelerate action to expand job opportunities for minority group members in an effort to help solve the growing racial crises in our cities."

He urged local community councils for equal employment opportunities to make special recruitment efforts, take a new look at testing and educational requirements to assure they are actually related to on-the-job performance, expand on-the-job training programs, and re-evaluate standards for entry jobs to help qualify minority applicants.

Williams once ran news copy to linotype operators for the Attorney Thomas T. Smith, executive for the Austin Equal Citizenship Corp. with offices in the Capital National Bank building, and Williams said they are working together to make sure both offices protect the legal rights of anyone complaining.

Williams said he congratulates those Austin citizens responsible for establishing the corporation. He said he heartily approves of the settlement of local problems at the local level. He said the corporation serves a commendable purpose.

Williams said 52 per cent of the complaints filed with the US commission in the last six months have charged sex discrimination.

Williams said two out of three cases are settled by conciliation. About 400 cases have been investigated in the nation this year.

The only "teeth" in the Civil Rights law as penalty for violation of the ban on discrimination belong to the complaining parties who can go to federal court for redress, Williams said. Federal attorneys handle the cases.

The Austin office moved from Dallas where it first opened in January. It has a staff of seven professionals and three secretaries.

Other regional offices are in Chicago, New York, San Francisco, Atlanta and Cleveland. Area offices are in Albuquerque, New Orleans, Los Angeles and Kansas City.

It is part of the Commission's job, Williams said, to give technical assistance which communities might seek in trying to end discrimination.

He said some big business firms in Texas have done more than comply with the law. They have actively recruited minority workers and found many employes with potentials and skills that "have been overlooked and disregarded too long."

Chairman of the US EEOC in Washington is Yaleman Stephen N. Shulman who got his law degree at Harvard. He had been a general counsel for the Air Force in the Defense Texas Council of Churches.

"EEOC's policies are designed to help the total business, industry and civic leadership of a community exert a common equal employment opportunity effort," Shulman told the Greater Pittsburgh (Pa.) Chamber of Commerce the other day.

Shulman asked the nation's business community "to accelerate action to expand job opportunities for minority group members in an effort to help solve the growing racial crises in our cities."

He urged local community councils for equal employment opportunities to make special recruitment efforts, take a new look at testing and educational requirements to assure they are actually related to on-the-job performance, expand on-the-job training programs, and re-evaluate standards for entry jobs to help qualify minority applicants.

Williams once ran news copy to linotype operators for the Austin newspapers. He was born in Alexandria, La., in 1907, but moved to Austin with his family seven years later and grew up here. His father, O. G. (Bill) Williams was a linotype operator for the papers until he quit to form the still-existing Capital Printing Co. with the late Ed Harrell in 1929. Williams senior died in 1955.

Harrell's widow continues as president and owner.

The new EEOC regional director has bachelor, master and law degrees from the University of Texas. He has worked for the US Labor Department at Washington since 1958 in many capacities. These included foreign assignments in Italy during World War II occupation, and two missions to Formosa.

Williams has specialized in labor legislation and administration, policy planning, employment security agencies, and equal jobs opportunity.

He and his wife, the former Mary Louise Skelley of Austin, have bought the home of Dr. C. M. Cleveland, retired UT mathematics professor, at 210 Buckeye Trail. A daughter, Mrs. William H. Clark, lives in Dallas.

"We're so crazy about our new home we don't know what to do," Williams said. "It has a view of all Austin. It is the prettiest place in the world."

FOR RELEASE SUNDAY PAPERS November 13, 1966 Phone: 343-5621 EEOC

Despite concerted efforts of Federal, state and local agencies to put an end to job discrimination, only minimal gains have been made by minority group workers, according to studies directed in 11 states and the District of Columbia by Wayne State University for the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission.

Commenting on all the studies, EEOC Chairman Stephen N. Shulman said:

"Although it is true that many companies have advanced during recent years, from a policy of outright discrimination against non-whites to one of token hiring, it is disconcerting to note the scarcity of employers who have progressed beyond this point.

"Both the findings and the recommendations contained in each state or local commission's report and in the summation written by Dr. Frances Coumens of Wayne State University, who directed the project, confirm the conviction held by the EEOC that the Federal law's stated purpose of achieving equal employment opportunity for all Americans will not be realized without affirmative efforts by Federal, state and municipal commissions in cooperation with employers and community groups."

The Wayne State studies, conducted by state and local fair employment practices commissions, were made in the following states and industries:

District of Columbia	Banking, Savings & Loan and Insurance Institutions
Louisville, Kentucky	Manufacturing, Transportation, Retail & Wholesale and Banks
Massachusetts	Railroads, Buses, Taxis, Trucking, Airlines

EEOC

Missouri	Hotels, Motels, Restaurants, Public Utilities
New Jersey	Public Utilities
New York City	Retail Establishments
Ohio	Machine Tool and Glass
Wisconsin	Brewery and Other Manufacturing
Philadelphia	Hospitals
Michigan	Apprenticeship Programs of Building Trades

One study, conducted by the California Fair Employment Practice Commission, concerned the use of tests by industry. This study rated most of the tests "poor" as an indicator of an applicant's ability to perform a specific job, found only three companies (all large) whose testing practices could be rated "good", and considered none "superior."

Among the 553 companies studied, employing more than 386,000 workers, Negroes were found to comprise 9.7 per cent of the total. This was a smaller share of the jobs than is the Negro's percentage of the workforce in all but three of the areas surveyed. Except in Boston, New Jersey, and Milwaukee the Negro share of the metropolitan area workforce ranged from 10.9 per cent to 49.8 per cent.

The findings also showed that even where progress in employing Negroes had been made, they and other minority groups were confined to the lowest paying and most menial jobs.

Data showed that employers who make the effort to recruit nonwhite employees succeed in finding qualified applicants, but only 40 per cent of those questioned say they have taken any such measures. Furthermore, 91 per cent say they have no plans to change their present employment practices. Without affirmative efforts to open up employment opportunities for minority group workers, existing equal employment statutes will continue to have little impact on the present pattern, the report predicts.

"It is our hope," stated Shulman, "that each of the 11 state and local commissions which participated in these studies will use the information about their areas as the basis for a spirited affirmative action program to achieve a substantial increase in the number of job opportunities for Negroes."

(Those interested in individual reports should contact the state or local fair employment practice agency.)

Phyllis A. Wallace

Research Report 1966-12
December 21, 1966

FOREWORD

This report describes the Document and Reference Text (DART) of the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission. The Institute of Industrial and Labor Relations of Wayne State University, Detroit, Michigan will undertake a comprehensive search of materials on employment among minority groups. The catalogue prepared for the study will serve as a major reference document for the entire social science research community.

DOCUMENT AND REFERENCE TEXT

I. PURPOSE

The purpose of the work described herein is the collection, compilation, and publication of a list of published and unpublished books, articles, documents, manuscripts, charts, tables, abstracts, indexes, and bibliographies related to, but not in all cases limited to, the economic, sociological, psychological, legal, and political aspects of employment among various minority groups in the United States. The end product of this work shall be the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission Document and Reference Text, hereafter referred to as DART.

II. SCOPE

A comprehensive search of the materials above shall cover the following six characteristics of workers in the United States:

A. Negroes

B. Spanish-speaking, including Puerto Ricans and Mexican Americans

C. American Indians

D. Orientals

E. Religious affliation

F. Women

The review and inclusion of materials covered in categories (A) and (F) above, shall be limited to documents produced or published during the years of 1940-1966, inclusive. The review and inclusion of materials covered in categories (B), (C), (D), and (E) above, shall be limited to documents produced or published during the years 1956-1966, inclusive.

Under categories (A) through (F), above, the contractor shall use the following subjects as guidelines for determining the relevance of a document (item) that is to be included in the DART:

1. Recent trends in employment (by subject category)
2. Economic status (by subject category); wage differentials
3. Labor force characteristics: occupational patterns and labor force participation
4. Unemployment (structural, etc.)
5. Underemployment
6. Job mobility
7. Migration patterns
8. Fringe benefit programs (pension plans, insurance schemes, maternity benefits, etc.)
9. Welfare programs
10. Income maintenance (negative income, guaranteed minimum income, etc.)
11. Investment in human capital
12. Civil rights movement and minority group employment
13. Poverty (rural and urban) and minority group employment
14. Living standards (family, child welfare, etc.)
15. Explanations of minority group disadvantagement in employment
16. Impact of automation and technological change
17. Prospects for minority group employment in the future
18. Private efforts to promote equal employment opportunity: case studies of particular companies and industries--strategies and techniques

19. Governmental efforts to promote equal employment opportunity: legislation; contract compliance; voluntary programs, etc.
20. Social-psychological problems faced in employment: alienation of minority group member from job environment; unfamiliarity with job milieu; lack of job readiness; poor response to employment testing, etc.
21. Union practices and minority group employment: case studies of particular unions and union types
22. Industry and regional studies related to equal employment opportunity
23. Training (MDTA, employer financed, educational techniques, etc.)
24. Employment testing and other selection procedures
25. Seniority and promotional systems
26. Education and minority group employment
27. Residential patterns vs. industrial, manufacturing, and business locations in relation to employment opportunities for minority groups
28. Vocational guidance and counseling
29. Health problems and employment
30. Juvenile delinquency and crime
31. Recruitment practices
32. Employment agencies
33. Sociocultural environment (e.g., the influence of community institutions and institutional barriers to the preparation of Negroes for work; work values and vocational aspirations)

III. PERIOD OF PERFORMANCE

The period of performance of this work shall be from January 1, 1967 to July 31, 1967.

IV. REPORTS

The contractor shall submit three bi-monthly reports detailing the progress of work and funds expended to date. The third bi-monthly report shall be titled Final Report--EEOC Document and Reference Text. This final report shall be a self-contained and self-explanatory account of all work performed in preparation and production of the DART.

V. DETAILED REQUIREMENTS

A. Number of Items

The DART shall reference no less than six thousand (6,000) separate and distinct items (documents). Two or more separately bound or printed parts or volumes of one work shall constitute only one document, unless the separate parts or volumes carry different titles.

B. Content of the DART

The Document and Reference Text shall contain the following distinct sections:

1. Table of Contents
2. Introduction - This section shall include explanations, with illustrative examples, of how the DART is to be used.
3. Abbreviations and Symbols - Abbreviations shall be alphabetized, and the full English equivalent of each shall be given. Arbitrary symbols that are substituted for conventional punctuation marks shall be listed, along with the substitution equivalent.
4. Suppressed Words and Symbols - All names, words and symbols that are prevented from being indexed in the Keyword Index shall be listed alphabetically. No names, words, or symbols shall be suppressed in the Personal Author or the Institutional Author Indexes or in the Bibliography.

5. Keyword Index - This index shall assume the format of the typical alphabetized Key-Word-In-Context (KWIC), that is, permuted title, index. The title of each document shall appear for each significant or key (non-suppressed) word or name in the title. Keywords shall appear in alphabetical order in the center column of successive pages.

   Each entry, that is appearance of a title, shall contain all words in that title, even though some of the words may be prevented from indexing in the center column.

   Each entry shall contain, directly opposite in the margin, a unique identification code that permits: (1) rapid entry and identification of that item in the Bibliography and (2) updating and additions to the DART without the occurrence of duplicate codes.

6. Personal Author Index - The title of each document shall appear once under the last name of the personal author. An item with multiple authorship shall be included under the listing of the first author only, although names of the other author(s) must be printed out. Names of authors shall occur in alphabetical order and shall be set out to the left of the main text for easy reference and identification.

If a document has no personal author given, the institutional author shall serve as the substitute for personal author. Thus, the title of each document must occur once, but only once in this index.

7. Institutional Author Index - An institutional author is applicable when:

   a. there is no personal author associated with the document. Examples are anonymous newspaper and magazine articles, corporate reports, and government agency publications.

   b. a company, agency, or other group was the primary executor of research or work reflected in or by the document. Examples are:

      (1) a report produced by the RAND Corporation for the U. S. Air Force. The institutional author is the RAND Corporation.

      (2) a report carrying a personal author designation but written or produced under the aegis of a company, government agency, or other institution.

Each document title bearing an institutional author, as defined in (a) and (b) above shall appear under its appropriate institutional author. Institutional authors shall be alphabetized in this index and shall be set out to the left of the main text of titles to permit rapid identification. Each title in this index shall bear the unique identification code assigned to it.

8. Bibliography - The Bibliography must contain, for each document, the following information:

   a. Title of document

   b. Personal author (if available)

   c. Corporate author (if applicable)

   d. Publisher (or sponsoring organization) and address

   e. Name of periodical (for documents appearing as articles)

   f. Volume and page numbers (for articles in periodicals)

   g. Report or contract number of document (if necessary for positive identification)

   h. Date of publication

   i. Identification code

The sequential order of documents in the Bibliography shall be based on the unique identification codes. Therefore, this code shall appear in the left margin for each document and shall be set off from the main text so that it can be readily located.

C. Printing of the DART

The contractor shall provide the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission with one hundred fifty (150) perfect, bound copies of the printed, computer-indexed DART as specified in sections (A) and (B) of these "Detailed Requirements".

VI. APPROVALS REQUIRED

A. The contractor shall submit to the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, before completion of the computer program, a list of all the names, words, and symbols that will be suppressed in the Keyword Index. The contractor shall not proceed with final printing of the Keyword Index until he has received from the EEOC written approval of said list, either in its original form and content or some alternative form and content.

B. After completion of the computer program, and before the information from all documents is keypunched, the contractor shall select a representative sample of one hundred (100) documents and keypunch the information in the same manner that will be used for the remaining documents.

The information from the sample of 100 documents will then be computer processed to obtain sample copies of the Keyword Index, the Personal Author Index, the Institutional Author Index, and the Bibliography. The sample copies shall be submitted to the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission for review and approval.

After receipt from EEOC of written approval of the format and content of these samples, or some alternative format and content, the contractor shall keypunch the sample and remaining documents according to the approved method.

VII. DISTRIBUTION OF COPIES

The Equal Employment Opportunity Commission shall be the recipient of all copies, partial and complete, of the DART. Distribution of the DART, or any part thereof, shall be at the sole discretion of the EEOC. This distribution shall not be made by any person, group, institution, or agency without prior written permission from the EEOC.

VIII. KEYPUNCHED DATA CARDS

The contractor, at the completion of all other activities outlined in this Schedule of Work, shall send to the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission a complete, correct set of the keypunched data processing cards used to produce the DART. The boxes in which the cards are shipped shall be plainly and unambiguously labelled as to contents and shall be numbered serially. The order of cards within each box and from one box to the next shall follow exactly the order of the documents as they appear in the Bibliography of the DART.

LEARN-EARN PROGRAM CONCENTRATES ON INEXPERIENCED

Two hours a day in the classroom, six hours on the job, and pay for the trainees, is an unusual program to help qualify inexperienced workers for Cleveland's National Screw Manufacturing Company. Nine of the Company's present Negro employees, already enrolled in the new company-sponsored program, are potentials for advancement. More are expected to come in through newspaper and radio advertising, including spot announcements on a program with a large Negro listening audience. Goal of the drive is to increase the company's 1,100-man work force 10 percent by Christmas.

CHRISTMAS IS FOR GIVING. . .AND GETTING. . .JOBS

The American Retail Federation, in cooperation with EEOC, is reaching into minority communities in a special effort to extend the hand of welcome for the 650,000 Christmas-season jobs available. The Federation's appeal, initiated by EEOC Chairman Shulman, is directed to more than 800,000 retail establishments throughout the country to find and select applicants. Benefits include work experience as well as pay checks.

AN INVESTMENT THAT PAYS OFF

General Dynamics' Quincy (Mass.) Division is turning tax eaters into tax contributors. Since the first of the year, the company has placed 988 unskilled applicants in on-the-job training programs under Federal contracts. Cost to the Government is $730 per trainee -- an investment in human resources that brings a return in tax revenues. For informative pamphlet, write for: Employers Guide to On-the-Job Training - U. ARE TESTS PREDICTING JOB PERFORMANCE?

Standard Oil of California is reevaluating its whole testing program following publication of EEOC's Guidelines on Employment Testing Procedures. Alfred J. Alstrom, Manager, Personnel Division, has sent copies of the Guidelines to all personnel managers throughout the country. Plan is to get together on the company's telephone communication hookup to find out what kinds of tests are being used, how they are administered, and do they really predict job performance.

CATERPILLAR TRACTOR REEVALUATING TESTS

Do personnel interviewers use tests as "crutches" -- substituting test scores for overall judgment -- in making employment decisions? Caterpillar Tractor of Peoria, Illinois is taking a corporate level look at testing procedures to find the answer to this and other questions concerning testing. First step was to declare a moratorium of 60 days on the use of all tests. While the results are being evaluated, the company has gone back to the use of tests for hard core unemployed only, but not to be used as a factor in consideration for hiring. In the words of John C. Myers, Employment Manager, "We are seeking to achieve a positive correlation between test results and job performance."

EQUAL EMPLOYMENT IS GOOD BUSINESS

Advertising Age suggests that "agencies and companies approach the recruitment and training of Negroes as a sound investment in future profits, not as an act of social justice."...The trade magazine calls for a positive and forthright move now, "to earn a share of all that the Negro has to offer. Not because it is the moral thing to do, but because ultimately, in a business sense, it is the smart thing to do."

EEOC PLANS BROAD APPROACH TO JOB OPPORTUNITIES

"With complaints of job discrimination now running about 10,000 a year, the Commission plans to emphasize broad, industry-wide efforts to open up job opportunities for minority group members and women. The Commission will continue to deal with individual complaints as fast as it can but we also hope to make great strides by attacking employment discrimination via the 'wholesale' approach -- through accelerated affirmative action programs."
-- Chairman Stephen N. Shulman, News conference, 11-18-66.

TITLE VII NEWS BRIEFS

December 1966

These are some of the things that are happening every day as the EEOC pursues its assignment to end job discrimination.

OVER-THE-ROAD TRUCK DRIVER JOBS are open to Negroes for the first time as the result of an EEOC conciliation agreement with the Federal Paper Board Company of Richmond, Virginia.

A Negro employee of Federal Paper Board, a truck driver of a tractor-trailer on in-town hauls, charged that he and other Negro drivers were not given out-of-town assignments. In-town drivers earn $1.85 an hour; over-the-road wages, including overtime, average $2.35 an hour.

Federal Paper Board agreed to offer over-the-road jobs to Negroes as vacancies open up, as well as to work with the United Papermakers and Paperworkers to provide changes in lines of job progression.

##################

BACK PAY AND LAWYER'S FEES totaling almost $4,000 - plus rehiring - went to the only Negro who worked in a soybean plant of a large mid-Western food packing company. He had charged he was fired because of his race. Just two weeks after an EEOC conciliation was signed, eight other Negroes were hired.

##################

IMPATIENCE WITH JOB DISCRIMINATION is a key message from EEOC's chairman, Stephen N. Shulman. In a recent speech, he said: "The existence of job discrimination based on irrelevancies such as race is a critical domestic problem.

(over)

The matter of eliminating it is a national imperative... The problem is clear...Let us approach it with a sense of impatience."

##########

A RECORD SETTLEMENT OF $36,700 in back pay and the re-employment of 110 women was negotiated in an EEOC conciliation under Federal court supervision.

The case was brought against a General Cable Corp. plant in Monticello, Illinois, by 58 women employees. They had been laid off because of automation -- and without regard to their seniority rights. Many of the women were principal breadwinners for their families.

##########

THE FIRST NEGRO FOREMAN is now at work in a Southern plant of a large furniture company. Since the Commission began its investigation -- and even before the conciliation was signed -- 16 other Negroes started work in 6 different departments that were previously all "white", and 19 additional Negroes were promoted.

##########

THERE IS A WAY -- where there is a will. General Dynamics in Quincy, Mass., working with community leaders, put on a "Job Opportunity Week". More than one-third of the 273 applicants were hired or held for future hires, and almost one-half were referred to a Manpower Development and Training Act (MDTA) program for job testing.

##########

"BREAKING DOWN ARTIFICIAL BARRIERS that close too many doors to our minority groups" was urged by Gardner Ackley, chairman of the President's Council of Economic Advisers. In a speech at Southern Illinois University, he highlighted racial discrimination as one of the structural problems of unemployment.

Dr. Emory Via
Director of Labor Program
Southern Regional Council
Atlanta, Georgia

Dear Dr. Via:

I am most appreciative of the major contribution you made to the success of the forum on employment in the textile industry (Charlotte, North Carolina, January 13, 1967). The Commission will probably make available at a later date the statements of the various participants. I believe that some meaningful affirmative action programs can be formulated, and we hope that all interested parties will send us their suggestions. Thank you again for appearing at the Charlotte forum and presenting your statement on employment opportunities in the Carolina textile industry.

FOR RELEASE AM's TUESDAY, JANUARY 24, 1967 Phone: 343-5621

Chairman Stephen N. Shulman of the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission announced today the appointment of Roger F. Lewis as his Executive Assistant.

Lewis joins the EEOC after serving since Feb. 17, 1965 as Special Assistant to Secretary of Labor Willard Wirtz. He had also served as Deputy Special Counsel to the President's Committee on Equal Employment Opportunity.

"I am extremely fortunate to have the services of Mr. Lewis," Chairman Shulman said. "He is a man of proven ability, top administrative experience, and sensitive understanding--all qualities vitally needed to assist me in administering the programs of the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission."

Lewis received a B. S. degree in Accountancy from the University of Illinois in 1957.

In 1960, he received a J. D. degree from Northwestern University. At Northwestern, he was Associate Editor of the Northwestern Law Review and a member of the Order of the Coif.

After graduating from law school, Lewis was named to the Attorney General's Program for Honor Law Graduates and served as an attorney in the Antitrust Division of the Justice Department.

In November 1961, he was appointed Confidential Assistant to Secretary Wirtz who was then Under Secretary of Labor. When Mr. Wirtz was named Secretary of Labor in 1962, Lewis became an Assistant in the Office of the Secretary.

A native of Chicago, Illinois, Lewis is 30 and single.

EQUAL EMPLOYMENT OPPORTUNITY COMMISSION
1800 G St., NW
WASHINGTON, D. C. 20506

FOR IMMEDIATE RELEASE JANURARY 1967 Phone: 343-5621

A revised EEO-1 minority employment report form (Standard Form 100) featuring changes in format, with few changes in data required, was announced today by the Joint Reporting Committee, representing the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, the Office of Federal Contract Compliance and Plans for Progress.

The changes in the form and its instructions are designed to simplify reporting for employers and the processing of reports. To make it easier for employers with only one establishment, a form with simplified instructions was prepared.

With few exceptions, EEO-1 is to be filed only by those groups of employers who filed last year. In the case of employers subject to Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, only those that have 100 or more employees must file, even though Title VII now covers employers with 75 employees.

Major revisions in reporting requirements include:

-- Using the December-February payroll period to determine if an employer has the required number of employees for whom he must submit data. This eliminates filing by some employers involved in seasonal operations.

-- Filing employment data for permanent employees only, in industries where the employment relationship is short and work locations scattered, such as construction, longshoring and suppliers of temporary help.

-- Including as Government contractors, banks and other employers that are depositaries of Federal Government funds.

-- No longer requiring employment data for insurance company general agents.

-- Requiring data in specified cases by city and local area and eliminating some reporting options.

Data will be combined within local areas by multi-establishment employers in retail and wholesale trade, finance, insurance, real estate and service industries, regardless of the size of their establishments, and by employers in all other industries covering establishments with less than 50 employees.

Employer will combine the data for all establishments engaged in the same major activity within a Standard Metropolitan Statistical Area (SMSA) into one report. Establishments located outside the SMSA's will be combined into statewide reports.

Where a SMSA crosses state lines, establishments will be combined into separate SMSA units by state; also, for each of 60 designated cities, establishments will be combined separately for the city and the rest of the SMSA. Lists of the SMSA's, counties included within them and the 60 cities will be included in the instructions accompanying the form.

-- Combining establishments with less than 25 employees in industries other than retail, wholesale, finance, insurance, real estate and services, into company-wide or divisional reports, provided no more than three occupational categories are covered by each report. These reports must be accompanied by a list of all required data for each occupation by state.

-- Dropping two questions concerning apprenticeship programs and union referral arrangements.

-- Reducing the number of copies filed from four to two.

-- Mailing to employer headquarters the number of forms he is expected to need based on last year's reporting.

Government contractors and sub-contractors with 50 or more employees must file the form, as well as employers with 100 or more persons and subject to Title VII. The forms call for occupational employment figures with separate data by sex and minority groups -- Negroes, Spanish Americans, Oriental and American Indians.

The report is due for filing by March 31, 1967, with the Joint Reporting Committee, Federal Depot 1201 East 10th Street, Jeffersonville, Indiana, 47130.

The new form will be mailed to employers early in February.

TITLE VII NEWS BRIEFS

EEOC

These are some of the things that are happening every day as the EEOC pursues its assignment to end job discrimination.

BEFORE the EEOC stepped in, a drive-in restaurant chain, with 9 units in Louisiana, had no Negro managers, only one Negro curb attendant and three Negro counter men. All of the bus boys were Negro. Even before conciliation was finished, the chain had two Negro managers, seven Negro curb men and 10 Negro counter men.

As vacancies arise, the chain promises to promote qualified Negroes from within before looking for "whites" outside. They also agree to advertise in Negro newspapers; the drive-ins had previously advertised for "whites only".

* * * * *

MEXICAN AMERICANS AND NEGROES should share rooms in a hospital controlled by a railroad in the Southwest, according to a finding by the EEOC. Prior to the discrimination charge, the hospital segregated Mexican Americans and Negroes from Anglos.

* * * * *

MINORITY EMPLOYMENT TRENDS in the textile industry will be highlighted at a two-day public forum to be held by the EEOC in the public library in Charlotte, N. C., January 12-13. The forum will bring together state and local agencies, business and industry leaders, civil rights groups and individual complainants with a view to increasing employment opportunities for minority persons.

EQUAL PAY FOR WOMEN - A union agreement with a Virginia rubber plant called for a 6¢ raise for the only classification in which women worked, and a 10¢ raise for all other classifications.

A conciliation agreement worked out with EEOC specifies a 3¢ raise for the women's classification, retroactive for almost four months, and valid until the union contract runs out this summer. It means more than $12,500 for the women. The settlement also calls for merging male and female job lists, and for carrying out all new collective bargaining without regard to sex.

* * * * *

UNION REFERRALS MUST COMPLY WITH TITLE VII says the EEOC. The Commissioners found discrimination in a case where a construction trade local in Memphis referred Negroes only to job openings which were racially segregated.

* * * * *

MERGED SENIORITY LINES FOR NEGROES AND WHITES will be administered fairly, according to an EEOC conciliation with a large paper company in Alabama. The agreement says that a senior employee will not be disqualified from a job promotion before receiving an adequate training period, or before a company official above the foreman's level had reviewed his on-the-job ability.

* * * * *

"REAL PARTICIPATION OF MINORITY GROUP EMPLOYEES throughout the occupational structure -- rather than a concentration in the lower levels" is a major goal, said EEOC Chairman Stephen N. Shulman in a speech before a Chamber of Commerce group in New York City. "Companies should examine their total work force and enter into serious discussions at all executive and supervisory levels to develop and then take actions designed to improve the occupational status of minority group members," he commented.

Dear Ben:

From time to time I am asked if E.E.O.C., especially through your office, has funds for affirmative programs which could be channelled to private agencies. What is the story?

There is in Atlanta, for instance, a group which cuts across agency lines which is attempting to make a concerted and thoughtful approach to the ending of discrimination in apprentice programs.

HOW TO BE SUCCESSFUL IN HIRING THE CULTURALLY DISADVANTAGED

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 15, 1967

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN, ANN ARBOR

- FRANK H. CASSELL

- ROBERT I. SHACKFORD
- CLAUDE J. PECK, JR.

"We're like every other company in town—short of employees. One solution is to start hiring people we wouldn't have considered in the past, the culturally disadvantaged."

— a Vice President of Personnel

More and more companies are facing the situation described in the above statement. Their only alternative is to remain understaffed. And yet, they are hesitant to turn to the so-called culturally disadvantaged to solve their problem.

Their reluctance to enter this new labor market is reflected in several questions we have heard voiced recently, questions such as these:

- Who are the culturally disadvantaged, anyway? What can they do, and what would we have to do to make them productive employees?
- Are there special steps we would have to follow to introduce them into our workforce? Is there really a difference between them and our present employees? If so, how can we reconcile this difference?
- We would hire them if (a) they can qualify for our jobs, and (b) if we knew where they were. Where can we find them?
- We've heard about the government's role in this whole area—the Job Corps and such—but we've never had any direct contact. Where can we find out what they are doing to help us solve our specific problems?
- Will our present hiring standards—especially educational requirements—have to be lowered or can they be redefined to take new vocational training programs into account?

These are important questions. Answers to them can help to solve the severe manpower shortage problems facing many companies today. These and a host of other questions will be answered at a one-day conference to be held on the Ann Arbor campus February 15, 1967.

The speakers for this session represent three major organizations involved in making the unemployable an employee. The two best-known and most influential Federal Government activities, the U. S. Employment Office and the Office of Economic Opportunity, will be represented as will a non-government program. In addition, a company that has hired the culturally disadvantaged will report on its experience—why it turned to this group, the procedures it followed, and the results it achieved. A complete outline appears on the reverse side of this page.

If you presently face a manpower shortage, or foresee a growing need to obtain employees, enroll now in this timely, informative program. Simply fill out and return the registration form which appears on the back of this sheet or call the conference registrar at 313 764-9454.

FEDERAL BIAS-FIGHTERS develop a new tool to battle pay discrimination. The Equal Employment Opportunity Commission settles charges against a Mississippi manufacturer after comparing his wage structure with that of a California competitor; the Mississippi employer's Negro workers were nearly all at the lowest pay rate prevailing in that plant, while workers holding similar jobs in California were higher up the wage structure there. Further use of such pay comparisons is expected. But the EEOC has little power to force changes.

EQUAL EMPLOYMENT OPPORTUNITY COMMISSION

1800 G Street, N.W. Washington, D. C. 20506

February, 1967

GOOD NEWS FROM WATTS

New jobs, liberal entry requirements, applications taken at the plant site, training provided, a stock-buying program for employees and a local Negro businessman as company president -- this is today's story from the much publicized Watts section of Los Angeles. Creator of the good news is Aerojet General Corporation, which formed its new subsidiary, the Watts Manufacturing Company, to provide jobs for hard core unemployed men and women in the disadvantaged area.

Dan A. Kimball, Chairman of the Aerojet Executive Committee, predicted that more than 200 local hires will be working on a two-shift basis next month with the number increasing to 250 by midsummer. Training is provided for applicants who have manual dexterity -- the only job-entry requirement -- to operate machines to produce tents for the military. Police or court records are irrelevant in evaluating applicants. Transportation, one of the major problems of the unemployed in Watts, is solved by locating the plant in the unemployed area. An extra inducement is the plan permitting employees to buy stock in the company.

TRANSLATING POLICY INTO PRACTICE

United Airlines reports that after an active campaign for merit employment, "we were on the road" to a successful program. The Chicago - based airline has more than 1,700 Negroes in job categories which include managerial, personnel, office and clerical, station agents, airfreight agents and stewardesses. Newest breakthrough came last summer when a Negro pilot took over controls of ships in the company's jet fleet.

United credits the company's unending emphasis on upgrading present employees for most of the progress it has made in placing Negroes in white-collar jobs. While United operates on a divisional basis in some job areas, its search for promotable talent within the company was -- and continues to be -- nationwide.

C. OF C. ADVOCATES PREFERENTIAL RECRUITMENT POLICIES

"Preferential minority recruitment policies by business are justified, as contrasted to preferential hiring policies. Long-standing policies giving preference to the recruitment of non-minority workers have restricted the incentive of minority Americans to look for jobs and to prepare for employment through education and job training. Special recruitment efforts are needed to make clear that business wants minority employees at all levels of employment." -- Third Report, Task Force on Economic Growth and Opportunity, Chamber of Commerce of the United States, January, 1967.

PROMISE AND PERFORMANCE

Non-white employees represented 37 percent of the total employment gain of 38,000 among 216 member firms of the Chicago Merit Employment Committee last year. Member firms sign a "Statement of Merit Employment" and supply the Committee's certified public accountants with confidential reports of white and non-white employment in various jobs. It's "good business" says John D. Gray, Committee Chairman and President of Hart Schaffner & Marx.

EEOC FINDS TESTS DISCRIMINATE

In its first decision concerning tests, EEOC found that a Southern paper manufacturing plant used tests that discriminate against Negro applicants and employees. Following a charge filed against the company and union, Commission investigators found: the test was not "professionally developed." Only six percent of the plant's 2,645 employees are Negro, while the local population is 40 percent Negro. Ninety-two percent of Negro employees are in "dead end" jobs with no prospect of advancement. Since 1964, 17 Negroes have taken tests to transfer to "line of progression" jobs. One Negro who passed the test was outbid for the job he sought. The Commission's decision was based on EEOC's Guidelines on Employment Testing Procedures, adopted last August.

TOWARD MORE EQUAL OPPORTUNITIES

"In the months ahead, we will be working to streamline the complaint process, to take maximum advantage of automation, so that we can provide speedier and improved procedures. We will increase our use of developments in the compliance area as a basis for new affirmative action projects. And we will be developing new and better ways of enlisting the cooperation of many that is so essential to voluntary progress." -- Chairman Stephen N. Shulman to Arkansas Human Relations Council, January 14, 1967.

Dear Mr. Via:

As a part of the follow-up program to our Textile Employment Forum held in Charlotte last month, the Commission is inviting a few persons to Washington on February 24, to exchange views regarding the Commission's tentative plans. At that time we expect to have completed a draft summary of the forum transcript and an analysis of certain other data which would be useful to those making suggestions on follow-up.

I would hope that you will be able to join us at the Commission offices on February 24. The meeting will began promptly at 10 o'clock a.m., and concluded by 4:30 p.m. Please come to room 1237 at 1800 G Street, N. W., on the appointed date.

If for any reason you will not be able to attend, I would appreciate your letting me know by February 20.

With all best wishes.

THE TASK AHEAD

President Johnson, in asking Congress to strengthen the EEOC by providing judicially enforcible cease-and-desist orders under the law, pointed out:

"Our task is far from over. The statistics demonstrate the magnitude of the effort required...The unemployment rate for nonwhites aged 21 -- even in this time of near full employment -- is double that of whites... The income of the average Negro family is about 40 percent lower than that of the average white family...

"Perseverence, the willingness to abandon what does not work, and the courage to keep searching for better solutions -- these are the virtues the times require...." -- Civil Rights message to the Congress, February 15, 1967

BEYOND THE LETTER OF THE LAW

By "giving any guy a break," the 800-member work force of KLH Research and Development Corporation is approximately 35 percent Negro, 7 percent non-English speaking Portugese, and a smaller percentage of other minority group members. Bi-lingual group leaders in the plant and a volunteer English instructor from Boston University are solving communications problems of the non-English speaking. Present workforce of the Cambridge, Mass., corporation also includes 19 parolees, with production records comparable to any group, according to Henry K. Shor, Personnel Director.

A CHANCE TO QUALIFY

Ten firms cooperating with the New York Urban League are giving high school graduates a chance to qualify as trained secretaries and stenographers. Through a scholarship program at Manhattan Community College, they provide a ten-week course of full-time training including typing, stenography, business English and office practice. Cooperating companies are: American Airlines, Bankers Trust Company, Bristol-Myers, Celanese Corporation, General Motors, Lever Brothers, Mobil Oil, Time Inc., Richardson-Merrell and Western Electric.

ISSUES IN TESTING

To illustrate "cultural bias" in employment tests, Sylvia Porter, syndicated columnist, recently wrote: "A test given to young children in Hawaii some years ago included a picture of a house without a chimney. When asked what was wrong with the house, most of the children answered 'nothing' because they had never seen houses with chimneys." Miss Porter cites the illustration as an indication of the extent to which this type of bias may exist in employment tests widely used in the United States.

TESTS DON'T ALWAYS PREDICT PERFORMANCE

A Prentice-Hall survey of 423 employers with a total of 954,000 employees reveals that more than one out of six companies said the most recently hired nonwhite's job performance has been better than his test performance. "The fact that a significant number of companies noted this supports the belief of researchers that employment tests sometimes do not measure the true ability of many minority-group members to perform on the job..." -- The New Civil Rights Law and Your Business, Prentice-Hall, Inc., December 1966.

EEOC offers Guidelines on Employment Testing Procedures, based on the recommendations of a panel of outstanding psychologists with broad experience in the testing field.

CONCILIATION OPENS NEW JOBS FOR WOMEN

A major conciliation agreement has opened up 195 new job categories for women from which they have been historically excluded. The agreement was signed by EEOC, the Dubuque Packing Company of Iowa, Local 150 of the Amalgamated Meat Cutters and Butcher Workmen and individual women complainants. It abolishes separate male and female seniority lines, establishes a unified system, makes all jobs in the plant available to women if they are able to perform or learn to perform them within a reasonable period of time. The agreement also means that men may seek jobs previously reserved for women.

COMMISSION PLANS FOLLOW-UP ON TEXTILE INDUSTRY FORUM

Planning is underway for a voluntary affirmative action program throughout the textile industry in the Carolinas, following the Commission-sponsored Public Forum in North Carolina January 12-13. EEOC's goal is to involve in the program all interested parties who attended the Forum, including representatives of the textile industry, state and local government agencies, civil rights organizations, labor, education, the clergy and other community leaders.

"Our Commission is pledged to assist and encourage voluntary efforts and seeks to increase their number. Successful, workable, conciliation agreements with a particular company can, in appropriate instances, serve as a pattern for the relevant industry." -- Stephen N. Shulman, to Detroit Personnel Management Association, February 16, 1967.

TITLE VII NEWS BRIEFS MARCH 1967

Highlights of what's happening at EEOC....

NEW TRAINING OPPORTUNITIES OPEN UP FOR NEGROES in a Gulf Bay plant, after a review of minority group personnel records.

Negro employees charged that the company's job training program was run in a way which prevented them from becoming equally qualified for promotion to supervisory positions. Nine Negroes in one mill, for example, had more seniority than and at least as much education as the white foremen. None of the foremen was Negro.

EEOC conciliation called for an evaluation and review of personnel records, with training and promotion for qualified employees. Within two months, the review was completed: Two Negroes were selected as foremen trainees and four Negro laborers were selected as machine operator trainees.

EEOC STEPS IN TO HELP NEGROES AND MEXICAN AMERICANS who were denied union membership in a New Orleans local. It was charged that this same local conspired with an employer to discharge -- and to refuse to refer for other jobs -- two employees who had tried to get union membership for the minority group workers. The discrimination charge is in the process of Commission conciliation.

FINDING JOBS FOR PEOPLE AND PEOPLE FOR JOBS was urged by Vice President Hubert H. Humphrey at the fifth national conference of Plans for Progress. The Vice President called on businessmen to "give us a balance sheet next year that looks like a new beginning... We can afford to continue our efforts toward a full opportunity for all Americans."

INTEGRATED FACILITIES AND WORKFORCE were agreed upon in a conciliation with the Commission and a South Carolina textile mill.

The company operates a three-shift day for its 400 employees -- 125 of whom are Negro. Whites are predominantly on the first shift, with Negroes predominantly on the second and third shifts. The conciliation calls for integrating the first shift workforce, as vacancies arise.

In addition, facilities which were segregated -- Negroes using time clocks in the rear of the building for example -- were eliminated. Now time clocks are located in the same area.

COMMISSION GETS NEW CHAIRMAN

President Appoints Stephen N. Shulman To Head EEOC

When the new chairman of the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, Stephen N. Shulman, talks about retail and wholesale, he means the equal employment opportunity business, not the garment business.

At a press briefing held not long after his appointment by the President, Shulman defined the "retail" of equal employment as the handling of individual job discrimination complaints. With complaints running at an annual rate of about 10,000, the EEOC is indeed deeply committed to this retail approach.

But Shulman plans to move vigorously into the "wholesale," broad approach of reaching out for an entire industry, persuading the employers to hire minority workers.

This kind of business is not new to Shulman: although he is only 34 years old, he already has several years of labor and civil rights work behind him.

Shulman, who received his Commission Conducts Public Forum on Textile Employment

Representatives of state and local governments, civil rights groups, educational institutions, labor unions, human relations commissions, individual complainants, and—at the last minute—of the textile industry, participated in a two-day public forum conducted in Charlotte, N.C. by the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission.

The "Textile Employment Forum" was designed to focus attention on employment trends in the textile industry and on the labor market generally in the Carolinas, with a view to increasing employment opportunities for minority persons.

Commission staff presented information gathered from Reporting Forms filed by textile manufacturers with the Commission. A report: "Negro Employment in the Textile Industries of North and South Carolina," prepared by Dr. Donald D. Osburn of the University of Missouri (formerly of North Carolina State University) was presented and discussed by Dr. Osburn.

Some of the facts upon which the textile forum was based:

Textile industry provides about 45 per cent of the manufacturing jobs in the Carolinas.

After Faltering Start, Agency Readies Attack On Job Discrimination

Young, Forceful Chief Takes Charge of New U.S. Unit; Tough Enforcement Likely Tackling Dixie Textile Plants

4-12-67

By JAMES P. GANNON
Staff Reporter of THE WALL STREET JOURNAL

WASHINGTON—"We're out to kill an elephant with a fly gun."

Smiling but not really joking, Stephen N. Shulman thus describes his tiny Federal agency's big assignment of wiping out race and sex discrimination in employment. As the new chairman of the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, Mr. Shulman is loading up for an assault on the target.

The commission's record, in its 21-month existence, wouldn't throw much fear into the hearts of potential foes. It has received more than 15,000 complaints of discrimination but has successfully conciliated only 330 complaints against 110 employers. Exactly one EEOC lawsuit has been filed by the Government against an employer.

The EEOC's brief history has been marked by administrative chaos and a revolving-door personnel problem. With a $5.2 million budget (smaller than that of the Office of Coal Research) and a staff of 314 (smaller than that of the Federal Crop Insurance Program) the agency seems dwarfed by the problems facing it.

Yet Mr. Shulman vows that a newly recruited team of ambitious young men and a new, broader approach to fighting job bias will "get this agency moving." He plans a series of industry-wide attacks on discrimination. Young (34), enthusiastic and confident, Steve Shulman plans to make the EEOC felt by the nation's employers.

"It's a whole new ball game," he declares.

New ball games are routine to the versatile Mr. Shulman. Prior to assuming his new post, he hurried through six Government jobs in seven years. After college at Harvard, law school at Yale, a term as a law clerk at the Supreme Court and a hitch as an assistant U.S. Attorney, he became executive assistant to the Secretary of Labor, served with the President's Committee on Equal Employment Opportunity (a now-defunct forerunner of the EEOC), was appointed Deputy Assistant Secretary of Defense for civilian personnel, industrial relations and civil rights, then general counsel of the Air Force and, finally, to his present $27,000-a-year post.

Moving to the EEOC after four years at the Pentagon, Mr. Shulman has characteristics that make him look something like a Robert McNamara for the civil rights field.

Like the Defense Secretary, Mr. Shulman puts high priority on efficiency. He has established what he calls an "industrial engineering-efficiency expert sort of operation" to evaluate EEOC work and map future strategy. He's about to automate commission procedures extensively, using computers both to increase agency productivity and to pinpoint job bias.

"Whiz Kids"

In the McNamara style, the EEOC chief has assembled a "whiz kid" staff of young executives like himself. Fighting discrimination, he feels, is too important to be left to the civil rights advocates, whom he maintains are often "dedicated more to discussion than action." His newly recruited staffers range from a computer expert to a former television news executive.

Last week President Johnson carried the EEOC revamping a step further, by filling one of two vacancies on the five-man commission. The new commissioner is Vincente Ximenes, who has been serving as deputy director of the U.S. aid mission in Panama. He joins Mr. Shulman and the only two commissioners with the EEOC from the start, 55-year-old Luther Holcomb, a former Dallas minister, and 37-year-old Samuel C. Jackson, a former NAACP attorney.

This year the President has asked Congress to grant the EEOC power to issue enforceable cease-and-desist orders; currently, it is limited to investigating complaints, conciliating disputes and recommending suits by the Justice Department. The fate of the Johnson request is in doubt; no Congressional action is likely for several months. If granted, the new power would be welcomed at the EEOC but would force major changes in procedures and machinery.

A Thorough Shake-Up

Sweeping change wouldn't be unprecedented at the EEOC. Rarely has any Federal agency undergone such a thorough shake-up in personnel, procedures and policy as this one since Mr. Shulman took over last September, nearly five months after the resignation of the first chairman, Franklin D. Roosevelt Jr. Whether more vigorous performance will result remains to be seen; some observers are skeptical. But whatever the outcome, the direction of the EEOC under Mr. Shulman is becoming clear:

—The attack on job bias will be broadened beyond the case-by-case "retail" handling of complaints by individuals to what Mr. Shulman calls a "wholesale" approach of industry-wide anti-discrimination programs. These probably will involve both voluntary action by employers and commission-initiated formal charges leading to conciliation of disputes. The South's textile industry will be the first "wholesale" target. The EEOC is studying further "affirmative action" plans for the railroad and trucking industries, among others.

—The EEOC increasingly will join with other arms of the Government to try to open employment opportunities for minorities. "With a budget our size," says the chairman, "we've got to be a catalyst" that sparks anti-discrimination action by bigger, more powerful units. For example, the EEOC's fight against job bias could be advanced by judicious use of such incentives as employe recruiting aid from the Labor Department and job training funds from the Health, Education and Welfare Department or by the threat of defense contract cancellations from the Pentagon. "What we're trying to do is bring the total imagination of the Government to bear on this thing," Mr. Shulman explains.

Uphill Bias Fight: New U.S. Agency Readies Attack on Job Discrimination

—The commission will concentrate on liberalizing hiring standards and promotion policies in industry, including the union-contract seniority system.

Industry's hiring standards, involving mental tests, physical appearance and police records, usually are "built around a community of average middle-class white people who behave in a certain way," says Mr. Shulman. Such standards, he finds, often weed out a high proportion of minority-group job applicants. He vows his determination to change this situation.

Promotion barriers, especially those that involve union-negotiated seniority arrangments, present more difficult questions. The key issue is whether the commission should content itself with opening up current and future advancement opportunities for minorities, or whether it should try to undo the effects of past discrimination that has long held them in low-pay, dead-end jobs. The answer isn't certain yet.

Touchy policy questions are only part of Mr. Shulman's problems. "He came into what is considered a can of worms," says a former high-ranking EEOC official who recently quit. For his own part, Mr. Shulman allows that the agency was in "quite a bad administrative situation" on his arrival.

It was in mid-1964 that Congress formally created the commission. But the Administration and the nation's employers were given one year of grace before the new Federal jurisdiction over employment discrimination actually was to take effect. Nonetheless, President Johnson didn't appoint the five commissioners until May 17, 1965—only about six weeks before the EEOC was supposed to start functioning.

Planning procedures, writing ground rules and hiring a staff consumed more months. Congressional clipping of the EEOC's first budget request hampered some operations and delayed the opening of regional offices. "It wasn't until midyear 1966 that this commission really began to operate," one insider says. The 10 field offices weren't all operating until last September.

The commission was headless — some critics say motionless — for five months after FDR Jr. quit in April of last year to run unsuccessfully for governor of New York. It hasn't had a full complement of five commissioners since last June 30, when Richard A. Graham's term expired; it's been running with three commissioners since last November, when Aileen C. Hernandez quit, partly in frustration over slow progress. Commissioner Jackson had planned to quit in February until civil rights leaders prevailed upon him to remain as the only Negro commissioner.

Job-jumping at the staff level has been even more frenetic. Of the top dozen staff jobs, only two are still held by their original occupants. The highest staff job has had three tenants in 21 months. The personnel parade is partly a result of Mr. Shulman's deliberate shake-up, but it also reflects the agency's uncertain start.

Moreover, the EEOC grossly underestimated its workload. After figuring on receiving 2,000 complaints in its first year, the agency found itself swamped with 8,854 charges. Through the end of 1966, the total influx reached 15,524. The result: A staggering backlog in both the investigation and conciliation departments.

The commission must study each incoming complaint, determine if it has jurisdiction, investigate the charges, decide whether there's "probable cause" to believe the law has been violated and, if cause is found, seek to conciliate.

Backlog Figures

At the end of 1966, 6,040 complaints had been earmarked for investigation; the rest were awaiting processing, had washed out due to lack of jurisdiction or insufficient information, or had been sent to a state or local fair employment commission, to which the EEOC must defer. Of the 6,040 complaints, investigators had completed inquiries on only 3,319, leaving 2,721 awaiting processing. In the conciliation stage, backlogs are worse. The logjam has continued to grow this year.

The planners underestimated the volume of complaints from Negroes, but the deluge of sex-bias charges was even more unexpected. The sex provisions, added almost as an afterthought as the bill passed Congress, have provided one-third of the total complaints.

Of the 110 cases successfully conciliated so far, 80 involved Negroes, 27 dealt with sex-bias charges (mostly by women) and three involved Mexican-Americans. By EEOC reckoning, the 80 Negro settlements immediately benefited 675 employes and might eventually benefit 8,773 others in similar situations with the same employers.

For a staff of only five conciliators, it's an impressive showing, but for the U.S. Government it is not the showing we'd hoped for," comments Alfred W. Blumrosen, chief of conciliations. Like the investigations staff, he and his four associates have worked seven-day weeks and take considerable pride in their accomplishments, no matter how the statistics look.

Justice Department's Role

However efficiently the commission operates, its effectiveness depends in part on the Justice Department. When conciliation fails, the EEOC can ask the Attorney General to file suit against recalcitrant employers or unions. So far, 15 cases ripe for suit have been referred to the Justice Department. Only last month the department filed its first suit against an employer, Dillon Supply Co. of Raleigh, N.C., picking a case referred to it some 10 months earlier.

This unhurried and limited response to EEOC recommendations has drawn criticism from civil rights groups. "Somehow, somewhere, there seems to be a lack of communication and cooperation between the EEOC and the Justice Department," says Robert Belton, attorney for the NAACP Legal Defense Fund Inc. which has brought suit on its own in 35 job-bias cases where the EEOC failed to conciliate successfully.

Publicly, EEOC officials sound philosophical about their cases marking time in the Justice Department; they say the department must make its own thorough investigation and must weigh the importance of the EEOC cases against other pending civil rights legal work ranging from voter-registration cases to school integration suits.

Private comments from some EEOC officials, however, are less charitable. "There's a feeling on the staff level that if a complaint involves General Motors, U.S. Steel or a company of that stature, with access to the White House, then Justice will back off," says one official. (No suit against such a company has been recommended by the commission, however.) Another EEOC official, noting that the lone suit was brought against a small company, contends it's unlikely such a suit would be filed against an important Government supplier; that, he claims, would "embarrass" the Labor Department's Office of Federal Contract Compliance, which is supposed to police nondiscrimination by Government contractors, and also might jeopardize the supply of some important item.

Budget Increase Sought

As for the EEOC's part of the job, things are expected to start moving faster soon. "It's true our current staff and current budget . . . are inadequate," says Mr. Shulman. But that's all changing, he adds. For one thing, the President has asked that the EEOC budget for the fiscal year starting in July be raised to $7.2 million from the current year's $5.2 million; that will provide for an additional 110 employes, lifting the EEOC staff to 424.

Besides, promises Mr. Shulman, productivity is going to accelerate. Computers will store, for instant retrieval, all previous commission decisions and general counsel's rulings. For any one case, "the whole legal research job can be done in five minutes," he says. Also, computers will analyze the commission's huge store of statistics on racial makeup of the work forces in individual concerns and industries, spotting areas most in need of EEOC attention.

Mr. Shulman is also counting heavily on his new staff to improve efficiency. In this youthful group, 40 is old. Gordon Chase, the new staff director, who comes from the Agency for International Development, is 34; Eric Springer, a research professor and computer expert from the University of Pittsburgh who will be chief of compliance (over investigation and conciliation), is 38; David Shefrin, formerly of ABC-TV in New York, who is director of state and community relations, is 39; Peter Robertson, head of the office of program planning and review, the efficiency-expert operation, is 31.

Some outsiders wonder about the effectiveness of these "whiz kids," who are largely inexperienced in the complex mixture of civil rights, labor practices and management policy involved in EEOC cases. "I don't see how it's possible to walk out of the top third of the class at Yale and into this situation and know what you're doing," comments one observer who has had extensive dealings with the agency. Mr. Shulman concedes the new staff will have to go through a "shakedown" period, but he doubts that means "moving backwards."

A Leader Sees Textile Industry Emerging From Its Recession

The New York Times

Charles F. Myers Jr., president of Burlington Industries

By ISADORE BARMASH

The textile industry is beginning to climb out of the trough into which it fell more than nine months ago, the president of the country's largest textile producer said last week.

Charles F. Myers Jr., president of Burlington Industries, Inc., attributed the recession—in part at least—to the imports that flooded the country after the domestic industry was asked to fill heavy military needs for Vietnam.

The industry's depression, he said, resulted also from a great growth in new production facilities, a resulting maladjustment in fiber prices, and consumer uncertainty about the future of the economy.

Now, however, Burlington finds a stronger tone in forward bookings, particularly in the depressed home-furnishings sector.

Question: Mr. Myers, would you elaborate on the pickup in business?

Answer: Some of the conditions that brought about the depression are beginning to right themselves and the inventory situation is starting to correct itself. The consumers still are generally buying and that has helped the transition from the lag to a more promising state. I expect that there will be a fuller pickup in the industry's business at the end of this year or at the beginning of 1968.

Q. What effect do you think the completion of the Kennedy round talks, providing a cut in tariffs on imports, will have on the American textile industry?

A. While the Kennedy round negotiations have been concluded, at this point we don't have details as to the effect on textiles. We will study the specifics when available, both from the standpoint of the impact on imports and on our opportunities to increase exports.

Q. What effect did the industry depression have on your production?

A. We made some very substantial deliberate curtailments in our production. Before, our temptation was to hit and run. But, in the last few months, we have had as severely enforced curtailments as we have had in the last 15 years. In some plants, where we operated six days, we went to five days. In others, we went to four days. I estimate that we cut our production 16 per cent in this period. Now, in some areas, it looks as if we might be returning to normal production. It is still tenuous, of course. But, after all, what do we need to jump back? First, demand. Then volume. And then come better margins.

Q. How will your capital expenditures this year compare with those of the last two years?

A. The most encouraging thing about our situation today is that we have pretty well finished with a heavy capital expenditure program. Last year, we spent a record $159-million for new plants, bringing seven facilities on stream, against about $85-million in 1965. Our capital program this year will be more in line with 1965 than with 1966.

Q. In retrospect, seeing clearly now what has happened in the industry, do you feel that you may have gone overboard on your big capital outlays?

A. No, I don't feel that way. We took a real hard look at expenditures last year in the light of the rough going. And, looking back, I think that we would not have lopped off more than 10 per cent from our outlays because of the unsatisfactory industry conditions.

Q. How much extra volume will the new plants bring or accommodate?

A. At today's price levels and operating all of our facilities at relatively full production, we now have potential volume of well within $200-million to $250-million above current levels. Even though our program was carried on at a bad time, we were building not for the present but for the future. My only fear is whether we are going to have enough plants to supply the needs that arise.

Q. What is your reaction to the very recent price cuts in polyester fibers by several producers?

A. I think they will help to stabilize the industry's position. Let's look at it this way: If we want our customer to take a forward position, and we certainly do, he will want to know what the price structure will be. In other words, he wants a stability of prices so that he can have confidence in buying ahead. With all the overproduction in polyester, the lower prices will bring a balance.

Q. Has Burlington adopted a new policy of becoming directly known to the public? If so, why?

A. Yes, we are doing much more of this, but we are feeling our way. Our national television program is very much part of providing a direct link with the consumer. And we have today many consumer product areas that are going directly to the consumer—carpets, sheets, hosiery—and then there is a broad area of fabrics that the public is knowing better all the time because we are stressing the divisional brand names.

Q. What about the corporate name as far as consumers are concerned?

A. Down the road a bit, we will be stressing our name more than the fiber. The fiber companies have done a tremendous job of educating the public and I hope this will continue. But I think there is a trend under way to change to corporate names as opposed to brand names. After all, the customer is buying the Burlington fabric, not because it has the XYZ fiber but because he depends on our quality and reputation. I see this as a gradual development, but it will not take over 100 per cent. There will always be textile fabricators who will want to ride the coattails of the fiber companies. We ourselves are trying to probe and find the proper emphasis for our divisions and to add to their image of stability and reliability the reputation and prestige of the corporate name.

Q. Would you discuss your research and development and are there any changes in their objectives?

A. In the last four to five years, there has been a very definite desire on our part to increase our research activities and to back them with effort and money. Applied research was our traditional pitch and we took up where the fiber companies left off. It is my belief that we had restricted our research too much to quality control—to ultra-applied research. Now we have a substantially different concept or reason for research than we did a few years ago and it is to move more and more into basic research. On Friday we dedicated Burlington's new research center near Greensboro, N. C. This $3.5-million project now houses on a 42-acre site near the Greensboro Airport the company's expanded corporate research and development facilities. In this center, we are going to do many things to look to some of the fascinating horizons ahead of us.

Q. Could you open the doors a bit and let us see some of the things going on inside the new center?

A. We are exploring the whole area of truly making apparel easy-care. This involves work to solve the problems of some of the newer fibers that not only retain but also attract soil or dirt. It includes waves of simplifying the processing operations in the mills, the putting together in manufacturing of both natural and synthetic fibers. And, of course, we have already had one 'Eureka.' This is our new 'Come Clean' process, introduced by our Klopman Mills division, to remove stains from permanent-press articles.

Q. What further diversification plans does Burlington have since its 1966 acquisition of the Globe Furniture Company?

A. Within our industry, we have reached a good level of diversification and this is what led us to move into an area that is fringe for us, such as furniture. We have no plans to expand further into that field. We are getting our feet wet and we are still in the learning stage in that industry. However, we do feel that, within the textile area, there are untapped markets for us and that these deserve our effort and money.

Q. How about overseas?

A. Klopman Mills is building a big new integrated plant for polyester-cotton blends in Italy that is being constructed with the possibility of having three eventual enlargements. It should be on stream at the end of this year or in the first six months of 1968. Its output is intended to be sold to all the Common Market countries. Of course, we also have other integrated plants in Switzerland, a glass fiber plant in West Germany and plants in Latin America.

Q. Would you estimate corporate financial results for the current third quarter and nine months?

A. I can't do that, but you can draw your own conclusions from our first six months' figures.

Q. Those results showed a decline in sales and earnings, which you were quoted as attributing to continued high levels of imports. Does that mean that the nine months will also show a dip in sales and income?

A. As I said, you will have to draw your own conclusions.

Q. Will the new building on the old Ziegfield Theater site at Avenue of the Americas and 54th Street in Manhattan in any way mean a corporate move from your Greensboro headquarters?

A. I see no change in that respect. Our corporate offices will remain in Greensboro, but our merchandising headquarters will now be centralized in this proposed 50-story building in New York, instead of in 10 different locations, depending upon the suitable areas in the city. We find those area lines disappearing, with possibly one or two exceptions. I myself am a commuter from North Carolina to New York, as are most of our senior executives. I am here two or three days a week about 45 weeks of the year.

EQUAL EMPLOYMENT OPPORTUNITY APPRENTICESHIP INFORMATION REPORT EEO–2

This report is required to be filed under Section 709(c) of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 by Joint Labor-Management Apprenticeship Committees only. Refusal or failure to file the report may result in court action by the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission to compel the filing of the report. The form is being mailed to all known Joint Labor-Management Committees. If you are an employer or a labor organization operating an apprenticeship program (other than a joint labor-management program), and you received this form by mistake, explain in Section E and return the form, so that your name can be removed from the mailing list.

IMPORTANT—Read the attached instructions carefully before preparing this report. Complete all items unless otherwise instructed. If an item does not apply, mark "N/A." Use additional sheets if more space is needed and identify the continued item. Prepare, sign, and submit one copy before September 30, 1967, to: Apprenticeship Reporting Program, Federal Depot, 1201 East 10th Street, Jeffersonville, Indiana 47130.

Part A. APPRENTICESHIP PROGRAMS REQUIRED TO FILE (To Be Completed By All Joint Apprenticeship Committees)

SUMMARY

The Federal Government has accused the Allen-Bradley Company of discriminatory employment practices. If this charge is not disproven by the Company the effects ON THE WORKERS IN THE PLANT could be disasterous. The only ways apparent that the disaster could be avoided would be . . . if the government finds that the Company does not discriminate, or, . . . if the Company would pledge (probably in writing) to hire more minority group people in the plant as soon as possible.

If the Company is found to be guilty of discriminatory employment practices, and THEY REFUSE TO ASSURE THE GOVERNMENT that they will end this practice as soon as possible, a LARGE PORTION OF THE WORK FORCE WILL BE FACED WITH LAYOFFS. The layoffs would come because the Federal Government would pull all government work out of this plant. Because of this possibility, the Executive Board, and a subsequent membership meeting approved unanimously to send the following letter:

Allen-Bradley Company
1201 South Second Street
Milwaukee, Wisconsin 53204

Att: Mr. Sam Hay, Labor Relations Manager

Gentlemen:

We were relieved to hear that the Company requested a hearing from the Department of Labor to answer charges of alleged discriminatory employment practices.

We urge the Company to take all necessary steps to avoid the withdrawal of any government work which the Local 1111 Bargaining Unit is involved in, since the withdrawal of any work from our plant would certainly effectuate further layoffs. The possibility of further recalls from the list of laid off employees would certainly be eliminated also. These two effects are of prime importance to us.

We also urge the Company to take whatever actions are necessary to remove this Company, and its workers, from the shadow of the cloud of discrimination which has apparently been hanging over this plant for quite some time now. You owe it to yourselves, this Union, and your loyal work force to remove this shadow.

Over the years which we have been negotiating with you, we have tried repeatedly to get a non-discriminatory hiring clause included in the Labor Agreement. Each time we failed because you did not feel it was necessary.

Now, we request that the Company, and this Union, meet as soon as possible to negotiate an amendment to our Agreement so that it includes a non-discriminatory hiring clause. We believe that this would be a positive step toward eliminating future allegations, charges, or doubts as to whether this Company discriminates in their employment practices.

Yours truly,
LOCAL 1111,
United Electrical, Radio and Machine Workers of America, (UE)

COLLISION COURSE!

June 19, 1968

When a Company DELIBERATELY VIOLATES their Labor Agreement they are heading on a "COLLISION COURSE". The A.B. Company appears to have chosen that course.

As of Monday, June 10, 1968, the Company decided to eliminate the third shift in Department 310. This happened, not only because of a decrease in customer orders, but also from the rapid elimination of jobs through technological changes, and an over-abundance of resistor shelf stock.

After closing down the 3rd shift, the Company was able to spread the 3rd shift workers around on empty machines on the 2nd and 1st shifts. After doing this, approximately 90 workers were transferred out of 310 and distributed throughout the plant as vacation fill-ins.

At this point the Company decided they would not transfer the workers out from the bottom of the entire 310 seniority list, but, instead, would transfer 17 workers from the bottom of the category C job list, and 72 workers from the bottom of the category A job list. This meant that a number of lower seniority category C workers would remain in 310 while higher seniority category A workers would be transferred out. Needless to say, this caused quite an uproar among the 310 workers.

The Union immediately called for 1st, and 2nd Step Grievance meetings, and held them both on the same day. At the 2nd Step meeting Ted Hutton related the Company's position to the Union. He informed us that there would be too many problems if the Company followed straight seniority, so they decided to transfer workers out of 310 as is spelled out in the above paragraph. The Union demanded that the Company follow the Contract but the Company refused to comply.

A 3rd Step Grievance meeting was demanded and it is being held as this leaflet is being written. It is our belief that if the Company does not back off of their Contract violation at this step of the grievance procedure we will be able to go directly to the Wisconsin Employment Relations Commission (WERC) with an unfair labor practice charge. A Contract violation is an unfair labor practice in the state of Wisconsin, and since the Company admits the violation, we should be able to get speedy relief.

If the Union cannot get this issue resolved satisfactorily by either getting the Company to back off, or by speedy action from the WERC, A SPECIAL EXECUTIVE BOARD MEETING WILL BE CALLED TO DECIDE OUR COURSE OF ACTION.

The Union will continue to attempt to negotiate a settlement of the category A and category C job transfer problems which arise when there are too many category C workers in a given department, and the only available jobs in the plant are category A jobs.

The Union has set up a meeting with the Chicago office of the Federal Government's Equal Employment Opportunity Commission for next week Thursday. The Union is seeking advice from the Commission on ways to resolve this problem.

UE LOCAL 1111 NEWSLETTER

JULY 1968

ALLEN-BRADLEY WORKERS

"FEDS" SET DATE The U.S. Government has set Tuesday, August 20, 1968 as the hearing date for the "discriminatory employment practices" charge which they filed against the Allen-Bradley Company.

The Union was sent a copy of the complaint which contains the charges made against the Company and, also, an invitation to attend the hearing.

An appropriate number of Executive Board members will attend.

Because of the importance of this issue, and the possible drastic, long-term effect it could have on YOUR JOBS AT A-B, a more complete report will be given at a future date.

ARBITRATION CASES As was reported in a previous leaflet, the Union has taken four unresolved grievances to arbitration. All four cases have been presented to arbitrators, at least partially, and we should conclude the last case on Monday, August 12th.

A rough estimate of the total cost of arbitrating these four grievances adds up to an expenditure of at least $6,000.

It also appears that at least one, and possibly three more grievances, will end up in arbitration.

Are YOU helping to pay the cost of policing and enforcing YOUR Contract with the Company, or, are you riding free on the backs of your fellow workers?

MEMBERS: How long will you tolerate the free rides that some of your fellow workers are having on you? The principled move to make would be to SIGN THEM UP ---- NOW !!!!!

WERC HEARING DATE SET The Union unfair labor practice charges which were filed before the Wisconsin Employment Relations Commission will be heard on Wednesday, September 4, 1968, at 10 o'clock in the morning.

These charges were filed after the Company deliberately violated the Contract in 310 transfers and, now, compounds the charge with further violations. (See opposite side).

NLRB CHARGE COMPLETED By the end of the day, today, the Union will have concluded its filing of affidavits in support of our unfair labor practice charges filed before the National Labor Relations Board over the Company's SPEED-UP program. Requests for additional, supporting information by the NLRB, plus busy schedules of the Union's officers and the NLRB agent, has delayed the conclusion of this action.

DON'T BE A FOOL The following discussion took place in one of the SPEED-UP departments.

FEMALE WORKER: (To President Ballas) Can the boss get away with this? I have been working on this job for the past year and a half, and I've always produced about 180 parts per day without any complaints from the boss. About 3 or 4 months ago he started to call me up to the desk, once a week, and told me that I had to make what the other girls were making. (200 pcs. per day)

BALLAS: Did you do it?

FEMALE WORKER: I had to, because he kept riding me. He said I was only producing at 95% performance, and all the other girls were doing 100%. I really had to work hard though, because I'm naturally slow.

But that's not all. Now he calls me up to the desk whenever I don't make 200 pcs. I feel like he made a fool of me.

BALLAS: I think you hit the nail on the head.

FEMALE WORKER: Now the louse is telling the other girls that since a slow girl like me can make 200 per day, then the old performance rate must have been wrong. Now he says 100% performance is 220 pcs.

BALLAS: Are there any other girls making 220?

FEMALE WORKER: I think so.

THIS DISCUSSION DID TAKE PLACE IN DEPARTMENT 215.

DON'T BE FOOLS ! ! ! If you let a boss SPEED YOU UP you are his fool. REMEMBER ! ! ! TODAY'S MAXIMUM IS TOMORROW'S MINIMUM. No worker can afford this kind of RAT RACE.

In the latest issue of the Company's GOSSIP magazine, they tried to "explain" to the department 310 people that the recent moves and transfers which took place were made "in the best interests of A-B people". It also went on to say that the "affected employees should bear with us during these somewhat trying times as WE try to work out OUR problems TOGETHER."

Well, these certainly are trying times, because in addition to the many arbitration cases which the Union is presently involved in, the Company has seen fit to create further problems for us. Now they are messing around with the Contract language as it specifically pertains to the recall of laid off employees.

A recent trip to the Federal Government's Chicago office of the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission was made by President, Nick Ballas, and Chief Steward, Robert Gaulke. It was discovered that PARTS OF OUR PRESENT CONTRACT, AS IT PERTAINS TO CATEGORY "A" AND "C" JOBS, AND THE EFFECTS IT HAS ON WOMEN DURING PERIODS OF TRANSFER AND LAYOFF, ARE IN VIOLATION OF THE FEDERAL LAW.

Yes, these certainly are trying times. . . . and, there is no question that additional discussion will have to be held, and a movement of employees, OTHER THAN WHAT IS PRESENTLY PROVIDED FOR, will have to be negotiated. However, the fact remains that the Contract WAS VIOLATED in the recent 310 transfers (SINCE CORRECTED), and we very seriously question whether the "best interests of A-B people" were served by the Company's flagrant violation.

We certainly DISAGREE that "OUR" problems are being worked out "TOGETHER". The most recent example of this is the recalling of employees from the laid off list in violation of our Contract (Par. 81), which states in part, that, employees "shall be recalled in order of seniority". The Company, instead, is recalling on the basis of CATEGORY, regardless of plant seniority.

They claim they arrived at this decision, because they experienced much trouble in former call backs with Category C people taking Category A jobs that were available without any thought as to whether they could do the job or not.

They go on further to say that they did not give Category C people the right to Category A jobs when they were laid off; so, therefore, they are being consistent in not giving them that right upon recall.

Needless to say, the Union objects. Not only is Paragraph 81 being violated, but denying an employee the right to a job when available in a category of his own selection is a VIOLATION OF THE LAW. We are not willfully going to be a part of a system which is in violation of the law, nor are we going to allow our Contract to be violated.

Meetings with the Company, on this particular issue, are presently being held, and in the very near future, the Union will seek negotiations in an attempt to rectify those paragraphs that are in noncompliance and to reach a solution that will benefit all of the workers when we become involved in layoffs, transfers, and recalls.

IN THE MEANTIME, THE UNION CALLS UPON THE COMPANY TO "MUTUALLY WORK OUT OUR PROBLEMS" and to work them out with the "BEST INTERESTS OF THE EMPLOYEES" in mind.

Yes, he's "out", and every Allen-Bradley worker knows what an "OUT" is. Here's how too many OUTS have affected Allen-Bradley workers.

On Tuesday, July 16, 1968, the Executive Board of Local 1111 instructed the Secretary-Treasurer to borrow $7,500 from the Union's STRIKE AND/OR DEFENSE FUND. This action came after authorization to close out the GENERAL FUND, and transfer the last $6,500 in it to the Checking account. This means that there ISN'T ANY MORE MONEY IN THE GENERAL FUND, and there WON'T BE until after Monday's dues collections.

This action was necessary to enable the Union to PAY ITS BILLS for the coming month, and also to cover the staggering costs of the 4 arbitration cases and the 2 unfair labor practice charges.

WHAT CAUSED THE GENERAL FUND TO BE DEPLETED ? ? ? ?

The CONTINUING INCREASES in the COST OF LIVING has caused the OPERATING COSTS OF THE UNION to go up, just as it has for you and your families. The only difference between the EFFECT ON THE RISING COSTS ON YOU, as compared to your Union, is, every worker received TWO WAGE INCREASES (7% and 4%) while the Union's income stayed the same (dues - $5.00).

THE UNION'S INCOME WOULD HAVE INCREASED IF THE "INS" (MEMBERS) WOULD HAVE REDUCED THE "OUTS" (FREE-RIDERS). THIS WAS NOT DONE.

Aside from the regular amount of free-riders that this Union Membership has tolerated, there has also been an increase in the "IN-AND-OUTERS". (This is the OSTERICH TYPE WORKER who brings his head out of the sand at Contract negotiating time, joins the Union for a month or two, and then becomes another "OUT" by burying his head in the sand for the duration of the Contract.)

The latest FAD at A.B has also increased the "OUTS" for the Union Team. The FAD is to BLAME THE UNION for the transfers, layoffs, and the closing down of the 2nd and 3rd shifts in 310, which resulted from the decline in the COMPANY'S BUSINESS.

WHERE DO WE GO FROM HERE ? ? ? ?

The Executive Board has also ordered the Constitution Committee back into session to "consider diverting some of the 90 cents per member, per month, which is presently going into the STRIKE AND/OR DEFENSE FUND, into the General Fund." THIS MOVE CAN AFFECT THE WELFARE OF EVERY A.B. WORKER ("INS" AND "OUTS") AT THE NEXT CONTRACT NEGOTIATIONS, AND IS ONLY A STOP-GAP MEASURE.

THE PERMANENT SOLUTION CAN ONLY COME WHEN THE UNION MEMBERS MAKE UP THEIR MINDS TO ELIMINATE THE "OUTS". WHY NOT START NOW ? ? ? ?

COMPANY MUST MOVE!

THERE IS NO PICKET LINE IN FRONT OF ALLEN BRADLEY THIS MORNING! THERE IS NO DEMONSTRATION GOING ON IN FRONT OF ALLEN-BRADLEY THIS MORNING! THE ONLY REASON THAT THERE IS NO PICKET LINE OR DEMONSTRATION IS BECAUSE OF THE ACTIONS TAKEN YESTERDAY BY THE TOP OFFICERS OF YOUR LOCAL UNION.

The top officers, along with officials from the District leadership of the UE met with the leadership of the NAACP Youth Council and Father Groppi.

WHAT THE NAACP YOUTH COUNCIL TOLD THE UNION

1. The council has no quarrel with Allen-Bradley workers or their union. They are making no demands that would interfere with the operation of the seniority clause in our contract.

2. They recognize that laid off A-B workers have recall rights. Their basic demand is that the Company agree to hire negro people and that they be the first hired, until they constitute 10% of the work force.

3. If the Company does not agree to this proposal, they are going to launch a militant, long lasting campaign at the gates of Allen-Bradley. The Council leaders made it crystal clear that their members are quite prepared to make heavy sacrifices in such a campaign, including the risks of mass arrests.

4. The Council would like the support of the Union Membership, but it would launch this campaign with or without our support.

WHAT THE UNION TOLD THE NAACP YOUTH COUNCIL

1. The UE was a pioneer in the fight against discrimination by the corporations since it was founded in 1935. Local 1111 has demanded a No Discrimination clause in the Allen-Bradley contract for many years, but has been unable to get it from this Company.

2. A campaign at the Allen-Bradley gates could lead to many problems - both for our membership and for the Civil Rights Movement. As a responsible union leadership, we would like to make one more try at convincing the Company to concede on this issue. In order to make this try, however, we must work through the regular democratic channels of our organization. This would mean discussions with our Executive Board, our Steward Council and approval of our actions by a Membership meeting. We would ask our members to authorize the Union to negotiate a hiring policy commitment by the Company - along the lines of the 10% proposal made by the Youth Council (10% of the Milwaukee area population is black).

3. It would take about a week to set up a membership meeting and to work out such a proposal with the Company, if the Company was willing to agree at all. It was our opinion that it would be easier to discuss the problem with our members and with the Company before there were any picket line confrontations. We asked the Youth Council if they would be willing to delay their campaign for one week in order to give our proposal the best possible chance.

If you were watching TV on Channel 4 last night or read your morning paper, you know that the NAACP Youth Council agreed to delay their campaign until next Tuesday. They also made it quite clear that if results are not forthcoming by that time, their campaign will begin on that day.

(over, please)

SCOTCH THE RUMORS !!!

What is written above represents the only commitment that the Union has made to anyone on Allen-Bradley's hiring policies, seniority, etc. Every plant has its share of misguided souls who spread all kinds of wild stories and deliberate lies. The Union has not, and will not, make any commitments that would tamper with the seniority of anyone working at Allen-Bradley or who is on the seniority list.

ONE THOUSAND JOBS ARE AT STAKE!

Allen-Bradley workers face a very serious situation if the Company continues to refuse to change its hiring policies. The U.S. Government has already threatened to remove all military orders from the plant. (One of the Government arguments is that less than 1% of A-B workers are Negro in a city having a black population of 10%.) If a mass campaign develops at the plant gates, Government action will become even more likely - namely the removal of about 25% of the work in the plant. Since Cutler Hammer, Square D, GE, Westinghouse and other electrical equipment makers aren't in trouble with the government on hiring policies, these companies will be ready, willing and able to snatch up the work that Allen-Bradley loses. Perhaps the Allen-Bradley top brass enjoys fighting with the government, but about one thousand Allen-Bradley workers who will be laid off, will have a different view.

It is time for the Allen-Bradley management to come into the 20th century to obey the law of the land, and to live up to their obligations to their employees and to all the citizens of Milwaukee - both black and white. Other major factories in Milwaukee have recognized that they can no longer discriminate in their hiring policies. It is time for Allen-Bradley to demonstrate the same policy.

DON'T PUSH IT!

Yes, the easiest thing to do is to press the panic button. The results of the slightest push on this button is the immediate release of fear, panic, and the elimination of reasoning. It also starts the SEARCH FOR A SCAPEGOAT.

THERE IS NO REASON FOR ANY ALLEN-BRADLEY WORKER TO HAVE A HAND ON THE "PANIC" BUTTON AT THIS TIME. THE ISSUES WHICH PRESENTLY FACE ALL OF US WERE NOT CREATED BY THE LEAFLET WHICH THE UNION RELEASED YESTERDAY. THOSE ISSUES WERE CREATED BY THE ALLEN-BRADLEY COMPANY.

WHAT ARE THE ISSUES ? ? ?

1. The charges of DISCRIMINATION IN EMPLOYMENT PRACTICES which the FEDERAL GOVERNMENT has made against the Allen-Bradley Company. These charges are against the ALLEN-BRADLEY COMPANY, and NOT THE UNION, OR THE A-B WORKERS. These charges will be heard on Tuesday, August 20, 1968.

2. The actions which the Government could take against the Company if they conclude that the COMPANY IS GUILTY.

3. The effects which those actions could, AND WOULD, have on the ALLEN-BRADLEY WORKERS.

4. The demands which the NAACP Youth Council has made to the ALLEN-BRADLEY COMPANY.

5. The position taken by the Company regarding these demands.

6. WHETHER THE UNION SHOULD SIT BACK AND LET THE COMPANY, THE CIVIL RIGHTS GROUPS, AND THE FEDERAL GOVERNMENT SLUG IT OUT.

7. WHAT EFFECTS A HANDS-OFF POSITION, BY THE UNION, WOULD HAVE ON YOUR JOBS AND YOUR WELFARE.

8. WHAT EFFECTS AN OPEN BATTLE BETWEEN THE CIVIL RIGHTS GROUPS AND THE ALLEN-BRADLEY COMPANY WOULD HAVE ON YOU.

There isn't an Allen-Bradley worker, outside of the Union Executive Board, who has heard a COMPLETE REPORT on the above issues. Therefore, it would be safe to state that the FINAL CONCLUSIONS, which some of you are tossing around, have been reached AFTER YOU HAVE PRESSED THE PANIC BUTTON.

Get the FULL REPORT at the SPECIAL MEETING which will be held this SATURDAY, August 10th, at the RIVERSIDE THEATRE. The meeting will start at 8:00 A.M. THIS IS THE LARGEST HALL WE COULD GET ON SO SHORT A NOTICE, AND WE MUST BE OUT OF THE THEATRE BY 11:45 A.M. Parking is available in the public lots which are near the theatre. All workers in the UE Bargaining Unit may attend this meeting.

QUALITY MOTOR CONTROL

This ad appeared in "THE MILWAUKEE STAR" newspaper, which is a Negro community weekly publication.

We call your attention to the date of the ad (top of page).

Now we call your attention to the fact that on May 23, 1968, the Office Of Federal Contract Compliance, of The U.S. Department Of Labor, notified the A.B. Company that they were in violation of the provisions of the Presidential Executive Order, which bars discrimination in employment by firms who receive work from Federal Government Contracts. The notice stated that the Government proposed to terminate all existing Government work at A.B., and also to bar the Company from elegibility for any future Government work.

The A.B. Company requested a hearing over this matter, and the Government set August 20, 1968 as the hearing date.

After the hearing, if the Government rules that A.B. is guilty of discrimination, ALL GOVERNMENT WORK WILL BE PULLED OUT OF THE PLANT AND NO FURTHER WORK WILL BE AWARDED. (It doesn't take a mental giant to figure out that this will cause a SUBSTANTIAL LAYOFF OF PRESENT WORKERS.)

UNLESS ! ! ! (and we quote from the Federal Government's notice) "the Respondent (A.B.C6mpany) has satisfied the Director (US Dept. of Labor) that it has established and will carry out personnel and employment policies in compliance with provisions of the (Presidents) Executive Order".

Want to know what the Company has done since receipt of the Federal Government's charges to comply with the "UNLESS" provisions spelled out above ?

THEY HAVE RUN AN AD (ABOVE) FOR SEVERAL WEEKS, AND HAVE HIRED TWO OR THREE NEGROES IN THE OFFICE FORCE.

The Union has made some checks with an agent from the U.S. Department of Justice, Community Relations Division, and was informed that the Company actions to date are not enough to satisfy the Federal Government.

This means that UNLESS THE UNION CAN CONVINCE THE COMPANY THAT SUBSTANTIALLY MORE PEOPLE MUST BE HIRED FROM NON-WHITE MINORITY GROUPS, many hundreds of Allen-Bradley workers are destined to be laid off.

WE CANNOT AFFORD TO TURN OUR BACKS AND HIDE FROM THIS PROBLEM. 8/9/68

"In 1960, the City of Milwaukee had a population of 741,324, of whom 62,458 were Negro. The estimated present population of the City of Milwaukee is 776,000, of whom 87,000 are estimated to be Negro. Respondent's present workforce is approximately 6,800, of whom 32 (less than ½ of 1 percent) are Negro. Respondent's plant is located approximately two miles from the nearest Negro residential community. Public transportation is available to the door, and the facility is located near a major bus transfer point."

"Since March 6, 1961, Respondent has violated, and continues to violate its contracts with agencies and departments of the Federal Government by discriminating against employees and applicants for employment because of their race or color, and by failing or refusing to take affirmative action to ensure that persons are recruited, hired and treated during employment without regard to their race or color. These violations include:

(a) Respondent, as its primary source of employees, relies and for many years has relied upon the referral by its employees of their friends and relatives and upon its reputation as a desirable employer. Respondent disseminates and for many years has disseminated information about job opportunities almost entirely through its employees. Since Respondent's workforce is and for many years has been over 99% white, knowledge of new job opportunities is and has been almost entirely limited to the white community, giving the white community a preference to and denying Negro persons equal access to jobs at Respondent's facility;

(b) Respondent gives, and for many years, has given preference to relatives and friends of present employees in the filling of job vacancies, and as over 99 percent of its workforce is and has been drawn from the white community, Respondent thereby engages in a hiring practice which has the effect of discriminating against Negro persons;

(c) Respondent utilizes hiring standards, including pre-employment tests, which have the effect of discriminating against Negro applicants for employment because of their race or color; and

(d) Respondent has failed or has refused to utilize employment sources which primarily serve the Negro community and to take other action to dispel its image in the Negro community as an employer which discriminates against Negro persons on the basis of race and color, which image discourages the referral of Negro applicants to and discourages Negro persons from applying for employment with respondent and thereby denies to them equal employment opportunity with Respondent."

"The Government has made reasonable efforts to secure compliance by the Respondent with the "equal opportunity clause" by methods of conference, conciliation, mediation, and persuasion. These reasonable efforts includea numerous conciliation meetings between Respondent and the Department of Defense since 1964, including a conference on April 4, 1968, in Washington, D. C., attended by Respondent officials and representatives of the Office of Federal Contract Compliance and the Department of Defense. At that time, as in the past, Respondent failed and refused to take adequate steps to elimiante the conditions described in paragraph IV of this Notice."

(b) pursuant to Sections 202 and 209 (a) (6) of Executive Order 11246 and 41 CFR 60-1.27 (b), the Director shall declare the Respondent ineligible for further contracts, subcontracts and extensions of existing contracts or subcontracts until the Respondent has satisfied the Director that it has established and will carry out personnel and employment policies in compliance with the provisions of Executive Order 11246; and

(c) other appropriate action authorized by Section 209 of Executive Order 11246 shall be taken."

The Government procedure in such cases is to ask the Company to come up with proposals that will be "adequate steps" to correct their practices.

The Government has taken the position that the proposals made by A-B are not "adequate steps", and that all government contracts should be withdrawn and no new ones awarded.

"In 1960, the City of Milwaukee had a population of 741,324, of whom 62,458 were Negro. The estimated present population of the City of Milwaukee is 776,000, of whom 87,000 are estimated to be Negro. Respondent's present workforce is approximately 6,800, of whom 32 (less than ½ of 1 percent) are Negro. Respondent's plant is located approximately two miles from the nearest Negro residential community. Public transportation is available to the door, and the facility is located near a major bus transfer point."

"Since March 6, 1961, Respondent has violated, and continues to violate its contracts with agencies and departments of the Federal Government by discriminating against employees and applicants for employment because of their race or color, and by failing or refusing to take affirmative action to ensure that persons are recruited, hired and treated during employment without regard to their race or color. These violations include:

(a) Respondent, as its primary source of employees, relies and for many years has relied upon the referral by its employees of their friends and relatives and upon its reputation as a desirable employer. Respondent disseminates and for many years has disseminated information about job opportunities almost entirely through its employees. Since Respondent's workforce is and for many years has been over 99% white, knowledge of new job opportunities is and has been almost entirely limited to the white community, giving the white community a preference to and denying Negro persons equal access to jobs at Respondent's facility;

(b) Respondent gives, and for many years, has given preference to relatives and friends of present employees in the filling of job vacancies, and as over 99 percent of its workforce is and has been drawn from the white community, Respondent thereby engages in a hiring practice which has the effect of discriminating against Negro persons;

(c) Respondent utilizes hiring standards, including pre-employment tests, which have the effect of discriminating against Negro applicants for employment because of their race or color; and

(d) Respondent has failed or has refused to utilize employment sources which primarily serve the Negro community and to take other action to dispel its image in the Negro community as an employer which discriminates against Negro persons on the basis of race and color, which image discourages the referral of Negro applicants to and discourages Negro persons from applying for employment with respondent and thereby denies to them equal employment opportunity with Respondent."

"The Government has made reasonable efforts to secure compliance by the Respondent with the "equal opportunity clause" by methods of conference, conciliation, mediation, and persuasion. These reasonable efforts included numerous conciliation meetings between Respondent and the Department of Defense since 1964, including a conference on April 4, 1968, in Washington, D. C., attended by Respondent officials and representatives of the Office of Federal Contract Compliance and the Department of Defense. At that time, as in the past, Respondent failed and refused to take adequate steps to elimiante the conditions described in paragraph IV of this Notice."

Dirksen Says Rights Aide Is Harassing Businessmen

cials upstaged him all over town.

First, Senator Dirksen virtually took over today's hearing, questioning witnesses by the hour.

Second, the Pentagon announced it had reached written agreement with one of three Southern textile concerns to insure against discrimination in hiring and promoting Negroes.

And, third, Secretary of Labor George P. Shultz told a National Press Club audience that the Administration was prepared to take "strong action" to bar discrimination in hiring practices by Government contractors, but would emphasize "mediation and persuasion."

The main targets of the Kennedy inquiry are Defense Department contracts with three Southern textile mills accused of discrimination against Negroes, and Transporation Department procedures in bids on Federal highway contracts.

But Senator Kennedy also said he was "very mindful" of reports that the Department of Health, Education and Welfare was under pressure to weaken its school desegregation guidelines.

Democrats clashed with Republicans, Northerners with Southerners at the most politically explosive encounter on Capitol Hill since President Nixon took office Jan. 20.

"You're playing politics," Senator Strom Thurmond, Republican of South Carolina, accused Senator Walter A. Mondale, Democrat of Minnesota.

"There is no more important politics than assuring racial justice," Senator Mondale replied tartly.

Hints at Dismissal

Earlier, Senator Dirksen hinted that he would see to it that Clifford L. Alexander Jr., chairman of the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, would be dismissed "for harassing businessmen."

Mr. Alexander, a Negro and a holdover from the Johnson Administration, had testified that his commission had found that at one textile plant an unwritten rule "required blacks, but not whites, to use paper cups when drinking from a supposedly desegregated water fountain."

Accusing Mr. Alexander of conducting "carnival-like hearings on job discrimination in the motion picture industry recently. Senator Dirksen protested that "businessmen are streaming into Washington every day to complain they've been harassed by your operation."

"Either this punitive harassment is going to stop," the Illinois Republican said, "or somebody is going to lose his job or I'm going to the highest authority in this Government and get somebody fired."

Noting that he had "taken my political skin in my hands" by breaking a filibuster against a civil rights bill in 1964, Senator Dirksen said:

"We did not intend for one minute that these people, these work givers of industry and business, be harassed. Maybe we need some new personnel. Now, that's pretty plain talk."

Obviously angry, Senator Kennedy quickly rose to Mr. Alexander's defense.

"I hope no one has been threatened in here today because he is trying to do the job he is expected to do," Mr. Kennedy said.

"I think those who threaten your job do a great disservice to the American people," he declared. "They'll find they have as much trouble getting rid of you as they would anybody else."

In announcing a written agreement with Burlington Industries, Inc., to insure jobs for Negroes, the Pentagon cut the ground out from one—but not all—of the main targets of the Kennedy hearings.

Last month Deputy Defense Secretary David Packard had awarded $9.4-million in defense contracts to Burlington and two other Southern textile concerns, J. B. Stevens & Co., Inc., and Dan River Mills, Inc.

In doing so, Mr. Packard overruled his own Deputy Assistant Secretary of Defense for Civil Rights, Jack Moskowitz, a Johnson Administration holdover who is leaving the Government in May.

Mr. Moskowitz had recommended that the three textile contracts be withheld on the ground that the three companies had failed to bar discrimination.

Mr. Packard had awarded the contracts after reaching "oral agreement" with the companies that they would take positive steps to end discrimination.

Mr. Moskowitz testified today that Mr. Packard had "been advised" beforehand that such agreements should be in writing.

While written agreement has now been reached with Burlington Industries, the Pentagon said no new final agreement had been reached with the two other textile concerns but that negotiations were still under way.

Under the agreement, Burlington pledged to "develop specific goals and timetables for prompt achievement of full and equal employment opportunity." It also pledged to file periodic reports on recruitment, selection and promotion of Negroes and to rent company houses on a non-discriminatory basis.

Burlington Industries employs 61,000 workers.

Bias Chief Raps Nixon, Resigns

By JOHN CHADWICK

WASHINGTON (AP)—Quitting before he was fired, Clifford L. Alexander Jr. resigned as chief of the government's campaign against job discrimination Wednesday with a blast at the Nixon administration.

Alexander, a 35-year-old Harvard-educated Negro and a Democrat, said the conclusion is inescapable that vigorous efforts to enforce the law on employment discrimination "are not among the goals of this administration."

"It is my sincere hope," Alexander said in a letter to President Nixon, "that you will publicly dispel these ever increasing doubts."

STAND CLEAR

Nixon's press secretary, Ronald L. Ziegler, commented, "The President has, I think, made it very clear the administration intends to enforce the law in this area." He said the record will bear him out and added that "the entire direction and thrust of this administration has been positive" in the field of equal opportunties.

Alexander said his resignation as chairman of the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission will take effect May 1, unless Nixon wants it sooner. He said he intends to fill out the remaining three years of his term on the commission, which was created by the 1964 Civil Rights Act.

Alexander tangled with Sen. Everett M. Dirksen, R-Ill., last month when Dirksen told him during a Senate hearing that "harassment" of private business men must stop "or I am going to the highest authority in this government and get somebody fired."

REPLACED

The White House said the next morning that Alexander would be replaced.

Nixon's choice for chairman is William H. Brown, a Philadelphia Negro who was nominated for membership on the five-member board last year by President Lyndon B. Johnson.

Congress adjourned without acting on Brown's nomination, but Nixon resubmitted it after he took office.

There had been published reports, even before Alexander's encounter with Dirksen, that Nixon would name Brown to the chairmanship.

Alexander said at a news conference announcing his resignation as chairman that Dirksen had threatened to have him fired for "vigorous enforcement" of nondiscrimination in employment.

FANCY VACATIONS prove more popular with employes as time-off lengthens.

There's a strong urge to get far away from it all this year. A Pitney-Bowes official finds "many more" workers of Italian, Polish and Irish descent making trips to their homelands this summer. A secretary at Ogden Corp. in New York plans an excursion by raft down the Colorado. In San Antonio, a travel agent notes a sharp increase in secretaries bound for Europe. At Armco's Middletown, Ohio, plant, at least a dozen workers have already made overseas trips this year.

Vacation-stretching is common. A Midwest auto equipment maker, flooded with requests for extended vacations, routinely grants an extra week without pay. To discourage employes from trying to chisel a few extra days off, Dow Chemical allows them to "borrow" days from next year's vacation. Many West Coast employers wink at workers who straggle in late from vacations, but then dock them pay for the excess days.

Holmes & Son Tours in Dallas reports that 80% of the employe tours it books are now three weeks long compared with two weeks long a few years ago.

BUSY HOSPITALS struggle to hire administrative and clerical help.

"The demand for administrators is the greatest its been in the last 10 years," reports American Medical Personnel, a Chicago employment agency. New York City searches for executives to run four of its 18 public hospitals and for 15 to 20 lower-ranking administrators. Beth Israel Hospital in Boston has twice as many openings for clerical workers as it had two years ago.

Hospitals blame the shortage of administrative help on added paperwork generated by Medicare and state medical insurance programs. To attract workers, many hospitals boost pay sharply. In Boston, administrators' salaries climb to $35,000 a year, up 15% from two years ago. The top pay for medical librarians in New York hits $15,700, compared with $12,700 in 1967. The pay raises for administrative employes help keep medical-care costs spiraling.

Several Pittsburgh-area junior colleges start programs to train hospital accountants and medical librarians and secretaries.

JOBS FOR VETERANS: Federal officials step up efforts to help ex-GIs.

Pentagon planners report that Project Transition, which offers soon-to-be-discharged GIs job-training and counseling, is "on the upbeat." The program is expected to serve about 500,000 men who will shed their uniforms in the next 12 months, 100,000 more than in the past year. The Defense Department has asked Congress to boost the project's annual budget by over $2 million to $18 million.

With Vietnam troop pullouts starting, Transition officials increase job-counseling activities at five military bases on the West Coast, where many returnees are discharged. Fifty major companies, including Ford, Firestone and Howard Johnson, are now conducting job-training courses under the program.

A new White House committee on the Vietnam veteran will closely examine Transition, with a view toward possible expansion.

UNION WAGE GAINS continue their "dizzying climb," the Bureau of National Affairs reports. Its survey of 1,322 contract settlements shows the median wage increase in the first half of 1969 was a record 21.6 cents an hour, up from 16.4 cents a year earlier.

SWEDEN FACES labor shortages as economic activity booms. Industrialists in Gothenburg, home of such big firms as auto-maker Volvo, estimate they need an additional 5,000 to 6,000 workers. Some Swedish companies increase their capital spending in foreign countries where labor is less scarce.

WIVES OF UNIONISTS tackle a broad range of political and do-good activities.

No longer content just to ladle out soup to strikers, women's auxiliaries affiliated with unions organize more voter registration drives and letter-writing campaigns for labor causes. A spokesman for COPE, the AFL-CIO's political arm, credits the Oklahoma auxiliary with playing a key role in defeating a right-to-work proposal last year. In Missouri and other states, union gals mobilize backing for Medicare improvements and "loophole-closing" tax revision.

Yet the 200,000 ladies in the growing auxiliary movement still find time to take on new charitable causes. The Head Start program, which offers poor kids pre-school training, is a favorite of many wives. In St. Louis, gals help organize a drive that nets 6,000 summer jobs for disadvantaged youths. A South Dakota group pays off the mortgage on a school for mentally retarded children.

A continuing chore: Auxiliary members distribute about two-thirds of all "buy union" literature prepared by the AFL-CIO.

FOR IMMEDIATE RELEASE: EEOC Phone: 202/343-5621

William H. Brown III, Chairman of the U. S. Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, today announced the appointment of Clayton Willis as Director of EEOC's Office of Public Affairs.

Mr. Willis comes to the Commission from the Ford Foundation in New York City, where he served as consultant on minority group, journalism, government and law affairs. Immediately prior to that, Mr. Willis covered international and national news as a reporter, editorial writer, and critic for the New York Amsterdam News, the nation's leading black- and Spanish Surnamed American-oriented weekly newspaper.

His previous experience as a member of the New York City press corps included positions as television broadcaster-writer for UPI Newsfilm, United Nations press officer, editorial writer and correspondent for the Hearst Newspapers, and staff writer for Newsweek magazine.

The writer and lecturer was also White House correspondent for Radio Station WAVA in Washington, D. C., and for former World Radio News Network of Houston, Texas. Willis was a general assignment reporter and critic for The Albuquerque Tribune, a Scripps-Howard newspaper. He was on special assignment to the United States Embassies in London, England, and Reyjavik, Iceland. As a free-lance correspondent, he has visited over a hundred countries and has contributed articles to publications around the world.

Born in Washington, D. C., Mr. Willis, 35, received his undergraduate degree from George Washington University and has studied at the Sorbonne in Paris, France, the University of Oslo, Norway, the New York Institute of Finance, the Association of Commodity Exchange Firms, Inc., and the Announcer Training Studios for Radio and Television Broadcasting.

He is a member of the National Press Club, the Overseas Press Club of America, and Sigma Delta Chi, the professional journalism society. Willis lives in New York City and in Greenwich, Connecticut.

EEOC administers Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 which prohibits employment discrimination based on race, color, religion, sex or national origin.

"Even Chance", a 20-minute black-and-white film explaining the activities of the U. S. Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, is now available for public release, EEOC Chairman William H. Brown III announced.

The film describes the experience of a single black man in his personal encounter with job discrimination, and the efforts of the EEOC to identify and to eliminate the discriminatory employment practice.

His story typifies the many thousands of cases brought to the Commission each year by not only black people, but Spanish Americans, Mexican Americans, American Indians, Puerto Ricans, Eskimos, Oriental-Americans, members of religious minority groups, and women as well.

Produced in English, the film is aimed at showing the general public how the EEOC, under Title VII of the 1964 Civil Rights Act, handles complaints of job discrimination based on race, color, religion, sex and national origin; and how the EEOC promotes affirmative action programs with business and labor unions to achieve equal employment opportunity.

Individuals or groups interested in booking the film are asked to write the U. S. Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, Office of Public Affairs, 1800 G Street, N. W., Washington, D. C. 20506.

RELEASE FOR AM NEWSPAPERS, TUESDAY, AUGUST 13, 1968

Phone: 343-5621

Chairman Clifford L. Alexander, Jr., of the U. S. Equal Employment Opportunity Commission today announced that 41 state and local agencies will participate in the Commission's grant program which provides funds for specific affirmative action toward eliminating job discrimination.

Alexander said today: "EEOC's contracts with the state and local agencies are earmarked for a concentrated effort to examine the practices of companies with few or no black or Spanish Surnamed Americans in their workforce and to eliminate employment discrimination on a systematic affirmative basis. This requires utilizing to the greatest extent possible the compliance provisions of Federal, state and local statutes. Emphasis will be placed on using the law to change discriminatory practices and institute new procedures which will endure after the EEOC funds are expended."

State and local agencies will work with EEOC and its 12 Regional Offices to identify major low utilizers of minorities through the use of official reporting forms (EEO-1) and relevant data available in their respective areas. The reporting forms are required annually of employers with 100 or more employees under Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. EEOC administers Title VII which bans employment discrimination based on race, color, religion, sex or national origin.

The 1968 contracts specify that in those states with legal authority to initiate a charge, investigation to identify discrimination and conciliation procedures will follow. If conciliation fails, enforcement proceedings by the state or local agency will follow. In areas without legal enforcement powers, the agencies will conduct compliance reviews and seek institutional changes through technical assistance efforts with emphasis on changing discriminatory recruiting and hiring practices.

In either case, a written finding on whether discrimination exists will be made and if appropriate a draft agreement proposing certain changes will be submitted to the employer by the state or local agency receiving a grant.

The amounts given to each city and state agency vary from $8,500 to $25,000 for a total of $700,000.

FOR IMMEDIATE RELEASE: file - EEOC Phone: 202/343-5621

William H. Brown III, Chairman of the U. S. Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, attributing the current racial unrest in this country to the lack of equal opportunities in employment, announced at a news conference today (Friday) a new policy direction for the EEOC which he believes will make it possible for the anti-job discrimination agency to "respond at a greatly accelerated pace to the legitimate demand of millions of Americans."

The new policy affects the two main tools utilized by the Commission in its efforts to eliminate job discrimination: compliance--the process by which discrimination complaints are investigated and conciliated; and affirmative action--programs designed to effect broad-scale change in discriminatory employment practices and to result in increased hiring and promotion of minority group persons.

In regard to compliance procedures, the new policy is geared toward increasing the effectiveness and efficiency of EEOC's compliance activity, and toward reducing substantially the delay, experienced by both charging parties and respondent companies and unions, between the filing of a complaint and attempted conciliation. Due to improved investigation methods in the Commission's 13 field offices, the backlog of cases awaiting decision by the five-member Commission has grown to almost 4,000 cases. Under the new plan, Brown's goal is the production of 100 to 200 decisions per week, compared to the approximately 25 decisions per week currently being turned out.

Mr. Brown's announced action to speed up the compliance process includes:

1. Reassignment of completed investigation reports to field offices for draft decisions, to be forwarded to the Commission for review and final determination.

2. Reassignment of some headquarters personnel and the addition of approximately 40 law students to aid in decision-writing activity.

3. Requirement that a proposed draft decision accompany all final investigative reports.

4. Restructuring of regular Commission processes to insure a quick review of decisions, followed by prompt conciliation action.

In addition, Brown announced that selected legal staff will be working out of field offices to assist charging parties in initiating and carrying through private party suits in cases where conciliation efforts fail, and that the aid of volunteer legal advisors and civil rights groups will be solicited in such cases.

In affirmative action, an area which has suffered due to preoccupation with backlog problems, Brown, proposed to undertake programs to follow-up efforts made by the EEOC in the past, notably the public hearings in New York City in 1968 and in Los Angeles earlier this year. The nation-wide program will focus on securing white collar jobs for minority group persons in selected industries. Priority will be given to the industries involved in the two hearings, but will also involve, Brown said, other companies which will "afford us the greatest opportunities for results." The program will operate through task forces, under the leadership of Commissioners, working with company presidents and labor union officials to design and implement specific affirmative action plans to increase minority group employment.

Brown noted that there will definitely be further hearings, both public and private, hopefully within the next year; preparations for such hearings, he said, require 12 to 14 months work by staff.

Questioned whether the policy changes are in response to recent criticisms from Congress, Brown replied that the Commission is "responding to people in the communities which need our help so desperately." Pointing out that the disruption of building construction by black workers in Pittsburgh is only a reflection of a problem existing all over the nation, Brown said that "The situation in Pittsburgh is another indication that something must be done and done quickly. Unless people wake up to these problems, we will have very serious confrontations, probably to the point of bloodshed."

Brown emphasized that the EEOC's problems are directly related to its "meager budgets" in each of the past four years and added, "The President has already indicated his support for the entire budgetary requested amount of $15,900,000 to give the Commission greater capacity to deal with employment discrimination." Underscoring that the steps being taken are essential if the EEOC is to be effective, he said "The lack of enforcement powers, inadequate funds or understaffing will no longer be accepted as a reason for permitting blatant violations of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 to continue."

The EEOC is an independent federal government agency which administers Title VII of the 1964 Civil Rights Act. The Act prohibits employment discrimination based on race, color, religion, sex or national origin. Cases are brought to the Commission by not only black people, but Spanish Surnamed Americans, American Indians, Eskimos, Oriental-Americans, members of religious minority groups, and women as well.

As of 25 August 1969, the Commission employed 648 individuals. The breakdown is 366 in the 13 regional offices and 282 in the Washington headquarters. This includes part time employees.

Chairman Brown, 41 years old, was Deputy District Attorney of his native Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, and managing partner of a Philadelphia law firm, where he gave free legal service on civil rights cases. He worked his way up from ghetto poverty by working his way through high school, Temple University and the University of Pennsylvania Law School. During his years in school, he drove a taxi at night, waited on restaurant tables and worked part time in the Post Office.

WILKS CALLS FOR BETTER FEDERAL-STATE
STRATEGY IN ACHIEVING JOB EQUALITY

KIAMESHA LAKE, N.Y. -- Federal-State employment security agencies can improve services to minority groups by playing a key role in a three-pronged strategy to achieve equal employment opportunity.

That is a major point made by John L. Wilks, the new director of the Office of Federal Contract Compliance (OFCC), at the Interstate Conference of Employment Security Agencies here.

The triple strategy cited by Mr. Wilks, a one-time New York longshoreman, includes:

-- Enforcement of Title VII of the 1964 Civil Rights Act on discrimination in employment.

-- Effective administration of the requirement under Executive Order 11246 that Federal contractors take affirmative action to ensure that applicants for employment and employees are recruited, hired and otherwise treated without regard to race, creed, color, sex, or national origin.

-- Assuring that the employment service agencies take affirmative action in providing placement, job training, special counseling and related employment services to disadvantaged members of minority groups and take affirmative action in staffing their own program.

"In my view," Mr. Wilks emphasized, "the Federal-State Employment Security Program can improve its service to the minority communtiy and improve its image among minority groups by providing full cooperation, support and assistance in a three-pronged strategy to achieve equality of opportunity in employment."

(MORE)

He said three Federal agencies -- OFCC, the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, and the Justice Department -- are jointly developing a two-pronged strategy to deal with ending discrimination and implementing affirmative action programs to insure job equality.

This strategy includes the development of nationwide compliance standards and priorities, more effective enforcement capabilities and better coordination of on-going operations.

"To round out this strategy," he said, "I see the urgent need for establishing a vital link between the two key programs and the U.S. Training and Employment Service (USTES) and the affiliated local offices of the State employment services."

Under this linkage, Mr. Wilks said, the USTES and the 2,000 affiliated local offices of the State employment services would play key roles in insuring equal employment opportunity by serving as depositories of vital minority manpower information for the communities they service. They would collect and maintain employer and community profiles to help guarantee equal opportunity.

As Federal compliance officials conduct compliance visits to employers in the communities serviced by the public employment agencies, this information would be available to them.

The information, Mr. Wilks said, would greatly expedite the rate by which the employers achieve compliance with their obligations to provide equal employment opportunity without regard to race, religion, color, sex, and national origin.

Job Equality Pact Signed By Shipbuilder

The Newport News (Va.) Shipbuilding & Drydock Co. and the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission have reached agreement on a desegregation plan. The firm is the country's largest shipbuilder, with 19,000 employes — about 5,000 of them Negroes—and extensive government ship construction contracts.

The agreement will provide new promotion and training programs for Negroes, a review of the skills of all Negro employes to assure them of fair treatment, and outside evaluation of all jobs and pay rates to determine if Negroes are undergoing discrimination.

It was worked out over six days of intensive negotiations during which the Labor and Navy Departments, which had determined the company was not in compliance with the Executive Order dealing with federal contracts, joined EEOC conciliators.

The company sought the conciliation discussions after the commission had found it was violating the employment discrimination provisions of the Civil Rights Act, as 41 Negro employes had claimed in filing formal charges.

Newport News workers are represented by an unaffiliated local union. The local did not participate in working out terms of the agreement between the company and government agencies.

The company agreed to post a non-discrimination policy statement throughout the shipyard and to attach a copy to each paycheck within 30 days; to read the policy statement to all supervisors, to advise employes in group meetings that violators will be disciplined, and to report to the EEOC the moves it has made to comply with the agreement 90 days after the signing and each quarter for the following two years.

Edelsberg Is Appointed Director of Job Bias Unit

Emp – EEOC

Herman Edelsberg, director of the Washington office of the B'nai B'rith Anti-Defamation League and a veteran of the fight for civil rights, has been named executive director of the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, Chairman Franklin D. Roosevelt, Jr., announced.

At the same time Roosevelt made public the appointment of Ben Segal as director of liaison with state and local bodies. Segal formerly was education and international affairs director of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers and is a member of the District of Columbia Advisory Committee to the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights.

Edelsberg succeeds N. Thompson Powers, who has been acting director on loan from the Labor Dept. since the EEOC was set up in July. Powers is leaving to head a labor-management project in Brazil sponsored by the Labor Dept. and the Agency for Intl. Development.

Edelsberg worked closely with the congressional majority which won enactment of the Civil Rights Acts of 1957 and 1960. From 1956 to 1960, he was chairman of the Civil Liberties Clearing House, composed of some threescore national labor, church, civic and Negro groups interested in civil rights.

Between 1941 and 1945 Edelsberg, a lawyer, held posts with the Foreign Economic Administration, the Board of Economic Warfare and the Office of Price Administration. From 1937 until he entered government service he was general counsel for the Gas, Coke & Chemical division of the Mine Workers.

MINORITY EMPLOYMENT DATA AVAILABLE FROM THE EQUAL EMPLOYMENT OPPORTUNITY COMMISSION

The Equal Employment Opportunity Commission has minority employment data available in the Office of Research for the years 1966, 1967 and 1968. These data have been compiled from three reporting forms: Employer Information Report (EEO-1), Apprenticeship Information Report (EEO-2) and Local Union Equal Employment Opportunity Report (EEO-3).

Filing of the EEO-1 Report is required of all employers covered by Title VII of the 1964 Civil Rights Act with 100 or more employees and government contractors, subject to Executive Order 11246, with 50 or more employees. The data may be subdivided according to the following attributes: race or ethnic group; sex; occupation; industry, company, establishment; national, state, SMSA, county, or certain cities; and, government compliance agency (for federal contractors). The actual source documents have been stored on microfilm for each year. The processed data have been recorded on magnetic tape for 1966 and 1967 to date and are subject to manipulation by any of the attributes described above. Computer printouts of aggregate data by area and industries for all occupations are also available. Most of the 1966 EEO-1 data will be released in a report entitled Job Patterns For Minorities and Women in Private Industry.

EEO-2 Apprenticeship Information Report -- is required to be filed by joint labor-management apprenticeship committees which have all of the following characteristics: (1) five or more apprentices in the entire program; (2) at least one employer sponsor with 50 or more employees (changed to 25 or more employees in 1968); and (3) at least one union sponsor who operates a hiring hall or has 50 or more members (changed to 25 or more members in 1968).

Printouts of the 1967 EEO-2 data will be available by December 1968. The tabulations will show apprenticeship information by State, SMSA, trade or craft, racial or ethnic groups, and year of apprenticeship.

Local Union Equal Employment Opportunity Report EEO-3 is required to be filed by all local unions, covered by Title VII which have 100 or more members. Data for 1967 on union membership and job referrals by ethnic groups will be available in early 1969. These materials will include only those unions which have hiring halls or other referral arrangements with employers.

For further information on the availability of EEOC data contact Dr. Phyllis A. Wallace, Office of Research, Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, 1800 G Street, N.W., Washington, D. C. 20506.

Toward a New Federal Equal Employment Opportunity Program*

By John Feild

Twenty-five years ago the Federal Government embarked upon its first systematic effort to eliminate racial discrimination in private employment. President Roosevelt's historic Executive Order Number 8802, applicable to holders of government war contracts, issued June 21, 1941, was to be followed by a sequence of similar orders issued by each president that has succeeded him. In the intervening years, the legislatures of 31 states and over 100 cities were to crystalize governmental policy within their jurisdictions in an increasingly determined effort to achieve equality of opportunity in employment for all citizens regardless of race, creed, or national origin. Congress, in July of 1964, broadened the Federal interest in equal employment opportunity from just those employers holding government contracts to all employers in interstate commerce with 25 or more employees (a similar numerical limit was set on unions and sex WAS added to the non-discrimination coverage).

* Prepared for the third Notre Dame Conference on Civil Rights, Notre Dame Law School, February 17-20, 1966.

Regretably, the present status of this combined Federal, State and Local effort cannot be said to have been reached by any steady or rational accumulation of experience. Perhaps this would have been too much to expect since the conditions under which multiple government regulators have tried to apply their rules have not remained static--nor were they predictable.

President Roosevelt, for example, had the advantages of war-time labor shortages and appeals to patriotic national unity with which to launch a new national effort to reverse what had been, after all, an increasingly segregationist trend for 60 years. He also had the advantage of a relatively young, dynamic and expanding industrial union movement dedicated to organization on a plant-wide and an industry-wide basis which was inclusive not exclusive.

Thus, the massive movement of Negroes from the rural South, which began in the Roosevelt years, was to bring poorly educated, unemployed Negroes into blue collar industrial jobs on an unprecedented scale reducing Negro unemployment to record lows. Two and a half decades later, under President Kennedy, we were to find many of these same Negroes once again in the high unemployment categories of an economy that had shifted toward a white collar, automation-inspired technology.

President Truman, on the other hand, did not have available to him the patriotic impetus with which his predecessor had obtained the acquiesence of the Southern-Republican coalition in the Congress. The 1948 Russell Amendment was to establish a Congressional restraint on the funds and staffing of the Federal effort that was to continue through the Eisenhower Administration into the operations of the new 1961 President's Committee on Equal Employment Opportunity headed by then Vice President Lyndon Johnson. Nor was the economy at the end of the Forties continuing to absorb the steady influx of rural migrants with quite the same ease: unemployment jumped from a little over a million in 1945 to almost four million by 1949.

With the exception of the Korean War industrial spurt, the economy during the Eisenhower Fifties, to further complicate things, had fallen into a state of stagnation. The Federal formula for action to enlarge job opportunities for minorities during these years was essentially non-regulatory. Whereas President Truman's response to his impasse with Congress was to mount a national opinion building campaign favorable to further Federal action--the President's Committee on Civil Rights Report, "To Secure These Rights," his determined campaign for re-election, and his advocacy of Federal FEPC legislation were typical--President Eisenhower characteristically deferred to state and local action. The Nixon Committee on Government Contracts remained essentially complaint oriented although it made some determined, if not noticeably successful, efforts to encourage voluntary compliance.

The Kennedy Administration began in 1961 with just about as many people unemployed--five and a half million--as were unemployed when President Roosevelt issued his famous Executive Order 20 years earlier. The difference was that our population had increased by 30 million and the labor force by about 15 million. This had cut the unemployment rate from 9.9 to 6.8. Negro unemployment, however, was roughly double the white rate as 1961 began--as it had been since 1954. There were approximately 800,000 Negroes unemployed. The economy was, however, about to begin an unprecedent period of sustained growth (it is now in its sixty-first month) which would result in the first significant reversal in the decline of blue collar jobs that had begun in 1947. The overall impact of the Kennedy economic and fiscal policies (largely continued by the Johnson Administration) on Negro unemployment has been to reduce total unemployment to the "interim goal" of 4% (3.3 million) and to reduce the Negro unemployment rate to 7% (500,000)--the first time it has dropped below the "double" rate since the Korean War.

The Kennedy posture on Federal civil rights employment policy was committed from the outset to enforcement of non-discrimination regulations covering government contractors. It was committed to initiating compliance action as well as acting upon complaints. Unfortunately, it had inherited an essentially restrictive Congressional attitude toward appropriation of the funds for staff which were necessary for any meaningful enforcement program. The officers of the President's Committee on Equal Employment Opportunity chose not to challenge this so-called Russell Amendment policy by asking for a direct apprpriation as had been done by both Roosevelt and Truman. During the entire time that the then Vice-President Johnson served as Chairman of the Committee its official budget remained exactly at the level established under Vice President Nixon. In spite of this apparent financial obstacle, however, the Kennedy Administration did gradually evolve a means for the development of a greatly expanded enforcement capability within the contracting agencies and did undertake both to place contractors on a "black list" forbidding them to receive further contracts until they met compliance standards and to withhold contracts until bidders brought themselves into compliance with the "affirmative action" provisions of the Executive Order.

By the time President Johnson assumed office, there were nearly three times as many full time contract compliance officers working within the regular agency structure of the Federal government as were assigned in the peak World War II years. The number of complaints being processed had increased seven fold from the Eisenhower period and the corrective action rate on complaints had increased from 20 per cent to 70 per cent. Pattern centered compliance reviews were initiated by appropriate contracting agencies on an industry, area or corporate basis, resulting in far reaching changes in both employer and union practices. Finally, the first comprehensive, compliance reporting system covering 20 million workers (including the construction industry, public utilities and the insurance industry, none of which had been effectively covered in any previous Federal effort) was in operation and was providing the first meaningful basis for evaluating the impact of the Federal government's regulatory effort.

While the Kennedy Administration was responsible for the re-establishment of an affirmative Federal effort to expand job opportunities for minorities through the use of its considerable Defense, Space, Atomic Energy and general government expenditures, it did not ask the Congress to pass a Fair Employment Practices Bill. Nor did the Johnson Administration which succeeded it. It remained for the House Judiciary Committee, upon the prompting of the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights, to formulate what was to become Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964.

There are few better examples of mankind's obstinate refusal to learn by his experience than the approach taken to the critical social problem of employment discrimination by Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. Not only was the excellent analysis of the 1963 Notre Dame Conference on Civil Rights brushed aside, but it embodied all of the worst features of the New York State FEPC model which was so thoroughly and expertly evaluated a year later at the University of Buffalo School of Law at a National Conference on The Role of State and Local Government sponsored by the Halpern Fund. It is hard to believe that this Title as written was merely the product of legislative compromise. Better initial drafts had already been approved by the House Committee on Education and Labor (Roosevelt Bill, H.R. 405) and by the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare (The Humphrey Bill, S.1937). In my judgment, Title VII stands as testimony to an unmistakeable, if unfortunate, failure of leadership on the part of the Executive to present any evaluation of its twenty years of administrative experience in attempting to deal with the national problem of employment discrimination. The pathetic fact is that the hearings of neither of the above mentioned Committees nor of The House Judiciary Committee contain any constructive legislative recommendations of either the Kennedy or the Johnson Administrations concerning employment discrimination. One would get the impression that neither they nor their predecessors had ever tried any ways of meeting what has been since the days of Lincoln an obvious national problem.

Given Title VII as an Act of Congress, the Johnson Administration set about early in 1965 under the auspices of the President's Council on Equal Opportunity to find an effective way to coordinate what had become many diverse employment, civil rights and manpower activities of the Federal establishment. These studies culminated in Executive Order 11246, which abolished the President's Committee on Equal Employment Opportunity and transferred its contract compliance functions to the Department of Labor and its government employment surveillance functions back to the Civil Service Commission (from whence they had been taken by the Eisenhower Executive Order of 1953). The Equal Employment Opportunity Commission was left a free hand to function under the original mandate given to it by Congress.

The Equal Employment Opportunity Commission itself, however, has developed some rather specific notions about its mandate and has developed a series of legislative recommendations--none of which has received the approval of the Administration as of this writing. (See Appendix I)

Meanwhile, the Congress continues to pursue an active interest in employment discrimination and equal opportunity. Shortly after the passage of the 1964 Civil Rights Act, the Congress approved the Economic Opportunity Act of 1964. Earlier it had approved (in 1961, amended in 1963 and 1964) the Manpower Development and Training Act which gave specific recognition to the special "structural unemployment" problems being experienced by 1) youth, 2) non-whites, 3) older workers, and 4) workers being displaced by technological change. Congress had also quadruppled funds for vocational education in a drastic attempt to make this important piece of the vocational development system of the nation more modern and more in keeping with the present days skills needs of industry and commerce.

In addition, Congress has passed other related measures that greatly strengthen the capacity of local communities to provide disadvantaged persons with greater opportunities for employability. The Social Security Act has been amended to provide funds for welfare recipients to obtain training and job placement. The Elementary and Secondary Education Act provides 1.3 billion dollars focussed primarily on slum schools and remedial programs. The Economic Development and Public Works Act provides new tools for depressed areas. Liberalized loan provisions for small business and new concepts of technical assistance have directed, for the first time, specific effort at the enlargement of Negro participation in business.

The center of these efforts is the new locally based community action coordinating agency which currently receives 90% of its funds from the Federal government under the Economic Opportunity Act. There are currently nearly 400 funded communities and there will be 900 by the end of Fiscal '67. Each of the agencies is developing a comprehensive manpower program that has enormous potential for the qualitative improvement of the most disadvantaged portion of the minority labor force. The Fiscal '67 budget calls for an appropriation of $900 million.

The combined impact of these programs on greatly accelerated equal employment opportunity effort may be seen in some of the statistics:

Projected?

1966 - 67	Enrollees
Work study allowances for college students	210,000
Education Opportunity Grants for college students	220,000
Neighborhood Youth Corps	165,000
Job Corps	45,000
Work Experience (welfare recipient trainees)	105,000
Adult Basic Education (literacy)	75,000
MDTA	250,000

Of great importance for equal employment opportunity efforts is the new degree of organization and focus which the new Manpower Administration in the Department of Labor is giving to improved manpower utilization practices. Going beyond the training efforts already described, the first major overhall of the Federal-state employment service system since it was established in 1935 is about to be undertaken. The Report of the Employment Service Task Force has set a new direction for this vital link that will bring new flexibility and new capability for testing, counselling, job placement and job development services. Innovations such as the youth opportunity centers and the high school services and placement programs will be expanded. There will be 200 centers in operation by the end of the year. It is expected that some 50,000 high school dropouts and 600,000 high school seniors will be directly serviced through these programs this year. Overall out-reach will be greatly expanded especially involving minority groups and other disadvantaged workers.

With regard specifically to current anti-discrimination programs at the State and local level, there has been a steady improvement in the capability of the fair employment agencies:

they have been strengthening their powers and improving their procedures, they have been enlarging their jurisdications and, equally important, they have been enlarging their budgets and their staffs. At the city-county agency level, for example, the combined appropriations of the 70 professionally staffed agencies increased by 40% last year and now totals nearly four million dollars. State agency appropriations are comparable. Another illustration of this trend is noticeable in the fact that most state FEPC's now have the authority to initiate complaints giving a greater emphasis to industry-wide and area enforcement drives.

In light of this trend, the time is clearly at hand for a national effort to consolidate and strengthen further the local and state apparatus, as well as the Federal machinery. The impact of Federal financial support for state and local FEPC's (under good high standards), which can be linked to Federal aid or a revitalized national employment service system, for the broad range of manpower development and training programs and for the establishment of local community action coordinating agencies could bring a decisive advance.

Congress is currently considering three alternative measures:

1) H. R. 10065 (the Hawkins Bill) which has been approved by the House Education and Labor Committee and is now on the House Calendar. This measure has the support of the EEOC but has not been endorsed by the Administration. It would amend Title VII of the 1964 Civil Rights Act as follows:

   a) extend coverage to employers and unions of eight employees or members.

   b) provides new investigative powers.

   c) authorizes the EEOC to issue cease and desist orders.

   d) directs the EEOC to enter into agreements with state and local agencies to carry out the purposes of the Act where they have the power.

e) prescribes that the Commission undertake a survey of apprenticeship programs.

2) S. 2134 (the Javits Bill) which would amend Title VII of the 1964 Civil Rights Act as follows:

a) extend coverage to employees and unions of eight.

b) extend coverage to employees of state and local government.

c) authorize the EEOC to issue cease and desist orders.

d) authorize the EEOC to use investigative procedures and powers of the Federal Trade Commission.

e) provide for a study of apprenticeship.

3) S. 2923 (the Douglas Bill) which amends Title VII of the Civil Rights Act to include coverage of state and local government employees (it assumes the other amendments contained in the Hawkins Bill).

The essential limitation of all of these measures is their continued reliance on an enforced process that is carried out by an independent Commission with limited capacity to monitor the huge employment structure that exists in this country. It is estimated, for example, that there are some 300,000 establishments that would be covered. Some affirmative review process must be devised which would go beyond the almost miniscule complaint based impact. The EEOC has reported that it received 2706 complaints between July 2 and December 2, 1965, and has processed 296 in that period finding cause in 127 complaints involving 41 respondents. By way of contrast, in the same period, the Department of Labor's Wage and Hour Division visited and reviewed 30,000 establishments and undertook a scientific sample inspection survey of an additional 7,000 establishments to check the general level of compliance. The Air Force contract compliance program, to take another illustration, reviews about 400 establishments every six months.

Secondly, while the Hawkins Bill does attempt to strengthen Federal-State and local cooperation and while the EEOC has requested $900,000 next year for dispersal to state and local agencies, there is no clear statement of the functions expected of state and local agencies beyond the same type of powers they now have or procedures they are now following. From my point of view this is not enough.

Lastly, none of these measures makes any attempt to link the enforcement effort to the manpower development program and the other available employment facilities that are currently expanding at both the Federal and local level. If the concept of "affirmative action" is to be given any extensive application some connection must be established among these programs. If the U.S.E.S. carries out its operations through 2300 local offices, for example, this constitutes a resource that can be made administratively responsive to the equal employment opportunity effort if effective mandates and bureaucratic relationships can be established. If the Bureau of Labor Standards can devise special programs for women and the handicapped, it should be possible for them to assist in anti-discrimination efforts.

Alternative Federal Policy Directions

A. Enlarge the Federal commitment to and pressure for equal employment opportunity primarily by means of a regulatory-enforcement thrust. This could be done by strengthening the present EEOC: extending its coverage to employers and unions of eight workers or members, giving it power to initiate complaints and to issue cease and desist orders and authorizing investigative powers similar to those of the Federal Trade Commission. This would establish EEOC as an essentially regulatory agency with semi-judicial administrative powers. It assumes a sizeable expansion in the bureaucratic out-reach of the Commission to achieve the needed coverage. It also assumes a coordinated working arrangement with the Labor Department's Contract Compliance Program.

B. Strengthen the Federal Regulatory-enforcement posture as outlined above and at the same time implement this by strengthening State and Local regulatory capability: This could be done by strengthening the EEOC as in A above and adding standard setting provisions for state and local agencies to assist in carrying out EEOC policies. Provision should be made for financial support to state and local agencies and for delegation of primary jurisdiction when Federal standards are met. This could produce an expanded regulatory-enforcement impact with limited Federal bureaucratic involvement.

C. Greatly expand the operational concept of a Federal EEO policy that would tie training and manpower development programs to comprehensive anti-discrimination efforts: The approach embodied in the 1964 Humphrey Bill, S.1937, could be revised along the lines indicated below. This would give the Manpower Administrator in the Department of Labor the power to regulate employers, unions and personnel agencies with respect to equal opportunity. He would have authority to issue cease and desist orders after findings are reviewed by a Hearing Examiner and upon recommendation by him to the Manpower Administrator. At the same time it would convert the Commission to the status of an independent Review Board to protect respondents rights against arbitrary action by the Administrator.

A reworked S.1937 should:

(1) Provide for an Assistant Manpower Administrator for Equal Employment Opportunity to direct the Contract Compliance Program and to direct all other compliance aspects of the law:

(2) Spell out the non-discrimination requirements which would be evaluated by the Bureau of Labor Standards as part of its continuing inspection processes;

(3) Spell out procedures for the mandatory listing of job vacancies with the U.S.E.S. by all employers engaged in interstate commerce with more than 100 employees (or at least all government contractors); and

(4) Establish a special "Equal Opportunity Manpower Development Fund" ($25 million) available to the Manpower Administrator to initiate special training, motivation and preparation projects that would specifically support equal opportunity.

(5) Provision could also be made for utilizing State and local EEO agencies which meet Federal standards and for making grants to them to conduct investigations and carry out the manpower development and utilization programs of the Department of Labor as established by the Congress in this type of law. ($25 million) The existing Contract Compliance Program would be made a unit within this overall plan.

(6) Provision should be made for the establishment of a permanent Conference of State and Local EEO agencies for purposes of maintaining a coordinated and advisory relationship between the Manpower Administration and these grant receiving agencies. Funds for the Conference should be provided on the basis of a 50% Federal share.

(7) Individual complaints filed with the Manpower Administrator would be referred either to appropriate State or Local agencies for action or would be processed by the Assistant Administrator for Equal Employment Opportunity. Should either a complainant or any employer, labor union or employment agency believe they have not had satisfactory action by the Manpower Administrator they could appeal his orders to the independent five member Commission for such review, amendment or further action as they may direct.

D. Maintain the EEOC as an independent regulatory agency but link it to the various manpower development and service functions of other Federal, State and local agencies by giving it certain referral, receiving and funding powers, while at the same time requiring or encouraging other Federal, State and local agencies to undertake new responsibilities in their own right: This could be accomplished by:

(1) requiring the Department of Labor through its Bureau of Labor Standards, its Bureau of Apprenticeship and Training and its Bureau of Employment Security to certify to the EEOC any instance where an employer, employment agency or union, after due notice, fails to meet appropriate nondiscrimination standards established by the Department of Labor.

(2) requiring all employers in interstate commerce with 100 or more employers (or at least all government contractors) to list job vacancies with the U.S.E.S. (or state affiliate).

(3) authorizing EEOC to give certificates of preference to the Department of Labor, the Office of Education, and OEO for training projects connected with EEO efforts developed by employers or unions in cooperation with State or local EEOC's, CAP's or other manpower or educational agencies.

(4) authorize EEOC to allocate funds from a special $25 million "Equal Opportunity Manpower Development Fund" for training motivation and preparation projects designed at EEOC's request and approved by the Department of Labor, the Office of Education (HEW) or the OEO in connection with EEO efforts.

(5) authorize the EEOC to make 90%-10% grants from a $25 million "EEO Affirmative Action Fund" to state and local EEO agencies which meet certain standards and undertake programs consistent with the Federal EEO interest.

and its locals were not motivated by any consideration of race, color, or creed, but objected solely to working with people who aren't in AFL-CIO.

The Department also charges that four of the locals have refused to recruit and accept Negroes on the same basis as whites, and have failed to accord their Negro members the same advantages as their white members.

In one count, the Department asks for preliminary and permanent injunctions barring unlawful discrimination by the Council and four locals against any member or prospective member. In a second count, the court is asked to enjoin any action by the Council and five locals to frustrate the non-discrimination clause in Hoel-Steffen Corp.'s federal contract for construction of the facilities.

Successful Conciliation

A charge of job discrimination against Kaiser Aluminum Company has been successfully conciliated, according to EEOC Chairman Franklin D. Roosevelt, Jr. The complaint was one involving the operation of the seniority system at the company's plant in Baton Rouge, La.

The settlement was worked out with representatives of the company, the Aluminum Workers International, and the local union.

Details of the agreement are:

▶ Plantwide seniority will apply in promotions from utility man into operating departments, and for layoffs and recalls. This will allow senior Negro employees who have been unable to advance in the past to move into the higher paying jobs in the operating departments.

▶ Within a department, departmental seniority will apply.

▶ The principle of promotion from within is established. The company will look for qualified employees in the laborer classification before hiring from outside, and will reevaluate job entrance requirements.

State Legislation

Kentucky is the first Southern state to enact an FEP law "to provide for execution within the State of the Policies embodied in the Federal Civil Rights Act of 1964." Although modeled on the federal law, Kentucky's statute omits sex as a forbidden basis for discrimination. The law becomes effective July 1, 1966.

Features of the new law are:

▶ Coverage of employers of eight or more employees.

▶ Creation of a Commission on Human Rights with power to issue cease and desist orders.

▶ Provision for judicial review of Commission orders.

▶ Authorization for cities and counties to adopt FEP ordinances and regulations and to establish local FEP commissions.

(Full text of the statute appears at p. 451:451.)

Pennsylvania adopts legislation to extend coverage of its FEP law to employees of six or more persons, instead of the present 12, effective March 25. In addition, the Pennsylvania Human Relations Commission will be empowered to seek enforcement of an order in the court of common pleas of the county in which the hearing was held, as well as in the Court of Common Pleas of Dauphin County.

A & P Case

The first employment discrimination lawsuit filed under Title VII may never go to trial. EEOC Chairman

Franklin D. Roosevelt, Jr., reports that agreements being worked out with the Atlantic & Pacific Tea Co. may result in settlement of the suit filed against the company in a North Carolina federal district court.

The action was filed against A & P on behalf of Annie Brinkley, who charged she was denied a job because of her race. A & P and the attorney for Mrs. Brinkley have agreed to a 90-day postponement to iron out details of an agreement.

Roosevelt indicated that the agreement will include these points:

► Making it easier for all persons to secure employment applications.

► Establishment of a permanent means of two-way communications between the Negro community in North Carolina and the company.

Under this arrangement, minority group members would tell the company of complaints of discrimination and try to adjust them before going to EEOC.

Sex Discrimination

Ten former female employees of P. Lorillard Tobacco Company file suit in a federal district court—at the suggestion of EEOC—claiming that the firm violated the sex provisions of the Civil Rights Act. It is believed to be the first suit of its kind ever filed in Kentucky. It is filed on behalf of the 10 laid-off employees and "all other female employees of P. Lorillard Company."

The former employees, laid off last November, allege that the company hired male employees when female employees with seniority were still on layoff; laid off female employees without good and sufficient reason when they were ready, willing, and able to hold jobs held by male employees with less seniority; and refused to allow women to take or be placed on any job formerly held by male employees.

Originally, the charges were made in a letter written to EEOC by one of the laid-off women. Acting for herself and the others, she asked EEOC to investigate.

In early January, EEOC advised the women by letter that it found "reasonable grounds" to believe the company had violated the Act, and further stated that the Commission was unsuccessful in getting the company to comply with the law. EEOC also advised them that if they were unable to persuade the company to change its policy, they could file suit in federal court.

Meanwhile, a recommended finding that the Miller Brewing Co. unlawfully discriminated against women employees by paying them less than men and restricting them to the first shift is made by a Wisconsin Industrial Commission trial examiner. His decision is subject to review by the Commision and is the first complaint of sex discrimination brought to trial in the state.

The trial examiner also found that Local 9 of the United Brewery Workers illegally discriminated by restricting women employees to the first shift. But he recommends dismissal of a charge that the union participated in the wage discrimination "in view of the union's valid attempt to accomplish equal wages for both male and female employees."

Graham on Sex Discrimination

Referring to the sex discrimination provision of Title VII, EEOC Commissioner Richard A. Graham says it isn't "a fluke" as many employers believe, and that the Commission is serious about enforcing it.

The U. S. Equal Employment Opportunity Commission today announced publication of its pamphlet on discrimination because of sex. "Towards Job Equality For Women" is available upon request from the EEOC, 1800 G Street, N.W., Washington, D.C. 20506.

The report is a summary of the employment rights of women, and the important provisions of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 that relate to discrimination based on sex by employers, unions and employment agencies.

After the pamphlet went to press, the Commission voted to amend its Guidelines on Discrimination because of Sex dealing with State protective legislation. As amended, the Guidelines provide that state legislation which restricts the occupations women may hold, the hours they may work, and the weights they may lift, do not justify limiting work opportunities for women. The amendement was enacted to reflect Decisions of the Commission under its prior Guideline.

The EEOC is an independent Federal Agency employing about 589 persons. It administers Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 which prohibits employment discrimination based on race, color, religion, sex or national origin.

EEOC REVEALS STATISTICS ON MINORITY MEMBERSHIP IN UNIONS

Preliminary results of a nationwide survey of minority membership in local unions with hiring halls or other referral arrangements were released today by Chairman William H. Brown III, of the U. S. Equal Employment Opportunity Commission.

"This is a unique survey", Brown declared. "It presents, for the first time, hard statistics on minority membership in labor unions. The unions in question are the so-called *'Referral Unions' which, in one way or another serve as a gateway to employment in the trades and crafts within their jurisdictions. The extent to which minority group people have gained membership in such unions is a practical measure of the degree of equal employment opportunity within those jurisdictions."

Commenting on the survey results, Brown said: "We find generally the membership statistics for those international unions with the highest pay levels show the lowest levels of minority group participation. That is certainly true of the building trades. However, it is also true of unions in other industries as well. In fact, as our employer surveys have shown, the one pervasive pattern in all of American industry is the inverse relationship between pay and skill levels and minority group employment."

The survey, based on 1967 reports received from some 3,700 local unions with over two million members in referral bargaining units, revealed an aggregate black membership of just under ten percent of the total. Spanish Surnamed Americans accounted for

*A Referral Union is a local union which itself, or through an agent, (a) operates a hiring hall or hiring office, or (b) has an arrangement under which one or more employers are required to hire or consider for employment persons referred by the union or any agent of the union, or (c) has 10 percent or more of its members employed by employers which customarily and regularly look to the union, or any agent of the union, for employees to be hired on a casual or temporary basis, for a specified period of time or for the duration of a specified job.

an additional six percent. Also, one percent were Orientals, and one-half of one percent were American Indians.

Unions in the construction industry with close to 1.3 million members had about five-eights of total reported referral-union membership. There were 106,000 Negroes in those unions, or 8.4 percent of the total, and 56,000 Spanish-Surnamed Americans with 4.5 percent of all members. Both rates were lower than the nationwide levels for all referral unions.

Black membership in the building trades ranged from 30.5 percent in the case of Laborers to 0.2 percent for Plumbers and Sheetmetal Workers, respectively. The Laborers, with 81,000 had 3 out of 4 of all black members in the building trades. Other unions with relatively high black membership were the Bricklayers (9.6 percent), Plasterers (14.0 percent), and Roofers (13.5 percent). In addition to the Plumbers and Sheetmetal Workers, unions with very low Negro membership included the Electrical Workers (0.6 percent), Elevator Constructors (0.4 percent), and Asbestos Workers (0.9 percent). These 5 unions together reported only 1,421 Negroes out of close to 330,000 members.

Spanish Surnamed American members in the building trades ranged from 16.0 percent for Marble Polishers to 1.2 percent for Asbestos Workers. Other unions with substantial Spanish Surnamed American membership were Laborers (9.8 percent), Plasterers (12.6 percent, and Painters (6.7 percent). Unions, other than the Asbestos Workers, with relatively low Spanish Surnamed American membership included Electrical Workers (1.8 percent), Elevator Constructors (1.3 percent), Operating Engineers (1.4 percent), and Plumbers (1.4 percent).

Chairman Brown noted that membership figures in other than construction industries similarly show wide differences in the numbers and percentages of minority representation. The highest figures were found in two low-earnings service industry trades, Building Service Employees (28.4 percent), and Hotel and Restaurant employees (12.9 percent). Together with the Teamsters (9.6 percent), these unions accounted for half the black membership in the non-construction industries. Some of the unions with small black representation were Lithographers and Photengravers (1.3 percent), Stage and Motion Picture Operators (2.9 percent), Barbers (0.9 percent), and Patternmakers (0.1 percent). A similar pattern is indicated for Spanish Surnamed Americans among the unions other than the building trades.

In further comment on the sharp differences shown by the survey between different types of unions, Chairman Brown commented: "I do not wish to take any credit away from the Laborers Union. Their members get good pay, even if it is less than the pay of the skilled crafts. However, some of the unions representing those crafts which are most highly paid have reported only a handful of minority members throughout the nation. This is an unfortunate fact, clearly revealed for the first time by the Commission's statistics. I hope this information will serve to reinforce the efforts of all persons within the union movement who have been striving to better the performance of unions in order to make equal employment opportunity a reality."

Brown concluded that "it is most likely that these minority membership figures of two years ago are generally representative of the situation existing today. Even the most optimistic expectations for the Apprenticeship Outreach programs and other attempts to enroll minorities in apprenticeship programs only affect a small proportion of referral union membership. And it has been commonly accepted that the majority of craft union journeymen are not products of the apprenticeship system. Therefore, I was heartened to read that the Executive Council of the AFL-CIO's Building and Construction Trades Department has made the 'flat and unqualified recommendation to local unions throughout the United States' that they invite applications from and accept into membership all qualified minority jouneymen and that local unions and local councils 'vigorously pursue' training programs to upgrade minority workers who are beyond apprenticeable age. I would further recommend to local unions and councils that they invite applications for membership and training in a clear and unequivocal manner which will not be misunderstood, and that they develop aggressive programs to carry their message to minority communities everywhere. I should hope that a survey conducted a year from today would tell a better story than the one we have described."

The 1967 survey was the first annual report to the Commission by local unions on a report form, entitled Local Union Equal Employment Opportunity Report EEO-3. Statistics from the 1968 survey are expected by the end of this year.

STATE AND LOCAL AGENCIES PARTICIPATING IN EEOC GRANT PROGRAM

In accord with his Commission's objective of promoting specific affirmative action to eliminate job discrimination, Chairman William H. Brown III of the U. S. Equal Employment Opportunity Commission announced that the EEOC will once again provide grants to anti-discrimination agencies on the state and local level.

The EEOC this year has entered into contractual agreements with 40 such agencies for a total of $700,000. These contracts will help underwrite a program by the agencies to explore ways in which job discrimination may be eliminated on a systematic, affirmative basis. The goal of the program is to wipe out "institutionalized discrimination," rather than simply to place minorities within the system on an ad hoc basis. "Institutionalized discrimination" is the term for employment practices which exclude or have the effect of excluding minority group individuals because of their minority group status.

"The idea," Brown said, "is to bring about meaningful and lasting change, by making sure that the employment systems that screened out blacks and Spanish Surnamed Americans and other minority groups in the first place will not continue to operate against them."

Many fair employment practices commissions on the state and local level have been hampered by lack of funds. These EEOC grants allow them to use more effectively their resources and enabling legislation. Emphasis is placed on the full use of available legal means and the creation of new, more efficient operating procedures which will endure after the EEOC grant is expended.

A cooperative data-sharing arrangement through the EEOC and its 13 regional offices will enable the agencies to identify companies who have few or no minority group employees possibly because of discrimination. Identification is made possible through use of the EEOC's employer reports, covering nearly 30 million workers and containing statistics on entire workforces by occupation, sex, race and ethnic group.

Under the EEOC-funded project, agencies with enforcement powers will conduct an Affirmative Enforcement Program involving the initiation of commission charges, investigation of possible discrimination, attempts to remove discrimination by conciliation, and subsequent enforcement where conciliation fails. In jurisdictions without legal enforcement powers, the agencies will conduct voluntary compliance reviews followed up by technical assistance to correct illegal recruiting and hiring methods.

In either case, agencies will produce a written finding on whether discrimination exists and, where appropriate, an agreement with the employer implementing specific changes.

Brown said that some 900 employer establishments with a total of well over a million employees had been contacted under last year's program. "The present cooperative effort has been so successful," the EEOC Chairman added, "that a number of agencies are in the process of incorporating the techniques of the existing program into the regular operations of their agencies."

"As the effectiveness of state and local fair employment practices agencies is enhanced," Brown continued, "there will be gains for all concerned. Reducing the duplication of federal and state effort will stretch total resources to combat discrimination. It will provide faster service to aggrieved individuals; reduce the burden to respondent companies of repeated investigations; and enable the EEOC to focus on broad national strategies and programs for attacking discrimination in employment."

The Equal Employment Opportunity Commission was established under the Civil Rights Act of 1964. Title VII of the Act prohibits discrimination based on race, color, religion, sex and national origin, in hiring, upgrading, and all other conditions of employment.

CHAIRMAN BROWN CALLS FOR NEW BUSINESS-GOVERNMENT PARTNERSHIP;
PRESIDENT NIXON HAILS INNOVATIVE PROGRAM

Asserting that past industry action programs in equal employment opportunity "have clearly been inadequate, "William H. Brown III, Chairman of the U. S. Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, challenges the representatives of over 40 major trade associations to "hire a full-time expert to work on affirmative action programs with your member companies for (the decade of) the '70's."

The EEOC is sponsoring a workshop for national trade association executives November 20-22, at the facilities of The Johnson Foundation in Racine, Wisconsin.

In a speech to the workshop, Mr. Brown declared that the associations must come forth with "new initiatives, new ideas, new creativity" to give equal employment opportunity "the priority that it deserves when viewed in terms of the future destiny of our society and in terms of the human lives wasted and lost because of discrimination."

Some of the EEOC Chairman's other suggestions to improve the companies' employment of minority groups were to: review selection and testing procedures to make sure they reflect actual job requirements; recruit through the minority press and on minority college campuses; employ recruiters who are themselves minority group members; and exchange ideas and information through trade association meetings and publications.

Mr. Brown was optimistic about the passage of legislation currently moving through Congress which would give the EEOC power to compel compliance with Title VII of the 1964 Civil Rights Act, which prohibits discrimination based on race, color, religion, sex and national origin. He commented, however, "I hope we can keep our enforcement powers in reserve and not have to make extensive use of them...I would much rather that the firms which you represent talk to us over a blueprint for action than over an investigator's case file."

"Better yet," he added, "I would like to see fewer and fewer cases come before the Commission as a result of positive action by American business and industry to define and eliminate discriminatory practices within its own house." Brown noted that since 1964, the EEOC has received well over 40,000 charges and has found discrimination in 60 percent of those cases.

"Do not leave it up to the government to solve your problems for you," Brown warned. "Wake up to the fact that it is in your own self-interest to eliminate job discrimination. The idea that business and society cannot operate exclusively of one another is not a new concept, but it is more often heard in speeches and discussed philosophically in conferences, and too seldom made a part of business' mode of operation."

The workshop, the first of its kind, is a cooperative effort between the EEOC, The Johnson Foundation, and the Cambridge Center for Social Studies of Cambridge, Massachusetts.

President Richard Nixon saluted the purpose of the workshop. In a letter to Chairman Brown, The President said, "As the first large scale gathering of business and government representatives for the purpose of exploring the problem of job discrimination in America, this meeting does indeed promote cooperation--not confrontation." The Chief Executive declared that, "By taking a lead in promoting' equal employment opportunity and making it a matter of course and not an issue for courts, you can deal affirmatively and constructively with the problems we face. And you can brighten the futures of countless fellow Americans--while teaching others that discrimination is not only a violation of the law, but a violation of the spirit and tenets on which this nation was founded."

EQUAL EMPLOYMENT OPPORTUNITY COMMISSION

HOW TO FILE A COMPLAINT AGAINST UNLAWFUL JOB DISCRIMINATION

DISCRIMINATION IS UNLAWFUL

Discrimination in employment because of race, color, religion, sex, or national origin, is prohibited under Title VII of the Civil Rights Law. The Equal Employment Opportunity Commission will act on charges of discrimination in employment committed by employers, labor organizations, state and private employment agencies and labor-management apprenticeship programs.

CHARGES MAY BE FILED BY:

Any person who believes he has been discriminated against in an employment situation.

A Commissioner who has reason to believe that an unlawful employment practice has been committed by a company, labor union, employment agency, or an apprenticeship or training program.

The company, union, or employment agency is forbidden by law to punish you for filing a charge, for acting as a witness, or for assisting the Commission to establish the cause for the charge.

★ U.S. GOVERNMENT PRINTING OFFICE : 1966 O—223-512

YOU HAVE A RIGHT TO COMPLAIN IF:

Employer refuses to hire you when you are qualified for a job opening.

Employer refuses to let you file application but accepts others'.

Union or employment agency refuses to refer you to job opening.

Union refuses to accept you into membership.

You are fired or laid off without cause.

You are passed over for promotion for which you are qualified.

You are paid less than others for comparable work.

You are placed in segregated seniority line.

You are left out of training or apprenticeship programs.

AND . . .

The reason for any of these acts is your race, color, religion, sex, or national origin.

Also, if employer provides racially segregated lunchrooms, locker rooms, rest rooms, recreation facilities.

WE CANNOT HANDLE CERTAIN CHARGES:

The Commission can handle charges concerning discriminatory employment practices based only on race, color, religion, sex, or national origin. We cannot handle charges of discrimination, for example, concerning employment of physically and mentally handicapped, or concerning age, housing or schools. Where appropriate, we refer such charges to other federal or state agencies. We cannot handle charges of employment discrimination by federal, state or local governments, except that we can handle charges involving state employment service offices.

AFTER A CHARGE IS FILED:

- The Commission will review your charge and contact you by mail or in person.
- The Commission investigates your charge and if it finds it is justified, the Commission tries by conciliation to end the discrimination.
- If the Commission fails you may take your complaint to court.
- In most states with Fair Employment Practices laws, Title VII requires the Commission to refer your charge to the state agency which has 60 days to try to settle your complaint. You will be notified if this is done, and of your right to come back to the Commission if you are not satisfied with the state action.

NOTE:

The law covers employers of 75 or more people; labor unions with 75 or more members; and employment agencies. On July 2, 1967, the law will cover employers and unions with 50 or more employees or members.

YOU CAN HELP END DISCRIMINATION

The Commission will determine what action can be taken based on your statements as presented in the charge form in this pamphlet.

Freedom from discrimination is not enough. There must be freedom from the disadvantage that 200 years of discrimination helped create. There must be freedom of opportunity, freedom to work.—President Lyndon B. Johnson, April 28, 1966

Dear Paul,

I will be in Atlanta, Thursday, June 10 and would like an opportunity to visit with you if possible. I have several projects cooking at the moment that I'd like to seek your aid in and I'll outline them briefly in this letter. If you're not going to be available that day I'd appreciate your lining me up with any other appropriate staff people on these items.

Housing - I represent a non-profit corporation in Memphis which is church affiliated that wants to get into the low and moderate income housing area. Because of local politics they do not want to do business with the local integrated law firm, that has already done a lot of this type of development. They have come to me and I have very limited expertise in this area. Any help you or someone down there can be toward steering us in the right direction would be appreciated.

Prison Reform - I represent a guy at Brushy Mountain prison in Petros, Tennessee who is serving 99 years for murder of a policeman. He and several other guys have organized a prison radio show and a weekly newspaper. They have done this with the tacit consent of the Warden and with absolutely no money at all. I am trying to raise some money through the Knoxville and Oak Ridge ACLU and Unitarian Church people and they are having a jazz show at the prison on Memorial Day. Brushy Mountain is the longterm, maximum security prison in the Tennessee system. No one there has less than a fifteen year sentence and it always comes last in priority. There have been virtually no Law Enforcement Assistance Administration (LEAA) grants to long term prisons and I don't think that is a feasible source of funding at this time. I think these men will have to raise money privately and show that they can do a number of ongoing projects before they can pursuade the State and Federal governments to do anything significant for them.

Newsletter - One of the things that distresses me now that I'm in Washington and see things from this perspective is how many significant news events are reported here that go either unreported or distorted for political reasons in local papers. Additionally there are many "inside" stories that are unreported both places. I wonder about how much accurate news the typical NAACP executive secretary in Drew, Mississippi gets about the programs that are vital to her and her constituency. I'd like to see a newsletter of Washington-government-New York-Wall Street type news go out to a group of professional civil-rights type workers. It would be very simple in format -- two to four pages -- typed and printed every two weeks. I envision it as being similar to the Prentice-Hall tax letters and similar services. Of course, those publications are profitable because their readers are organized and willing to pay. The type of newsletter I propose would go to an unorganized and impecunious group and would, therefore, have to be heavily subsidized.

Study of Effectiveness of Civil Rights Laws - There are a number of Civil Rights Laws, Title VII of the 1964 Act, in particular which require the agency to attempt to resolve the complaint by "informal means of conference, conciliation, and pursuasion" and upon failing to do so the Attorney General "may" go to Court or the individual can file a civil action himself. This same language and a similar procedure is in the Age Discrimination Act and the Housing Discrimination Act. I know from first hand knowledge that EEOC estimates that only 5% of those who file complaints with the agency ever file lawsuits and I fear that the percentage under the other two statutes is even worse. I made a pass at EEOC and the Labor Department about them studying this situation, i.e., how many cases are filed, how many go to Court, and why do people not go to Court, how do those who do go get lawyers, is it profitable for the lawyers, etc. I was told by Labor that they had only brought 5 to 10 such cases under the Age Discrimination law and they really had no interest in studying the matter...there being nothing to study! I was further told privately that Labor had no interest in the law (by the former administrator of the section charged with its enforcement).

I then turned to EEOC and found them very receptive to the idea as long as I talked to lawyers in program areas, but found a complete bottleneck with the Director of Administration who would not go for such a matter (EEOC finance a study which is bound to make it look bad? Heaven forbid!). So it looks as if private sources are the only ones for such a deal. Actually it would be a fairly simple study to pull off. I can bypass the Office of Administration and go straight to the Regional Offices where my contacts are pretty good and get the records from them. It's more a clerical job to compile information and then interpret the results than anything else.

I hope I can get to see you when I'm in Atlanta and go over these things and anything else of mutual interest.

Sincerely,

Whitworth Stokes

RE: Proposal to study the effectiveness of the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission (EEOC)

The Equal Employment Opportunity Commission was created by Congress under the Civil Rights Act of 1964 (Title VII) and became effective July 1, 1965. The Commission has no enforcement powers and can only attempt to resolve employment discrimination complaints by "informal means of conference, conciliation, and pursuasion". If the Commission is unable to resolve the matter to the satisfaction of all parties the individual Charging Party may file a private action in the United States District Court. Although EEOC has never reached signed conciliation agreements on more than 35% of their cases in any fiscal year, the present Deputy General Counsel estimates no more than 5% of those Charging Parties who file charges ever go to Court. Despite attempts by the writer while an employee of the Commission and as a practicing attorney to convince the Commission that this problem should be studied, they have not yet authorized such a study. In a conversation with a former employee of the Commission's Office of Compliance, it was stated that the Commission does not "even keep records which would provide a basis for such a study." This true or not?

So it is incumbent upon a private organization to examine what happens to those thousands of individuals who file charges, never file lawsuits, and apparently do not have their cases disposed of satisfactorily in the process.

What LOT done in this area? Valder, etc

All Commission records are confidential and this factor inhibits a study by any outside group. However, the Commission does make available overall statistics and the confidentiality requirement as to names and places ceases to exist when a lawsuit is filed. By combining two sources of information, i.e. EEOC Annual Reports and Court records, a conclusion can be drawn by inference in two areas. (1) How many persons who seek the assistance of the EEOC eventually get to Court? and (2) By what means and methods do such persons obtain the services of a lawyer?

Because of the writer's familiarity with the Atlanta Office, the Director of the Atlanta Office's connections with SRC, the long history and volume of complaints filed with the Atlanta Office, and the geographical area of concern to the Southern Regional Council, it is proposed that the study be restricted to cases handled by EEOC's Atlanta Regional Office. This Office covered the following states prior to EEOC's reorganization in the Spring of 1971: Georgia, Florida, South Carolina, and North Carolina. Additionally the states of Alabama and Middle and East Tennessee were covered by the Birmingham Area Office. The states of Mississippi, Arkansas and West Tennessee were covered by the Memphis Area Office. These two Area Offices were"spinoffs" from the Atlanta Region.

Under the present Regional setup the Atlanta Office has responsibility for the following states: Georgia, Florida, South Carolina, North Carolina, Alabama, Mississippi, Tennessee, and Kentucky, with District offices in Atlanta, Charlotte, Miami, Birmingham, Jackson, and Memphis.

As can be seen these two regional arrangements cover those states generally comprising the Deep South. The only two states not covered in both plans are Arkansas and Kentucky and both could be eliminated from consideration without drastically impairing the scope of the study. The exclusion of Louisiana is more serious, but since it always has been in a separate Region (New Orleans, and now Dallas) its inclusion would add measurably to the time and expense involved in this proposal.

The time period to be evaluated should be carefully chosen to provide a time frame which will yield a statistically significant number of cases while providing for a sufficient passage of time to measure the impact of those lawsuits having been filed. This would probably mean not considering the first two fiscal years that the Commission was operative (July 1, 1965 to July 1, 1967) and the fiscal year to be completed on July 1, 1971.

The proposed timetable and financial estimates for the Study are as follows:

I PHASE ONE: Meet with EEOC Regional Director Hollowell to gain approval for study and access to records. Determination of the years to be studied to be determined at this meeting. Obtain list of EEOC cases that have resulted in litigation with the following information:

A. Plaintiff's names (Charging Parties)

B. Defendant's names (Respondents)

C. Plaintiffs Attorney's name and address

D. Court in which case filed

E. Date of filing

TIME AND COST:	Professional	One day	$100
	Clerical	Two days	64
	Travel Expense		275

II PHASE TWO: Compile information obtained in Phase One to determine whatever statistical patterns are present. For example, geographical (State or Court), Attorneys, Dates (chronological), etc.

TIME AND COST:	Professional	Four hours	$ 50
	Clerical	One day	32
	Travel	None

III PHASE THREE: Interview Five key people suggested by the information obtained in Phase one and compiled in Phase Two. For example, a Commission representative, attorney, plaintiff, Judge, or other.

TIME AND COST:	Professional	Five days	$500
	Clerical	None
	Travel Expense		300

IV PHASE FOUR: Writing of Report and Submission to SRC.

TIME AND COST:	Professional	Two days	$200
	Clerical	Two days	64
	Travel	None

TOTAL COST OF PROPOSED STUDY:

Travel Cost	$575.00
Professional	850.00
Clerical	160.00
Reserve for Xerox, telephone, and other miscellaneous	150.00
	$1,735.00

The above estimates are based on a Professional rate of $100.00 per day, a clerical rate of $4.00 per hour, and expenses at actual cost. Final billing would be subject to adjustment within these rates. However, actual billing would not be less than $1,200 nor more than $2,000.

Dear Whit:

Thanks for sending the written proposal to me. Although I feel that it would be quite useful to have some such study made, it is impossible to do more about the proposal at this time. I am sorry to have to give you this kind of answer when you had worked out so many of the elements that would enter into the study.

I think it quite possible that you have underestimated the time it would take to do what you have outlined. Although I cannot see our being able to undertake the study on a contract basis, I do hope that we will be able to discuss it further at some later date.

Our very best regards in your endeavors.

A NEW WEAPON IN THE FIGHT FOR BETTER CIVIL RIGHTS ENFORCEMENT

As we noted in the section on the Voting Rights Act, there is a new force on Capitol Hill that can be used to strengthen civil rights enforcement. The House Judiciary Committee has authorized Subcommittee No. 4, under Rep. Don Edwards (D., Calif.) to oversee what kind of enforcement job the government is doing.

The Leadership Conference has long urged the House Judiciary Committee to set up such a subcommittee and we are glad to see it finally become a reality.

Here are the other members of the subcommittee:

Democrats - John Conyers (Mich.), Andrew Jacobs (Ind.), Jerome R. Waldie (Calif.), Edwin Edwards (La.), Paul Sarbanes (Md.).

Republicans - Charles Wiggins (Calif.), Charles W. Sandman, Jr. (N. J.), William J. Keating (Ohio), Robert McClorey (Ill.).

* * * * * *

We urge all organizations to act immediately. At a time when the national unemployment rate is 6.2 per cent, this bill would provide immediate jobs for 150,000 of the unemployed in such crucial areas of public service as health, education, safety, recreation, pollution control.

Please act today: Write President Nixon urging him to sign the bill once Congress passes it. If that fails, then we will have to write to all members of Congress - Republicans mainly - urging them to vote to override a veto.

A VICTORY FOR VOTING RIGHTS ENFORCEMENT

Attorney General John Mitchell has given up on an attempt to weaken enforcement of the Voting Rights Act.

It was his intention to alter administration of the law so that the states and political subdivisions whose discriminatory laws had brought them under the coverage of the statute, could still put new voting laws into operation if the Justice Department was not entirely convinced their effect would be discriminatory. The Attorney General was prepared to give states and subdivisions the benefit of the doubt in uncertain cases even though the law and the court interpretations of it clearly place the burden of proof on the states and localities. They must prove their laws will not discriminate. It is not up to the Attorney General to assume that burden, if he has any questions or hesitations about the effect of a law. In short, Mr. Mitchell was attempting to do administratively, what Congress had refused to let him do last year, when it extended the law another five years.

Our Protests Helped

Fortunately, Mr. Mitchell's intention was learned before the guidelines could be put into effect. A bipartisan group of members of Congress protested. Leadership Conference organizations were alerted to the prospective change and sent in many protests. The Attorney General was severely criticized in a court decision. The House Committee Judiciary Subcommittee, (Rep. Don Edwards, D., Calif., Chairman) which now has responsibility to investigate civil rights enforcement, called Justice officials in for questioning. All these things together, we are convinced, finally forced Justice to back down from any formal weakening of the law.

WATSON COURT NOMINATION WITHDRAWN

While we are toting up victories, we are glad to report that the Administration appears to have decided not to nominate former Congressman Albert Watson of South Carolina to the U. S. Military Court of Appeals. As soon as the first reports of such a possibility became known to us, Roy Wilkins, Chairman of the Conference, sent a telegram to President Nixon urging him not to make the nomination in view of Watson's hostile record on civil rights. Mr. Wilkins warned, "another bruising struggle on a judicial appointment could only further divide this country at a time when unity is badly needed."

Mr. Watson received national attention last year, when he addressed a rally in Lamar, South Carolina, only ten days before people there overturned a bus carrying black students to a newly desegregated school. In his speech, Mr. Watson urged a mob to "stand up and use every means at your disposal...."

BUSINESS ALLIANCE WIDENS GOALS; SEEKS TO AID RETURNING VETERANS

With the recent change in command among its officers, the National Alliance of Businessmen (NAB) is reviewing programs and policies dealing with hiring and training the disadvantaged in private industry. Changes being contemplated could mean significant shifts for the three year-old organization which promotes both voluntary and federally-funded contract training of the disadvantaged on the part of business.

One major change under discussion is the involvement of the NAB in programs to find employment for returning servicemen. With NAB Metro offices in 156 cities, the plan is to put the widespread organization at the disposal of other groups seeking the employment of veterans returning to their communities. Particularly, NAB officials are pursuing a tie-in with the Department of Labor-funded Jobs For Veterans programs.

Even deeper involvement in veterans employment policy is being contemplated at the NAB. But to bring returning servicemen directly into the organization's hire-and-train programs presumably would require a change in the definition of disadvantaged which qualifies the unemployed or underemployed for NAB-sponsored jobs. Such a change is presently under consideration.

Leadership Plans

NAB directions under the new leadership were disclosed by the recently appointed president of the organization, William C. Woodward, a vice president of the Aluminum Company of America. In an interview with the editors of MIS, Woodward reviewed a number of proposals under consideration that may be put into effect during the course of the next year.

Broadly speaking, however, the Pittsburgh-based executive does not contemplate any fundamental changes in the over-all business involvement in hiring the disadvantaged. "The business community is still committed . . . the businessman sees this as an opportunity to make a contribution other than throwing money over the fence into the ghetto." Still, Woodward feels that "some clarification" is needed on the role of the government and its efforts to foster voluntary participation by industry in such hiring programs.

Even so, Woodward is optimistic about the future prospects of the NAB and defends its hiring and training performance over the past three years. "I'm skeptical of numbers being used to show how well we're doing," he says, "but there is one set of figures I feel we can rely on. This is the report on the number of people actually hired."

Woodward cited the following hiring figures which, he said, "belies everything about how the downturn in the economy has affected the NAB program." In the NAB's first year, hiring totaled 125,000; in the second year, 228,000 and in the third year, 267,000. He noted that the hiring gains were the result of a shift in employment patterns, with heavy industry giving way to NAB participation on the part of smaller firms and service organizations.

Another noticeable shift in NAB patterns has been the trend toward government-sponsored training contracts and away from the voluntary company-paid training programs. While the majority of NAB training is still voluntary, Woodward estimated that the pattern has shifted from a 70-30 ratio to 60-40. One explanation of the change is the nature of the participating companies—to those smaller firms which have neither the facilities nor funds to handle the training on their own.

New Directions

Discussing prospective changes in NAB policy, Woodward emphasized his organization's concern for employment of returning veterans, noting that many of the factors relating to the disadvantaged were present in their situation. Particularly, he pointed to the 13.6 percent unemployment rate among the veterans in the 20-25 age group, and the fact that the figure was double among minority veterans. He also said that among unemployed veterans, some 352 thousand lacked high school diplomas.

Woodward pointed to other programs under review at the NAB, including:

- A revision of the JOBS '70 contract procedures. These are the newest training contract rules, put into effect a year ago. Woodward said that initial changes would be put into effect shortly "aimed at strengthening the contract and meeting some of the criticisms in the GAO report." (See MIS, March 24, 1971, page 318.) Beyond these alterations, Woodward added, NAB and Labor Department officials are "studying basic changes" in the JOBS '70 contract which could be made in a few months.

- A review of upgrading contract training procedures which, he said, "are not very successful." Despite the upgrading options in the JOBS '70 contracts, the NAB officials noted that there were only 91 upgrading contracts in 102 locations so far. One prime source of upgrading contracts is among hospitals and the upgrading of paraprofessionals. Woodward said the upgrading review is being instituted because "upgrading bothers everyone. We don't really know what they're talking about . . . we need to determine what it means."

PAGINATION INCORRECT

• NAB participation in the Family Assistance Program, should it be put into effect, is also being contemplated. "We see the NAB as assisting the Labor Department," Woodward said. "The department is responsible for making those in FAP employed or employable. That's where we fit in."

SUCCESS OF JOBS FOR VETERANS WIDESPREAD IN FIRST SIX MONTHS

The national Jobs for Veterans (JFV) campaign, launched by President Nixon in October 1970 when he formed the JFV committee headed by James Oates, has received support from a wide range of sources, including 95 responses from Congressmen. Remarkable success has been achieved in several cities and "a major effort is being pursued to reach employers and unions through local task forces," a JFV spokesman told MIS. Coordination and assistance from JFV headquarters in Washington and the ambitious work of local groups has led to the use of various media—newspapers, television, radio, posters, and billboards—as potent aids in promoting the employment of veterans.

The intent of the JFV campaign was to promote the use of local task forces in finding jobs for veterans, who are returning to civilian life at the rate of one million per year. The unemployment for this group is now 10.2 percent, up from the 6.2 percent of the first quarter of 1970. There are now 226 cities with populations of 10,000 or more which have some form of activity related to aiding veterans, says a JFV source. Of the major cities, those with 100,000 or more people, 37 have task forces operating. Task forces are made up of businesses, unions, state employment services, employment security offices, and mayors' and governors' offices, among others. They serve as the nucleus of speakers bureaus, which furnish spokesmen to address various civic organizations, service clubs, etc., and generally "spread the word" in support of the JFV drive.

Houston Success Noted

"One of the most energetic efforts on behalf of veterans has been in Houston," a JFV spokesman told MIS. "Veterans job placement there increased 24 percent in the period from February-March of 1970 to February-March 1971." Cooperation from Houston's business sector has been instrumental. One of the local newspapers offers free one-week classified ads to veterans seeking employment and has also reserved 12 of its city distributorships (at $12,000 per year) for veterans. Another paper uses a three line advertisement stating "Best Bet—Hire the Vet" with the address of the local employment service office, and offers cash prizes to the salesmen selling the most advertisements. The Houston Outdoor Advertisers have donated 20 large billboards promoting the hiring of veterans, and a local television station ran a 30 minute documentary on the problems veterans encounter in finding a job.

Successful efforts have been carried out in other cities as well, the spokesman noted. In New York and Buffalo a "hot line" is available for employers to call and list their job openings, which are then routed to veterans representatives, employment services, and government agencies for possible followup by a job-seeking veteran. Supplementing the hot line is a "daily bulletin" of job openings for veterans only, which is distributed to veterans counselors at the local Veterans Administration or Department of Labor office.

In Los Angeles, radio station KPMC announcer Dick Whittinghill airs profiles of veterans, listing their skills, training, and other qualifications, which has resulted in the placement of 35 of 64 men in jobs. "Small town veterans need help also," said the JFV source, and in South Dakota 16 task forces have attempted to contact every employer who might provide a job.

Job fairs, bringing together potential employers and veterans needing jobs, have taken place or are planned in Baltimore, Charlotte, Wilmington, Del., and Omaha. The success of Baltimore's job fair on March 15 is evident in the statistics—1,900 veterans attended, 278 of whom were hired on the spot and an additional 1,474 were referred for tests and interviews.

Concern and action has also come from top government officials. In addition to President Nixon many Cabinet members are involved in the campaign. According to JFV, Secretary of Transportation John Volpe encourages firms dealing with his department to provide training and job opportunities for veterans. In addition, the Office of Economic Opportunity has granted $1.0 million for a 14 month experimental program in Los Angeles, Detroit, Cleveland, Chicago, Indianapolis, and five other cities to be named, which will provide jobs for disadvantaged veterans working to promote wider participation by veterans in education and training programs available under the GI Bill. The Department of Labor has allocated 335 additional spots in the ES for veterans counselors, 17 of which were used in an innovative program in Chicago where Vietnam veterans were hired to serve as the counselors.

Some obstacles to the further success of JFV, says the spokesman, are the tight job market; competition for available jobs among displaced workers, vacationing students and veterans; and union seniority rules which make the recently employed veteran most susceptible to layoffs.

POVERTY, LEGISLATION, & SPENDING ARE KEY TO NIXON'S MANPOWER REPORT

Full opportunity for all citizens remains a central goal for this nation, said President Nixon in submitting the ninth annual Manpower Report of the President to Congress. He cited the strides his Administration has made toward achieving its goal, and asked members of Congress to consider the obstacles identified in the report which still stand in the way of success. Noting that the report provides background information for his recommendation on special revenue shar-

Dear Dr. Via:

The Educational Programs Division of the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, in cooperation with the Johnson Foundation, is holding a two day workshop on affirmative action for National Jaycees from 50 metropolitan centers.

We would like to invite you to serve as one of the resource persons at the workshop which will be held at the Johnson Foundation Conference Center, "Wingspread," Racine, Wisconsin. The workshop will begin with an evening meal on Thursday, May 13, and conclude with a luncheon on Saturday, May 15.

We are hopeful that it will be possible for you to be with us during the entire program. We believe this conference will be the beginning of a major new thrust of the U. S. Jaycee Operation Opportunity program into the field of employment discrimination. These young men could potentially mobilize the resources of their 50 cities in active support of equal employment opportunity, as well as have a major impact on the program emphasis of the U. S. Jaycees in years to come.

We hope you will be able to accept our invitation. We know that your participation in the seminar would greatly enhance its effectiveness and help ensure its success.

Yours sincerely,

Jed Johnson, Jr.

Dear Mr. Johnson:

I have received your invitation to participate in the "Wingspread" Conference sponsored by the EEOC in cooperation with the Johnson Foundation for the Jaycees. I will be able to serve as a resource for that conference and look forward to meeting you and to participating in this undertaking.

If it is possible, it would be helpful to have any materials developed for the conference prior to the conference dates. I would also be interested in knowing which southern cities will be represented.

JOB TRAINING BY PRIVATE INDUSTRY SPORADIC, STUDY SUGGESTS

Much of private industry pays little attention to future manpower needs and does little about job training except in times of crisis, a new study sponsored by the Department of Labor reports.

"Aside from management training programs, which tend to have some continuity, a large number of the training programs in private industry are conducted on a sporadic basis . . . .

"The employer turns on his training system when skill shortages grow and he has no choice but to train his own people. Then he turns off his training system when the skill shortages ease to a tolerable level," the study says.

The study, "Training In Private Industry," probed the opinions and practices of 131 employers in the Greater Cleveland area. It was conducted by Dr. John L. Iacobelli of Cleveland State University under a grant from the Labor Department's Manpower Administration.

The study recommended improvements in the Government-industry manpower planning and training system "to forestall inflationary skill-bottlenecks and decrease reliance on tight monetrary and fiscal policies to control inflation."

Employers responding in the survey said that job training has relatively low priority in their operations.

The study revealed that only a small group of large employers have extensive, continuing programs of formal training.

Other employers recruited manpower from sources that emphasized experience and currently employed workers, the study states, whereas employers with extensive training programs recruited inexperienced workers through schools and, in some cases, through manpower programs.

Employers in the survey thought that the Federal government should absorb about one-half to three-quarters of the cost of training disadvantaged people. Employers considered such training "unprofitable."

The Cleveland area was used as a sounding board for employer practices in the job training field because it has a diverse economy and typifies employment conditions found in other urban areas.

The report, Monograph 22, is one of a series of summaries of research performed under a Manpower Administration grant program. Copies of the monograph are available for 35 cents from the Superintendent of Documents, U.S. Government Printing Office, Washington, D.C. 20402.

Civil Service Opposition

The Civil Service Commission reiterates its strong opposition to legislation that would transfer responsibility for enforcing equal opportunity in federal employment from CSC to the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission.

Irving Kator, assistant CSC executive director, tells a House Labor Subcommittee, which is considering such legislation, that to transfer the equal opportunity program away from CSC would "be a disservice to federal employees and applicants for employment." Furthermore, he says, such a move would be detrimental to the government's efforts to make equal employment opportunity a reality in every aspect of federal personnel operations.

Pointing to a substantial increase in the number of minority group workers employed by the government and in the higher salaried jobs, Kator asserts that the CSC has been responsive to the complaints of discrimination by federal employees and applicants and that its EEO program is working satisfactorily.

Leave For Religious Convention

An employer was not justified in discharging an employee who took an unauthorized two-week leave of absence in order to attend a convention sponsored by her religious sect, the Worldwide Church of God, EEOC rules.

The employee was a member of the Worldwide Church of God and the tenets of this religion made attendance at its annual two-week convention compulsory. The employee requested a leave of absence or a vacation in order to attend the convention. The employer denied her request, pointing out that the company policy required vacations to be taken during the two-week plant shutdown and that leaves of absence for more than two days for religious reasons were not sanctioned. Nevertheless, the employee attended the convention, for which she was discharged.

EEOC rules that the employer's policy had the forseeable effect of requiring the employee either to abandon a fundamental precept of her religion or to give up her job. EEOC notes further that the employer made no valid claim of business necessity for its policy nor that the policy had an equivalent effect on other employees.

Although on its face the employer's policy appeared to apply equally to all, in fact it had a harsher impact on this particular employee than on others solely because her religion was different than theirs. (EEOC Decision 71-464, June 3, 1969.)

Firing Demanded

Edward J. Carlough, president of the AFL-CIO Sheet Metal Workers, demands that President Nixon fire Assistant Labor Secretary Arthur Fletcher on grounds that Fletcher hinted that White House action to curb wage increases was really designed to weaken unions.

In a letter to President Nixon, Carlough says that he was "shocked and angry" to learn that according to Fletcher President Nixon's suspension of the Davis-Bacon Act was not to control inflation but rather to weaken and even destroy the construction unions.

Carlough quoted Fletcher as having told a group of non-union contractors in a speech March 12 that "the era of arrogance and discrimination by some trade unions has ended. The union grip on the processes of government has weakened."

Fletcher says he was trying to get across his idea that some groups, including labor unions, have in the past used governmental processes to get the best-paying jobs for their own members and freeze out other groups, often blacks and other minorities.

Houston Task Force

The Equal Employment Opportunity Commission Houston Task Force continues its attack on job discrimination against blacks, Chicanos, and women, according to a progress report announced by EEOC Chairman William Brown. The Task Force was established in June 1970 after hearings in Houston revealed widespread employment discrimination by the area's major employers and unions.

Brown gives the following status report on the Task Force's 68 cases:

- Action has been instituted in federal district court by charging parties in four cases.
- One case is being readied for court action.
- Five cases are undergoing settlement efforts.
- Investigations have been completed in 54 cases.
- Three investigations are near completion.
- One investigation is administratively closed for lack of jurisdiction.

Some Houston firms have been cooperative, Brown says, but for the most part, those charged with discrimination have not voluntarily complied with the law.

Ohio Laws Superseded

In another court test involving questions of conflict between state and federal laws, the U.S. District Court for the Southern District of Ohio rules that certain sections of the Ohio State law governing employment of women are in conflict with and superseded by Title VII of the 1964 Civil Rights Act.

The court says that specified sections are invalid because they conflict with and frustrate the policy and purpose of the Civil Rights Act produced by Congress. The litigation focused on those provisions in the Ohio law limiting the occupations women may hold, limiting weight lifting, and limiting the hours they may work. The court's view is that the provisions specified in Ohio state laws on employment of women do not establish "bona fide occupational qualifications" within the meaning of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act. JOBS Critique by GAO

The JOBS program's design, operations, and reported results are criticized in a study released by the General Accounting Office. The GAO report is based on an investigation of JOBS programs in five representative cities—Detroit, Portland (Ore.), San Francisco, Oakland, and Seattle—between the inception of JOBS in 1968 and June 30, 1970. Thirty-one federally-funded contracts were studied as well as 70 non-contract employers.

The report notes that the JOBS program is hampered by the fact that it was conceived during a period of high employment and that adequate consideration may not have been given to the effect that an economic contraction would have on the program's operation. In the present economic climate, in order for an employer to participate in the JOBS program, he would have to give preference to disadvantaged persons over persons he would have hired normally in filling job vacancies; this has the effect of shifting the burden of unemployment from disadvantaged persons to others, the report continues. To rectify this situation, GAO recommends that the Labor Department's training efforts focus on skill shortage positions where displacement of other workers can be minimized.

JOBS contracting procedures, by which employers of 25 percent of JOBS trainees are reimbursed for extraordinary training costs, also are criticized. The study argues for the replacement of the present fixed-unit-price contracting procedure with cost-reimbursement contracts in certain cases. It notes that although the fixed-unit-price system involves less record-keeping and "red tape" for the employer, the system has resulted in over-payments in 17 of 31 contracts studied, due primarily to the difficulty of estimating the amount of training the enrollees need or its cost. GAO also says that employers' job pledges frequently are inflated and urges that more care be taken in the award of contracts to ensure that the employer can provide the number of job opportunities he promises. Likewise, it urges a closer watch by the Labor Department on the supportive services pledged by employers, since its study found many instances where promised services were not delivered even though contractors were paid as if they had been.

Finally, the study criticizes the scope of the JOBS program, charging that it serves so broad a spectrum of jobless persons that many of its enrollees are not any different from regular hires. Among non-contract JOBS enrollees, GAO finds so little evidence of enrollees' disadvantaged status that it declares "there is a very limited basis for confidence that employers are hiring only those persons who are disadvantaged." It urges that the Labor Department start making closer checks on information supplied by applicants, such as family income, and carefully screen candidates for non-contract, as well as contract, JOBS vacancies.

The Department of Labor and the National Alliance of Businessmen, who jointly sponsor the JOBS program, in responding to GAO's study, question whether GAO can draw such broad conclusions and recommendations on the basis of a review involving only five cities. Additionally, they acknowledge difficulties in data collection, but warn against complicated reporting or contracting procedures which will deter employers from participating in the JOBS program.

Bias suit lawyers asking $650,000

BY INGRID KINDRED
News staff writer

More than $650,000 has been requested as attorney fees and expenses for seven attorneys who represented private plaintiffs in employment discrimination suits against U.S.Steel Corp's Fairfield Works and 12 locals of the United Steel Workers Union.

The claims have been presented to U.S. Dist. Judge Sam Pointer Jr.

POINTER heard evidence by several attorneys Monday in support of their fee claims, as well as calculations made by the company in connection with some $200,000 in back pay to be awarded black employes in three of the six cases presented by private plaintiffs.

The judge issued an order May 2 scrapping old seniority rules at Fairfield Works and realigning plant lines of promotion.

In that order, he also set out the categories of employes who would receive back pay, and ordered the company and union to share in the payment of fees to the private plaintiffs' attorneys.

No back pay award was ordered for all black employes at the plant as had been requested by the U.S. Justice Department.

The company has prepared alternative methods of payment to black employes in three of the cases, according to a formula set by Pointer.

I one of its calculations, the company set out the amount of money that affected blacks would have received had there been no discrimination in the shops in which they work. It also contains an "override" of the amount those employes should receive, based on a formula relating to the amount of time it would take them to reach the point on the promotion lines they probably would have reached had there been no discrimination.

A company attorney said the calculations took into account money paid by the company to the employes during layoffs and reductions in force.

SOME of the affected employes, according to the calculations, will receive no back pay. Instead, they are listed as being "overpaid", according to Pointer's formula. The company, however, cannot recover the overpayment

Taking all the calculations into effect, the average amount of back pay involved is about $200,000. It is to be divided among persons in the three cases.

The McKinstry-Hubbard case, which involves black finishing hookers in the plate mill, affects eight employes.

The Hardy case involves back pay for 20 hookers and cranemen.

Some 27 men are involved in the back pay issue in the Ford case, which involves the Pratt City Car Shop.

Other black employes work in jobs affected by the McKinstry and Hardy cases, but according to the company's calculation, they have been overpaid.

The company has requested that adjustments be made in back pay regarding those black employes who have refused promotional opportunities, but the plaintiffs' attorneys have argued against such.

Plaintiffs' attorneys have also asked Pointer to consider setting an amount of back pay to be distributed among the affected persons on an individual situation basis.

EEO - Col.

U. S. Steel to pay $406,000 in fees, back pay to blacks

8-13-73 B.N.

BY INGRID KINDRED
News staff writer

The total amount of attorneys' fees and back pay to be awarded in six federal court cases involving employment discrimination at U. S. Steel's Fairfield Works is $406,091.61.

A story in some editions of Saturday's News reported the amounts incorrectly.

IN AN ORDER issued Friday concerning the back pay and attorneys' fees, U. S. Dist. Judge Sam Pointer ruled that:

In the McKinstry-Hubbard case, which involves black finishing hookers in the plate mill, eight employes will share in $45,932.59. The company will pay half that amount, with the other half to be paid by the United Steelworkers Union and its Local 1013.

Attorney U. W. Clemon will receive $58,000 for fees and expenses for representing blacks in that case.

The 20 employes affected by the decision in the Hardy case, which involved hookers and cranemen, will receive $43,125.96 total from the company, union and Local 1489. Attorney Oscar Adams, lawyer for blacks in that case, will get $53,000 in fees and expenses.

In the Ford case, which involved blacks at U. S. Steel's Pratt City Car Shop, 33 black employes will share in $112,033.06, to be paid by the company, union, and Local 1733. Attorney James Baker will receive $58,500 in fees and expenses.

In each of those three cases, Pointer has ordered the company to pay half of the attorneys fees and back pay, and the union and local involved to pay the other half.

THE EMPLOYES in the suits will receive varied back pay calculated on an individual basis, according to a formula established by Pointer. The formula purports to make up the difference in salary the black employes would have received had there been no discrimination in the plants and the lines of promotion in which they worked.

In the three cases, the highest amount of back pay to be awarded an individual is $9,851.90 in the McKinstry case; $9,531.84 is the highest amount an employe will receive in the Hardy case and $6,856.52 is the highest single amount in the Ford case.

The suits were brought under Title VII of the 1964 Civil Rights Act which provides for payment of attorneys' fees and back pay where discrimination is found.

The back pay is subject to withholding and other applicable taxes, according to Pointer's order.

In other cases, attorney Richmond Pearson was awarded $9,000 in each of two cases he handled, and attorney Demetirus Newton will receive $17,000.

Pearson's cases involved black millwrights and those in the Maintenance of Way Department. Newton's case involved blacks in the machine shop at Fairfield Works, and in trade and craft jobs. No back pay was awarded in those cases.

Sorry I will be in a meeting all morning and won't be able to discuss with you further on the proposed EEO program. We had gone so much to the problem of substance and interpretation and inter-organizational politics, that we have not gone to the issue of style and clarity. I have not really attempted to proof read the documents but have the impression that it does need it. Further, I think even for our select group that the first two paragraphs are unnecessarily vague and indirect. Can't we say simply "discrimination in employment","the 1972 Amendments to Title VII" and "recent court decisions" instead of the language used. For instance: "new employment law" seems to me rather misleading.

On page one of the memo, point 2, say union "officials" rather than "officers". Same page, fifth line from bottom, strike "state" in front of "representatives of organized labor."

I thought it was universally agreed not to box women off into one corner.

On page four, point D, I would either leave this out or "generalize" it. I realize that in the heat of Wednesday's discussion that this point was not made. But it ties us down to "proceedings" and to a deadline. But, if you will pardon the needle, you made it crystal clear on Wednesday that you were ready to take this whole thing on and that there really was no reason we couldn't do it.

Good luck. I should be back in by noon or soon thereafter.

A Council to attain the ideals and practices of equal opportunity for all peoples in the South

October 12, 1973

Received by Via - 10/15/73

Dear

Ask

A standing concern of the Southern Regional Council is the inequitable distribution of employment in the South, and, more particularly, the effects of racial and sexual discrimination represented in that distribution. This standing concern is one point of reference for the conference on equal employment opportunity in the South which the Council will sponsor next month. A second point of reference is the recent evolution of an important new body of law and major complementary initiatives by the Federal Government, providing legal remedies for victims of employment discrimination.

Although the Council's concern appears to have been given support through the 1972 Amendments to Title VII of the Civil Rights Act, some careful thought is still in order. For example, organized labor, a traditional ally in the struggle to eliminate discrimination, apparently shares with employers some vulnerability in court ordered relief. Thus, if the Council and others sympathetic to many of the objectives of labor are to protect traditional alliances, while pursuing legal relief from employment discrimination, then the new law and its strategic implications must be clearly understood. The magnitude of these and related issues warrant that we assemble persons with specific knowledge of what the new law implies for public agencies, private firms, organized labor, and for civil rights groups specializing in employment. With representatives from each of the areas, we hope to encourage both an atmosphere of cooperation and the level of dialogue required for identifying strategies to end employment discrimination.

As Council members concerned with these objectives, we need your help in the following ways:

1. Will you please comment on, and criticize, the objectives, scope and format of the conference that is proposed?

2. Will you give us your advice on persons who are best qualified to serve as speakers and panelists for the conference? The names presented in the format section are tentative and suggestive. We cannot issue blanket invitations to all those persons who represent the kinds of organizations we want to reach. We must be selective, and you can help us in this process.

3. We have reserved November 16-17 for the conference, and our time schedule is tight. But any delay would carry us past the first of the year. We hope to go ahead in November, and thus we will need to have your comments by October 17 or 18.

4. Call or write George Harris, Economic Development Task Force Coordinator, or me. The WATS number is 800-241-4288. If we do not hear from you, Mr. Harris will try to call you.

The Objective of the conference

The SRC objectives for the Equal Employment Opportunity Conference can be stated simply:

1. The new law, and supporting federal administrative guidelines, must be fully and freely discussed. Moreover, they must be discussed and understood in the context of what they imply for organized labor, public and private employers, attorneys for plaintiffs and defendants, and for others interested in equal employment.

2. To our knowledge, most conferences since the 1972 Amendments have had the comparatively narrow focus of specific interest groups - employers, educational institutions, etc. Meanwhile, there is a specific unmet need to inform citizens of the intent and scope of the new provisions in the law. For this reason, the conference will consider ways in which the technical, legal provisions of the law can be presented in simpler fashion and publicized for the benefit of that much larger audience of both employers and employees who need good information as the basis for action.

Who are we really after reaching?

3. We believe a wide range of groups and organizations should be represented so that we can encourage the kind of discussion that will lead to more comprehensive solutions to problems of employment discrimination in the region.

The Focus of the EEO Conference

The Conference will focus on employment in two areas -- in state and local government and in private employment. The public sector, the largest "growth industry" in the region, has as poor a record in employment discrimination as that in the private sector. More importantly, public employment is now included under the expanded provisions of federal anti-discrimination law, as are all unions with 15 or more members and firms with federal contracts of $50,000 and above.

The following are tentative plans for implementing the EEO Conference:

I. Strategy to Implement EEO Conference

A. Invitational letters and materials will be mailed to selected representatives of the following kinds of organizations:

1. Private Firms
2. Regional and National Union Officials and their Legal Counsel
3. Labor Law Professors and practicing attorney
4. Third-year Law Students

5. State and Local Personnel Officers
6. State Attorneys General, City and County attorneys
7. Manpower Research Specialists
8. Women's Organizations and civil rights groups specializing in employment

(We plan to issue 200 or more invitations. Anticipating 50% attrition).

What about minority groups?

B. Assistance will be needed to encourage the presence of key public officials and representatives of organized labor. Several of the SRC board members could well provide such assistance (and moreover, become a subcommittee of the Task Force on Economic Development on employment discrimination in the region, tracking significant events and alerting the Council and staff to prospects for strategic involvement).

II. Format for EEO Conference

DATES: Friday and Saturday, November 16 and 17, 1973

PLACE: Sheraton - Emory

PARTICIPANTS: 75-100

A. Morning, Friday, November 16, 1973

Dear Prof. Williams:

A standing concern of the Southern Regional Council is the inequitable distribution of employment in the South, and, more particularly, the effects of racial and sexual discrimination on that distribution. To help persons and organizations focus more effectively on ways to end discrimination, the Southern Regional Council will sponsor a conference on Equal Employment Opportunity in the South, to be held at the Sheraton-Emory Hotel in Atlanta on November 16 and 17.

The purpose of the conference is to fully and freely discuss the 1972 Amendments to the Civil Rights Law and the new authority of the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, which provide legal remedies for victims of employment discrimination. Resource persons from public agencies, private firms, organized labor, law firms, and civil rights groups specializing in employment will be on hand to help us define what the new law implies for all of us. We hope to encourage at the conference both an atmosphere of cooperation and the kind of dialogue required for identifying strategies to end employment discrimination.

The conference will focus on employment in two areas - in state and local government and in private employment. The program will emphasize the implications of the new provisions of the federal anti-discrimination law, which now covers public employment, unions with 15 or more members, and firms with federal contracts of $50,000 and above.

The Southern Regional Council cordially invites you to attend this conference. There is no fee, and two meals on Friday, November 16, will be provided at no cost. Unfortunately, the Council cannot provide for your travel and living expenses. Enclosed you will find an agenda and a registration form. We hope you will reply to our invitation as soon as possible.

A standing concern of the Southern Regional Council is the inequitable distribution of employment in the South, and, more particularly, the effects of racial and sexual discrimination represented in that distribution. This standing concern is one emphasis for the Conference on Equal Employment Opportunity in the South which the Council will sponsor next month (November 16, 17 - Sheraton Emory Hotel, Atlanta, Georgia). A second emphasis is the recent evolution of an important new body of law and major complementary initiatives by the Federal Government, providing legal remedies for victims of employment discrimination.

We are requesting that you serve as a panelist in a workshop on "What the Law Requires in Private Employment." The workshop is scheduled for Friday afternoon, November 16. The panel will consist of other individuals who are knowledgeable about the problem and legal provisions of Title VII and the 1972 Title VII amendments.

To our knowledge, most conferences since the 1972 Amendments have had the comparatively narrow focus of specific interest groups - employers, educational institutions, etc. Meanwhile, there is a specific unmet need to inform citizens of the intent and scope of the new provisions in the law. For this reason, the conference will consider ways in which the technical, legal provisions of the law can be presented in simpler fashion and publicized for the benefit of that much larger audience of both employers and employees who need good information as the basis for action. We think that you share with the Council the belief that racial and sexual discrimination can be effectively challenged if substantive information reaches those being adversely affected. The panel on which you would serve can offer through an exposure and discussion of the issues and strategy for systematically confronting inequitable distribution of employment.

The success of this endeavor rest with those who serve as resource persons. We believe that through objective and detailed analysis of caselaw and new statutory provisions, the program of the conference will render a service to participants and their constituency. We are dependent upon the contribution that you could personally make. The Council will pay your travel and living expenses.

It is our sincere hope that you will find it possible to serve in this capacity as we look forward to working together.

Sincerely,

DOMESTIC REPORT

FACTS Reports on organized anti-Semitism

JANUARY 1961, VOL. 14, NO. 1 — PUBLISHED BY THE ANTI-DEFAMATION LEAGUE OF B'NAI B'RITH

The Ku Klux Klans

The year 1960 was marked by a sharp increase in Ku Klux Klan activities and by consolidation of previously splintered Klan groups in seven states. These developments date, in point of time, from the start of the sit-in movement early in February.

Despite membership losses in some areas, on net balance the Klans probably gained strength in 1960 throughout the South as a whole. Total Klan membership is estimated at 35,000 to 50,000.

There are two major competing Klan groups in the South—the U. S. Klans, Knights of the Ku Klux Klan, which had been dominant for six years, and the newly-formed National Knights of the Ku Klux Klan. The National Knights, formed late in February—probably as a response to the sit-in movement and spreading school desegregation—is a loose confederation of splinter Klans in which each unit retains its identity and autonomy. Formation of the National Knights arrested—and reversed—an earlier trend toward continuing fragmentation of the Klans.

Some local Klans remain unaffiliated with these major Klan groups. The most important is the Alabama Knights of the Ku Klux Klan, Inc., which is gaining a dominant position in that state, and which reportedly is veering toward affiliation with the National Knights.

cf. most recent "button down" Bed Sheet

Both major Klan groups and the more important unaffiliated units are led by "activists" and extremists. Violence and anti-Semitism by the Klans is increasing, and the increase will probably continue.

The National Knights Of K.K.K.

The sit-in movement was launched at Greensboro, N. C. on February 2, 1960. A few weeks later, on the weekend of February 27-28, 1960, representatives of splinter Klan groups from seven southern states met at the Henry Grady Hotel in Atlanta and formed a "National Klan Committee" to coordinate their activities.

While there is no proof of a cause-and-effect relationship, the general evidence seems to support the assumption that the sit-ins—as well as the continuing spread of school desegregation—spurred that Klan action. The Klans represented at the Atlanta meeting had long been opposed to the U. S. Klans, Knights of the Ku Klux Klan which, with an estimated 15,000 to 20,000 members, had for six years been the largest single Klan group and the only one with any semblance of unity and cohesion.

The fact that opposition to the U. S. Klans was the only common bond uniting the splinter Klans that met in Atlanta dictated the structure of the new Klan group that emerged and which is now called the "National Knights of the Ku Klux Klan." It is a loose confederation of the splinter Klans involved, in which each unit retains its identity and its autonomy, and in which central leadership is on a rotating basis.

The National Knights is a going concern which has posed a threat to the supremacy of the U. S. Klans for the first time in six years. Following the original meeting in Atlanta, leaders of the National Knights met regularly to map plans and strategy—on March 12 at Chattanooga, Tennessee, on April 10 at Columbia, South Carolina, on May 22 at Atlanta, on July 17 at Orlando, Florida, and on October 23 at Savannah, Georgia.

The National Knights has already showed that it means business. At the original meeting in Atlanta, a proposal was made that the new Klan confederation show its strength by burning crosses throughout the South on the last weekend in March. Newspapers in the South reported that on Saturday, March 26, more than 1,000 crosses were burned in Alabama, Florida, Georgia, South Carolina and several other southern states. There was every indication that these cross-burnings were a coordinated effort.

There is evidence, moreover, that Klansmen from Florida and South Georgia were mobilized and that they took part in the race riots that shook Jacksonville, Florida, for almost a week, starting on "axe-handle" Saturday, August 27, 1960. Tactics to counteract the sit-in movement, of which Jacksonville was then a target, were discussed at a meeting of the Jacksonville klavern of the Florida Knights of the Ku Klux Klan four days earlier—on August 23rd—and a call went forth to other Klan units, urging them to converge on Jacksonville the following Saturday, and to bring Klan sympathizers with them. They were urged to leave all Klan identification at home and come in street clothes. Scores of Klansmen responded, and scores of other white men were also in downtown Jacksonville on Saturday morning, August 27th. Stores selling axe handles and baseball bats reported heavy sales, and one store alone reportedly sold 50 axe handles. Violence broke out by noon. During the disorders, shouts that "For every nigger, we got to kill two Jews!" were heard.

The Jacksonville race riot may well prove a harbinger of future Klan activity in other communities that become targets of the sit-in movement.

During the year, in addition to meetings, cross-burnings and violence, the National Knights of the KKK staged rallies and "speakings" with estimated attendances ranging from 200 to 800.

PAGINATION INCORRECT

U. S. Klans, Knights Of K.K.K.

Although the U. S. Klans, Knights of the KKK remains the largest single Klan group in the country, for the first time it finds itself faced with a real threat to its six-year supremacy—the threat posed by the National Knights.

Until his death, on August 1, 1960, Imperial Wizard Eldon Edwards of the U. S. Klans had rejected, at least in public statements, acts of violence by his group. He had sought to convey to the general public an image of the U. S. Klans as a respectable, loyal and non-subversive organization, but his critics contended that his real interest in the Klan was solely to make money for himself.

In any event, during his six years of leadership, the U. S. Klans held relatively few public parades or cross-burnings, and its main activity appeared to consist, for the most part, of an occasional picnic or fish-fry. Edwards' death on August 1, 1960 not only brought a new leader—Robert Lee (Wild Bill) Davidson—but also a radical change in the stated policies and in the actual activities of the U. S. Klans. Since taking power in October, Davidson—a former Grand Dragon of the U. S. Klans for the State of Georgia and a leader in the strong and active Macon unit—has embarked on an "activist" policy in the Klan effort to preserve segregation.

Unlike Edwards, who felt that the Klan could not "get away" with acts of violence, Davidson has publicly advocated extreme measures to preserve segregation.

At a big U. S. Klans meeting in a downtown Atlanta hotel on November 30, Davidson declared that the U. S. Klans would do everything possible to preserve segregation and shouted: "If it takes buckshot to keep the black race down, Klansmen will use it."

News dispatches also quoted an Atlanta attorney, identified as Klan legal adviser, as calling on Klansmen to burn the schools if necessary to prevent integration. Rev. E. E. George, Baptist evangelist and chaplain of the U. S. Klans, was quoted in the press as saying: "If it takes saving the American way at the cost of our lives, then let's make that sacrifice."

An Atlanta reporter wrote that the Klan speakers professed love for all races while shouting of "Jew boys" and "niggers," and that they talked of respect for law, order, and constituted authority while shouting of using buckshot, burning schools, and sacrificing lives in the Klan cause.

There are already signs that the U. S. Klans are carrying out Davidson's new "activist" policy. They are pushing newsstand distribution of their often anti-Semitic paper, "The Rebel." In the last weeks of 1960, members of the U. S. Klans staged several picketing demonstrations in downtown Atlanta. One of the demonstrations took place at a large department store where sit-in sympathizers also were picketing. Others took place at offices of the Atlanta Journal and Constitution and at the U. S. Post Office.

In January, 1961, when the University of Georgia, at Athens, was ordered by a Federal Court to integrate—and two Negro students were admitted—a riot took place at the campus on the night of January 11th. Newspaper reports on the riot noted the presence of Klansmen on the scene, in civilian clothes. The New York Times and other papers said they were led by Calvin Craig, Grand Dragon of the U. S. Klans for the State of Georgia. The Times said the Klansmen distributed copies of "The Rebel."

The Associated Press reported on January 12th that nine out-of-towners from the Atlanta area—all but one members of the KKK—had been arrested, and that the police had confiscated a small arsenal of loaded guns. The AP said two of the men were special Fulton County (Atlanta) deputy sheriffs. Six of the nine were charged with disorderly conduct and carrying a deadly weapon to a public gathering. Three were charged with disorderly conduct and carrying a deadly weapon to a public gathering. Three were charged with disorderly conduct only.

It is still too early to tell what other directions Davidson's new policy of "activism" will take, and how far he will go. It is also too early to tell whether the new policy will lead to membership gains for the U. S. Klans in its current struggle for supremacy with the National Knights. There have, however, been reports that the U. S. Klans have made substantial gains in Florida since Davidson took power, but other sources say the National Knights have also gained in Florida. Both reports are probably true, indicating a general gain in Florida by the Klans.

Alabama Knights of K. K. K.

There are still some local Klan groups in various parts of the South which are not affiliated with the U. S. Klans or the National Knights.

The most important of these, deserving special mention, is the Alabama Knights of the Ku Klux Klan, Inc. It is headed by Robert Shelton, former leader of the U. S. Klans in Alabama until he was ousted by Edwards last spring.

Shelton is an outspoken anti-Semite who at Tuscaloosa last October called the Governor of Alabama, whom he had publicly supported, a "tool of the Jews." Also in October, Shelton's Klansmen distributed copies of Conde McGinley's notoriously anti-Jewish newspaper, "Common Sense," at a large rally in Gadsden.

Shelton appears to be making rapid progress in absorbing local klaverns, including many formerly affiliated with the U. S. Klans, into the Alabama Knights, and it is considered possible that he may also capture the remaining klaverns of the U. S. Klans in the state.

Best available information indicates that, while the Klan situation in Alabama continues to be highly fluid, with frequent shifts of allegiance by various klaverns, Shelton's group is emerging as the dominant Klan. The U. S. Klans, until recently the strongest Klan group in the state, has suffered serious losses. These losses stem in part from the unpopularity of Rev. Alvin Horn, who succeeded Shelton as U. S. Klans leader in the state, in part from Shelton's own popularity, in part from the death of Eldon Edwards, and from disgust among Alabama Klansmen with the U. S. Klans in general.

Competent sources say it is possible that Shelton's Alabama Knights will soon affiliate with the National Knights of the Ku Klux Klan.

Estimated Klan Strength

It is obvious that reliable figures on the membership of the Klans, which are secret organizations per se, are hard to get. Estimates of Klan strength throughout the South are, at best, educated guesses.

The U. S. Klans, despite its losses in Alabama, probably remains the largest Klan. In 1958, its membership was estimated at anywhere from 12,000 to 15,000. Today, the best estimate puts the strength of the U. S. Klans at some 15,000 to 20,000—a rough gain in two years of about 3,000 to 5,000.

The strength of the newly-formed National Knights of the Ku Klux Klan is strictly a matter of conjecture. The total membership of the National Knights is probably comparable to, but somewhat below, that of the U. S. Klans—possibly 10,000 to 15,000.

A very liberal estimate of the unaffiliated Klans and klaverns throughout the South would put their strength at about 10,000 or 12,000.

In sum, total Southwide Klan membership is probably no more than 50,000, and may be about 35,000, or even somewhat less.

On net balance, the Klans have probably gained membership in the last year or so, and the formation of the National Knights early in 1960, with the resulting competition between that group and the U. S. Klans, will probably spur some further gains in the future.

It ought, however, to be emphasized that regardless of the trend of membership strength, the Klans were far more active during 1960 than they had been in years immediately preceding 1960.

Major Klan strength is centered in the states of Alabama, Florida, Georgia and South Carolina.

Three of these—Alabama, Florida and South Carolina—plus North Carolina, are battlegrounds in the fight for membership between the various Klans. In Alabama, the Shelton-led Alabama Knights appears to be the strongest Klan group. Should he eventually affiliate with the National Knights, it would be a major victory for the National Knights and might push their total membership past that of the U. S. Klans.

Another major area of competition is Florida, where the U. S. Klans and the National Knights appear to be evenly matched and to be making simultaneous gains.

In South Carolina, the Association of South Carolina Klans, headed by Robert Hodges and affiliated with the National Knights, seems to be stronger than the rival U. S. Knights.

In North Carolina, the U. S. Klans and the North Carolina Knights of the KKK, an affiliate of the National Knights, are competing for mere Klan remnants, and the hooded movement appears to be on the downgrade in the Tarheel State.

In Georgia, on the other hand, the U. S. Klans is overwhelmingly dominant and the few other Klan groups in the state pose no challenge to it. In Tennessee, the Dixie Klans, affiliated with the National Knights, is the strongest group and has absorbed some strength from the U. S. Knights.

The Klan is either entirely dormant or non-existent in Arkansas, Louisiana, Mississippi, Texas and Virginia.

The Klans And Anti-Semitism

The Klans have had a long history of anti-Jewish, as well as anti-Negro and anti-Catholic bigotry, and ever since May, 1954, when the U. S. Supreme Court outlawed segregation in public schools, the Klans increasingly have been channels for the distribution of anti-Semitic propaganda and forums for anti-Jewish speeches and diatribes. This is still true today.

The often anti-Jewish character of the U. S. Klans' paper, "The Rebel," has been noted. It ought also to be mentioned, in passing, that at a big U. S. Klans meeting in Atlanta last November 30, notorious non-Klan anti-Semites and extremists, whose names figured in the public prints at the time of the Atlanta Temple bombing of 1958, were present and handed out anti-Jewish literature. A Klan spokesman disavowed them, but they were not asked to leave.

As for the National Knights, seven of the eight splinter Klan leaders who formed that organization in Atlanta last February 27-28 were known as anti-Semites.

Of the major unaffiliated Klans, the anti-Semitism of Robert Shelton in Alabama has already been pointed out.

Finally, there is evidence of cooperation between the violently anti-Jewish National States Rights Party, now headquartered in Birmingham, and at least one Klan group. A recent and important N.S.R.P. meeting was held at the Chattanooga meeting hall of the Dixie Klans of Tennessee, which is affiliated with the National Knights. Jack Brown, a leader of the Dixie Klans, moreover, was a Presidential elector in Tennessee for the N.S.R.P. "national ticket" of Orval Faubus for President and John G. Crommelin for Vice-President. And in Florida, too, there have been indications of contact between N.S.R.P. leaders and pro-Klan elements.

What Can Be Expected

It takes no special powers of observation to state flatly that the American South is in a period of acute racial tension, and no special powers of prophecy to predict that such tension will increase. The process of school desegregation spreads, however slowly, and the Deep South is now the area of crisis. If New Orleans is the crucial scene today, Atlanta may be the tension spot tomorrow and another southern community the day after.

The continuing sit-in movement is another—and potent—factor pointing toward new tension situations.

As these movements—school desegragation and the sit-ins—penetrate new areas of the Deep South, where the "Klan mentality" is widespread, it would seem inevitable that they will be met by increasing resistance from foes of integration who are Klan members or Klan-minded extremists. The segregationist New Orleans housewives whose ugly antics were unforgettably recorded by the television news cameras wore no Klan regalia, but who would deny that their behavior epitomized a Klan mentality in all its hatred?

Legal strategems devised by the southern states may succeed in delaying the desegregation process, but in the long run seem doomed to ultimate failure. The same appears true of economic coercion aimed at the Negro, and as a matter of fact, recent developments suggest that the Negroes may be in as good a position to wield the weapon of economic boycott as is the white community of the South.

Finally, there is the weapon of physical force, intimidation and violence, which has been employed throughout the South by the Klans and other extremists for the last six years. Hundreds of bombings, beatings, cross-burnings and other threats have taken place since the Supreme Court decision of May 17, 1954.

The vast majority of white southerners, of course, reject such violence. But there are too many who are "Klan-minded" or who condone violence—who avert their eyes—although they would not themselves join the Klans or participate in lawless acts. It can be expected that this group will continue to look the other way or remain silent as the Klans and other extremists continue their dirty work, which seems inevitable.

Continuing Klan violence is inevitable, not only because the Klan leadership is "activist," but because by its own principles and its very nature, the Klan must use force, for if it is not coercive and violent, it is nothing and becomes merely a "hooded White Citizens Council." Veteran Klansman Bill Hendrix of Florida recently said that the only way the Klans could block integration was by "illegal means" like "bombings and burning schools." He said he was quitting the Klan movement because he didn't want to break the law.

That there will be new tension situations in the South is clear and that the Klan will seek to exploit them is almost a foregone conclusion. The Klan-tainted Jacksonville race riot of last August is an example of what can be expected in future crisis areas.

It has already been noted that anti-Semitic agitation by the Klans also seems likely to continue—and probably to increase, but whether Klan anti-Semitism will result in physical violence directed at Jews or Jewish properties remains to be seen. The potential for such action certainly is present.

Finally, it ought to be noted that the present Klans have not gained any appreciable measure of public acceptance or respectability in the South, and that they are not likely to achieve the mass followings they boasted in the 1920's and 1930's. They are still the targets of denunciation from responsible quarters and from reputable newspapers. But it may well be that in the 1960's public acceptance and respectability is not an essential ingredient for Klan growth, Klan activity or Klan violence.

APPENDIX

THE KU KLUX KLANS, STATE BY STATE

ALABAMA: Alabama Knights of the Ku Klux Klan, Inc., led by Robert Shelton, a former leader of the U. S. Klans in the state, is emerging as the dominant Klan.

U. S. Klans, Knights of the Ku Klux Klan, is now led by veteran Klansman Rev. Alvin H. Horn.

Minor Klans in Alabama are: Gulf Coast Klan, led by E. C. Barnard which has reportedly been absorbed by the Alabama Knights; Dixie Klans of Alabama, based in Anniston; and the Federated Knights of the KKK.

ARKANSAS: The Klans are reportedly dormant at present.

FLORIDA: The Grand Dragon of the U. S. Klans is Alvin Lemacks of Fernandina Beach, near Jacksonville.

The leader of the Florida Knights of the KKK, affiliated with the National Knights of the KKK, is Jason Kersey of New Smyrna Beach.

Minor Klans and Klan-type groups include the Association of Bedford Forrest Klans, the Southern Knights of the KKK and the Knights of the White Camellia.

GEORGIA: The U. S. Klans, Knights of the Ku Klux Klan, has its national headquarters in Atlanta and is clearly the dominant Klan in Georgia. It is now led by Robert Lee (Wild Bill) Davidson.

Minor Klans in Georgia are: Knights of the Ku Klux Klan, Inc., led by H. J. Jones, and the Association of Georgia Klans, based in Savannah, both of which are affiliated with the National Knights.

LOUISIANA and MISSISSIPPI: These states are White Citizens Councils territory and efforts to organize the Klans have never gotten off the ground.

NORTH CAROLINA: The U. S. Klans and the North Carolina Knights of the KKK are competing for the remnants of Klan membership in the state.

SOUTH CAROLINA: The dominant Klan is the Association of South Carolina Klans, headed by Robert Hodges, and affiliated with the National Knights of the KKK in which Hodges is also a leader.

Still a factor, despite substantial losses to the Hodges Klan group, is the U. S. Klans.

TENNESSEE: The dominant Klan in Tennessee apparently is the Dixie Klans, Knights of the Ku Klux Klan, based in Chattanooga and led by the Brown Brothers—Jack and Harry.

There has for some time been a unit of the U. S. Klans in the Chattanooga, Tennessee and Rossville, Georgia area (just across the state line from Chattanooga). There have been few reports of activity by this Klan in recent years.

TEXAS: Klan activity appears to be at a low ebb. Recent reports indicate that the Rev. R. E. Davis' Original Knights of the KKK has dwindled, and may be merely a "paper Klan."

VIRGINIA: Virginia has been practically free of Klan activity.

THE JOHN BIRCH SOCIETY

Abraham Lincoln once warned against people amongst us who cannot preach democracy, cannot practice it, cannot defend it and, above all, cannot meet the greatest obligation of adult Americans: to pass on to young Americans a tradition of respect and love for our way of life.

A reactionary organization which has been given nationwide publicity recently, and which has been causing concern in communities and school systems in many sections of the United States is the John Birch Society. It is an organization whose avowed purpose is "to promote less government, more responsibility, and a better world," and to "stop the Communists."

The Defense Commission has catalogued the nationally aired pronouncements and activities of Robert Welch and the members of the Welch organized John Birch Society, since July 1960, when Chicago Daily News columnist Jack Mabley first exposed them to public scrutiny.

The Society was organized in December 1958 in Indianapolis, Ind., where its founder, Robert H. W. Welch, Jr., a retired candy manufacturer, devoted two days to outlining his proposal to a group of eleven persons, gathered at his invitation. The Society got its name from that of a young missionary who had been killed 10 days after V-J Day and whose biography Welch had written.

In The Blue Book of the John Birch Society, a transcription of Welch's two-day talks in Indianapolis now used as a guideline for the formation of new units, Welch states that the Society would function almost entirely through small local chapters, described in several recent news-

GOP POLITICIANS RIDING THE WAVE OF REACTION

Ref Reg

National merger of right-wing groups is near

By Lawrence Emery

AMERICA'S ULTRAS are increasing their activities and there are growing signs that some Republican politicians will try to ride into office on the crest of the ferment they are stirring up.

The Rev. Dr. Billy James Hargis, evangelist director of the Christian Crusade, said on Jan. 14 at his Tulsa, Okla., headquarters that the formation of a nationwide league of right-wing organizations will be announced Feb. 2. He said that leaders of the new fraternity will meet regularly in Washington with conservative Congressmen, and that the chairman of the first meeting will be the Congressman who suggested the coalition. He did not identify him.

Hargis also announced that his Christian Crusade will sponsor a National Anti-Communist Leadership School in Tulsa from Jan. 29 to Feb. 2 with the John Birch Society and the National Indignation Convention as participants. Instructors at the 15 three-hour sessions will include Rep. Gordon R. Scherer (R-Ohio), a member of the House Committee on Un-American Activities, Eddie Rickenbacker, board chairman of Eastern Airlines, C. A. Willoughby, former chief of intelligence to Gen. MacArthur, and Mayor J. Bracken Lee of Salt Lake City. All the sessions will be televised locally.

THE SIGNING MAYORS: Dr. Fred C. Schwarz, Australian head of the Christian Anti-Communism Crusade, will conduct a five-day school from Jan. 29 through Feb. 2 at the Oakland Auditorium Theater. Fifty-five mayors of cities in the San Francisco Bay area have signed a proclamation designating Jan. 29-Feb. 2 as "Anti-Communism Week in our city to coincide with the dates of the San Francisco Bay region School of Anti-Communism." Mayor Christopher of San Francisco is one of the signers.

Former GOP Sen. William F. Knowland, now publisher of the Oakland Tribune, is on the "citizens committee" for the school. Instructors will include Sen. Thomas J. Dodd (D-Conn.) and Rep. Walter H. Judd (R-Minn.).

TSHOMBE COMING: Young Americans for Freedom, Inc., have announced a "giant conservative rally" at New York's

Rightist merger

Madison Square Garden on the evening of March 7. The youth group said that Moise Tshombe, leader of the Congo's secessionist province of Katanga, will be on hand to receive a special award.

Principal speakers will be Sens. Barry Goldwater (R-Ariz.) and John Tower (R-Tex.). Those receiving special awards will include Sen. Dodd, former general Edwin A. Walker, movie actor John Wayne, Herbert Hoover, Charles Edison, John Dos Passos and David Lawrence. Sponsor's seats at the rally are priced at $25, but that fee includes special mention in YAF's monthly publication, The New Guard.

Donald Shafto, the rally committee chairman, said: "We earnestly believe that a successful meeting will stimulate the conservative movement throughout the United States and indicate to the entire country that conservatism is on the march."

FANATICAN PARTY': On the political front, Democratic National Chairman John M. Bailey told a meeting of Democratic state chairmen and national committee members that the Democrats this year will have heavy going against a "curious union of Republicans and right-wing fanatics." He suggested this grouping should be named "the Fanatican Party."

Bailey warned that only once in the last 60 years has the party in power gained Congressional seats in the middle of Presidential terms. He said: "The Republicans are more and more taking their ideas from the reckless radicals of the far right and echoing the efforts of these extremist agitators to breed fear and suspicion in our society." He called them "political witch doctors, retired martinets and neurotic victims of the neo-fascist lecture circuit."

NIXON'S ROLE: In California Rep. John Rousselot, an acknowledged member of the Birch Society, has announced that he will not run against Sen. Thomas H. Kuchel, who is considered a moderate Republican. He said he made his decision after conferring with Richard Nixon, Goldwater and Robert J. W. Welch, Birch Society leader. But Kuchel will still be opposed by Howard Jarvis, a conservative Los Angeles businessman, and Loyd Wright, former president of the American Bar Association and prominent in ultra activities in Los Angeles.

Gov. Edmund G. Brown of California said in a speech at the National Press Club in Washington that Nixon "is not joining the fight against the ultra-right wing, although these extremists are a strong force in our state and in his party."

He noted that Birchers have already captured the Los Angeles Young Republican Club "while Nixon and other Republican leaders look away . . . He has stepped away from those who are fighting the political primitives, and he apparently wants their money and support."

GOP DEBATE: Sen. Clifford P. Case (N.J.), a moderate Republican, told the 49th annual session of the Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith that the two-party system faces a serious threat if Republicans should be "intimidated or seduced" by the ultras. He said the Republican Party "is a tempting target" to many ultra groups, and that "there are a few Republicans who may be tempted." Such a development, he warned, "would threaten the usefulness, if not the very existence, of the Republican Party as an effective member of the two-party system."

A SIGN OF THE TIMES?
Turn to the right indicated

But other Republicans were taking a different tack. At a two-day session of the Republican National Committee in Oklahoma City, Goldwater, who is also chairman of the Republican Senate Campaign Committee, urged his colleagues to make the GOP "a political instrument clearly recognizable as something apart and different from that collection of promises and panaceas which parades across the scene behind the Democratic donkey."

Goldwater said the GOP must be dedicated to "a political philosophy so easily understood, so crystal-clear in all its manifestations as to permit the American people to recognize us for what we truly are."

SENATE HEARINGS: At a meeting of 500 conservatives under the auspices of Human Events, a right-wing newsletter in Washington, Rep. William E. Miller (N.Y.), chairman of the Republican National Committee, attacked aid to education as leading to Federal control of the public schools and said medical care for the aged through Social Security means the "socialization" of the medical profession. Other speakers at the two-day session included Sen. Tower and commentator Fulton Lewis Jr. who praised the John Birch Society.

The Republicans need to win 44 seats in the November elections to gain control of the House of Representatives.

The role of the military in ultra politics came into the news again as a special Senate Subcommittee opened hearings on Jan. 23 on charges that the Pentagon had "muzzled" the brass by censoring their public speeches and establishing new regulations governing their participation in seminars and other forums to "educate" the general public on the red menace. The subcommittee will also study troop indoctrination programs.

OPEN, EXCEPT . . .: The hearings will be conducted by Sen. John Stennis (D-Miss.). The special panel was set up at the instigation of Sens. Strom Thurmond (D-S.C.) and Goldwater following the right-wing uproar over the removal of Major Gen. Edwin E. Walker from his command in Germany and his eventual resignation last November. Stennis promised open hearings "except in those instances where the nation's security dictates that the hearings be closed."

Lawyer for the subcommittee is James Kendall, 43, a former assistant attorney general of Mississippi and the man who rewrote that state's school laws to get around the Supreme Court's desegregation decision.

Ex-general Walker himself was speaking around the country. At a rally of 3,500 in Jackson, Miss., he said that state is leading the fight to preserve the union. He told his audience that, as Mississippians, "the communists are afraid of you. They distrust you and the power of your state sovereignty and your great unity of purpose. They are aware of your leadership and of you as a great symbol in the cause of freedom everywhere."

THE 'RED SWEDE': Walker cited Vice President Lyndon Johnson and Sen. J. William Fulbright as examples of left-wing success in converting American politicians. He also told the rally that the UN is immoral and that the late Dag Hammarskjold was a "Red Swede who took instructions from Moscow."

The latter remark lost him the support of the New York Journal-American, a Hearst paper, which commented editorially that he had "decreased his own stature." Citing the remark about Hammarskjold, the paper said: "This will come as a surprise to Khrushchev who considered Mr. Hammarskjold a singularly effective enemy of communism and did his utmost to destroy him. Gen. Walker's use of the distortion technique of extremism does him no good."

Robert Welch, speaking to an audience of more than 1,000 at a luncheon of the Commonwealth Club of California in San Francisco, said there is a drive in many countries to discredit the military. Asked why so many ranking officers are attracted to right-wing causes, he said the answer is easy: "They are our most patriotic citizens."

Welch also described the close working relationships between his Birch Society and the Schwarz Crusade:

"Dr. Schwarz is doing a grand job of waking up people to the communist menace. As he himself has said, he does not have a continuing organization of the action type. Many of our members help to set up Dr. Schwarz's schools along with others and we frankly do our best to take the people who have been stirred up and awakened and alarmed by him to get them together into the John Birch Society as action groups to do something about it all."

CHICAGO FIELD DAY: An example of ultra influence was given at the recent five-day annual convention of the American Farm Bureau Federation in Chicago. The country's largest farm organization took these stands:

- Regretted the censure of Gen. Walker "for encouraging and conducting pro-American education."
- Advocated "a program of education for the armed services regarding the dangers of communism and socialism."
- Warned "against the infiltration of our schools by communist propaganda."
- Backed the House Committee on Un-American Activities and the Senate Internal Security subcommittee because they have "drawn attention to subversive activities and the infiltration of our government and public institutions by persons with communist sympathies."
- Warned that "the trend toward increased centralization of power in the Federal government has led us far into socialism, which is the stepping stone to communism."
- Opposed Federal aid to education.
- Advocated publication of welfare rolls.
- Opposed medical care for the aged through Social Security.
- Advocated the right of children to start work at 12.
- Opposed any minimum wage and hour law for farm workers.
- Urged unrestricted use of Mexican farm labor.
- Advocated state and national right-to-work laws to outlaw "compulsory unionism."

WHAT PRICE VIOLENCE?

While it is still too early to determine the long-range effects of the recent riots on Mississippi's economy, there seems little doubt that they will be profound, prolonged, and painful.

The heavy price Mississippi can be expected to pay for the violence at Oxford has been the subject of several recent newspaper and magazine articles. These excerpts are taken from a selection of those articles.

* * * * *

Wall Street Journal, September 26:

> "Many Mississippi businessmen are privately expressing concern that mounting racial strife may depress the state's economy.
> "In Jackson . . . state officials responsible for attracting new industry are privately apprehensive about whether this growth can continue if the racial conflict takes a violent turn. Although most are understandably reluctant to discuss their views, it is apparent they feel the university crisis is upsetting their plans.
> "A number of businessmen in Mississippi agree, as does a leading plant location specialist outside the state.
> "'In the past 15 years, we've put about 60 plants into Mississippi - that's roughly four a year. But in the last few years, the rate has been more like one or two a year.' To this specialist, the racial tension clearly is responsible for keeping the plants away."

Atlanta Constitution Business Editor Jim Montgomery in a column which appeared October 3:

> "Mississippi's bitterly violent defiance of law and order has failed in all respects save one.
> "It has succeeded only in committing economic suicide.

"It has in a single night of terror undone years of costly effort to lure new industry within its borders. It has, in effect, warned industry to stay away.

"Mississippi will no doubt continue to offer cheap labor, huge tax concessions and other give-aways . . . .

"But for most of the nation's industries, no amount of monetary inducement could offset the risk of moving into a state whose chief executive not only says but also shows that he cannot or will not preserve the peace.

"And even those major corporations who might otherwise be tempted to accept Mississippi's desperately proffered gifts would founder on personnel resistance, for it is inconceivable that the executives needed to run a new plant would agree to moving their families into a state whose law enforcement officers stand idly by as mobs riot."

Staff writer Rick Tuttle, who was on the scene at Oxford, in the Miami Herald, October 7:

"The State of Mississippi, her people and her future have been deeply wounded by the explosion here.

"It will be decades before the wounds heal.

"This is the grim outlook of moderates in Mississippi - the business and professional leaders who did not speak out against Gov. Ross Barnett until it was too late - until blood ran in the streets of this quiet university town.

"Now they are uniting and trying to put out the flames of hatred which they feel Barnett will continue to fan.

"But all agree the damage has been done. The words 'Oxford' and 'Mississippi' and 'James Meredith' for years will bring to mind death and hatred and racial prejudice.

"There are many ways Mississippi has been hurt by the explosion of violence, but the most severe is probably economic. Barnett has done a good job of attracting industry to Mississippi . . . . But Arkansas and Little Rock experienced a new-industry drought for years after federal troops protected Negro students there.

"'Only recently has industry started going back into Little Rock and the racial trouble has been blamed,' a Herald source said. 'And what happened at Little Rock was child's play compared with this.'

"Without industry Mississippi cannot pull itself out of the poverty and low educational standards that so often accompany agrarian economies. Now the outlook for industry is even blacker.

"Another serious injury to the state - very close behind the economic one - is to the University of Mississippi itself. It may retain its accreditation, but it will probably lose some of its high caliber professors and certainly stands a slim chance of getting any new ones.

"Academic freedom at Ole Miss has already been choked by the Mississippi Legislature, according to professors, and even a crisis as grave as the Meredith case did not bring a protest from the faculty.

"One can only guess what lies ahead for Mississippi now. But those who are willing to guess see a bleak future in which the moderate voice in the state faces years of struggle just to prevent violence, much less swing the elective leadership away from extremists."

In Business Week, October 6, an article titled "The Price of Defiance," with the sub-heading, "Mississippi's battle with the federal government over Negro college student seems to be simmering down, but the state may be paying an economic toll for years to come":

"James Meredith, Negro, was enrolled in the University of Mississippi and was attending class. The turmoil was not over. Ripples were spreading from Oxford - and rolling around the world.

"But thoughtful citizens were trying to read the future - and to many in business it seemed that Mississippi might be paying a price for years to come.

"For one thing, Arkansas' experience following the 1957 troubles in Little Rock indicates that industry may be reluctant to move to Mississippi.

"Mississippi is a poorer state to begin with - its per capita income was $1,229 last year, the nation's lowest - and its racial problem is more deepseated than that of most Southern states. It has the highest percentage of Negro residents - 45% - of any state. And, as the National Urban League, a 52-year-old interracial organization dedicated to Negro economic progress, points out, Mississippi is the only state in which it has never had any affiliates or activities.

"The Magnolia State enjoyed its biggest rush of new industry under BAWI /balance agriculture with industry/ last year, with 83 new plants and 68 expansions of existing facilities announced. Most of these are small, but the total adds up to a considerable number of new jobs. The list includes: General Cable Corp., 400 employees; General Tire & Rubber Co., 60; Magnavox Co., 125; Normandie Mills, 380; Southbridge Plastics, 400.

"Two big plums were announced in 1961. The first is the Standard Oil of Kentucky refinery at Pascagoula, which will employ 700 and represents an investment of $125-million. Gov. Ross Barnett pointed out at the time of the announcement that total new plant investment for Mississippi for the three previous years came to only $113-million. Construction of the refinery is well under way.

"A second major plum for Mississippi is the 13,300-acre missile testing range in Hancock County also on the Gulf. Early estimates projected a $300-million-to-$400-million investment in Hancock.

"Only time will tell, of course, how seriously the pace of private and federal investment in Mississippi will be affected by the Oxford affair. But an indirect threat to the state's economy became apparent early this week when the Southern College Accreditation Board warned Gov. Barnett that unless he changes his tactics accreditation of 'Ole Miss' and other state colleges might be withdrawn. Such a move would be likely to discourage industrialists from moving their families to the state.

"Loss of accreditation would also mean withdrawal of federal and private grants for scholarships and research. The Health, Education & Welfare Dept. has already moved to withhold money until the 'situation is clarified.'"

Editorial in the Knoxville News-Sentinel October 6:

"Mississippi's drive to lure new industry - an effort which has met with some success up to now - is endangered by the riots at Ole Miss. Out-of-state businessmen have been reluctant to move into a state deeply troubled by racial strife.

"Take Little Rock, Ark., for example. In the two years before the riots at Little Rock's Central High School, 17 new plants moved into the city; they employed 1200 persons. But in four years since the troubles only 13 new plants have sprung up in the city. They employ less than 1000.

"If nothing else, practical business reasons alone should stir Mississippi leaders to restore and maintain order as rapidly as possible. The state lags behind its neighbors economically and further sociological upsets will make it harder for Mississippi to catch up."

Newsweek, October 22, in the Business and Finance Section:

"For 26 years, Mississippi has been luring industries into the state in an effort to boost its underdeveloped economy. But immediately after the recent riots at the University of Mississippi one state industrial salesman heard from eight Northern industrialists who had been considering moving in - and four of them said they were bowing out. The reason given by a Midwest furniture manufacturer: 'It looks like you people are being led by the wrong element.'

"In two terse words, William B. Selah Jr., director of the Southwest Mississippi Area Development Commission, expressed the reaction of a good many of the state's businessmen: 'Violence hurts.' A Jackson banker predicted gloomily: 'I don't think we're going to have much industry running our way for a while.' And a national manufacturer of hard goods told its Mississippi plant in bitter jest: 'From now on, put "Made in North Carolina" on our products.'

"Some of the state's recruiters reported business as usual; Barnett himself, in several speeches last week, read a number of pre-crisis testimonials he had received from industrialists. But most officials were apprehensive. One said: 'We don't need to be reminded of what happened in Little Rock.'

"The parallel was ominous. When Little Rock's school-integration crisis erupted in September 1957, the city and state were thriving. In the previous two years, industrial investment in the state totaled $248 million; Little Rock alone gained ten new plants, worth $3.4 million and adding 1,072 jobs to the city's payroll. In the two years after Federal troops marched into Little Rock, the state's investment fell to $190.6 million; for three years, not a single company employing more than fifteen people moved into the Little Rock area. Last year, with memories of the turbulence fading, one new plant was built for $1.6 million; this year another firm plans a $780,000 plant.

"Racial strife in Arkansas 'did have an effect,' Winthrop Rockefeller, leading financier and chairman of the Industrial Development Commission, said last week, 'but it would be extraordinarily difficult to put a price tag on it.'

"And, as Little Rock's case amply illustrates, the effects of racial strife can last a long time."

The New York Times, October 21:

"Mississippi, which has striven desperately since 1936 to reinforce its traditional cotton economy with a solid layer of industrial jobs, now faces an uncertain future because of the tragic violence over desegregation at the University of Mississippi.

"The situation has already caused the Mississippi Agricultural and Industrial Board, the state's official industrial development agency, to cancel its Oct. 25 dinner in Chicago, where Gov. Ross Barnett was scheduled to play host to more than 200 Midwest industrialists.

"No public announcement has been made by the board, but an industrialist who was to have participated in the industrial junket said:

'We can't send Barnett out of the state at this time.'

"Governor Barnett had put himself in the forefront as the state's industrial salesman by making daily telephone calls to Northern industrialists and also visiting them at their home offices.

"Now it it felt he has become a symbol of racial violence at the univeristy because of his defiance of the Federal courts.

"When the case became a top national and international story, Governor Barnett received publicity that could hardly help the state's case for persuading the nation's business and industry leaders to build plants in Mississippi.

"One leader of that organization [Northeast Mississippi Industrial Development Council] said: 'I think the Ole Miss incident is going to affect us. Wherever you have violence, it's bound to hurt.'

"A south Mississippi regional industrial leader said he was 'very concerned and very upset over what it is going to do to us.' Even before the rioting, he said, 'several manufacturers had stopped putting "made in Mississippi" labels on their products,' which are marketed nationally.

"Some reaction has shown up in the channels of investment capital that Eastern and Northern financial houses make available to Mississippi bankers, but one Mississippi banker said 'it isn't anything serious at this point.'

"But he noted: 'I don't think we're going to have much industry running our way for a while. In fact, it could hurt us for a long while.'"

Organized labor's initiative in Los Angeles has demonstrated that ultra-right attempts to invade the schools can be beaten back—by marshalling the facts, alerting community leaders and informing the public.

In southern California ultra-right crackpots and more respectable reactionaries find a common meeting ground in their unending campaigns of pressure on the school system. They make common cause in their efforts to transform the Bill of Rights into a museum piece—ritually venerated on holiday occasions but very dead in practice.

Among the more substantial groups striving to substitute indoctrination for education and retrogressive mass propaganda for public information are the Coast Federal Savings and Loan Association (third largest business of its kind in the nation) and its two adjuncts, the Bill of Rights Commemoration Committee and the Free Enterprise Department.

Not that Coast Federal stands alone. Far from it. Los Angeles seems to be the capital of authoritarian extremism.

This area hosts the national headquarters of rabble-rouser Gerald L. K. Smith and Dr. Fred Schwarz of the Christian Anti-Communism Crusade; sports three ex-congressmen who were apologists for the John Birch Society while in office, one of whom is now on the Birch paid staff; boasts the headquarters of the President of the California Young Republicans, who openly sought Birch support for his election, serves as the fountainhead of what the immediate past President of the California Republican Assembly called a Birch "conspiracy to capture control" of the Republican Party; and prolongs the uproar over the baseless charges of an "imbalance to the left" on state college faculties.

"Thank you for your nice publicity about Coast Federal in your Los Angeles Citizen," said a spokesman for the loan association when the projected public exposure of its authoritarian extremism was announced by the County Federation of Labor's weekly paper.

The words were in the arrogant tone adopted by Coast Federal President Joe Crail and his staff as the house style for dealing with criticism and opposition.

The statement was uttered, however, before the series of events which culminated in repudiation of Crail's activities by the prominent civic leaders who had served unwittingly as his figureheads. And before the exclusion of his material from the schools which had served for so long as a transmission belt for his propaganda.

Crail's confidence was bred of the power commanded by the lavish use of money—over $250,000 spent by Coast Federal annually for staff, materials and mass media to promote his personal views and programs. It seemed justified by years of acquiescence on the part of many community leaders, government authorities and school officials.

The first major challenge to Crail's influence resulted from the study of his operations issued as a pamphlet by the Los Angeles County Federation of Labor. It was a part of "a systematic program of examining and exposing to public scrutiny the activities of authoritarian extremist groups."

In introducing the pamphlet, W. J. Bassett, Secretary-Treasurer of the Federation, declared: "Of particular concern are the increasing number of businessmen who have lately come to believe that they can safely indulge their far-out political fancies under a newly discovered foolproof disguise—an ostensible fight against the communist danger as a cloak for espousing an equally evil and perilous ultra-right reaction."

The pamphlet described a questionnaire circulated by Coast Federal's "Free Enterprise Department" under the title "Knowledge Is Freedom—Rate Your Americanism I.Q." Its 133 questions apparently reflected a cross-section of the ideas and attitudes of Crail and his staff.

For example, the questionnaire directed those answering to "Score 2 points for each 'approve' answer . . ." on such items as "Right To Work Law" (question 32), "John Birch Society" (question 45). Similarly, scores could be improved by checking the "disapprove" space beside the following:

Minimum wage laws; extension of Social Security; nationalized medicine; subsidies to farmers; Tennessee Valley Authority; federal aid to education; long-range foreign aid; the International Labor Organization; the Human Rights Convention; the United Nations; Radio Free Europe; Voice of America; The Peace Corps; League of Women Voters.

Thus, too, one's "Americanism" rating went down if the following statements were perchance marked as truths rather than "myths" on the questionnaire:

—"Human rights are above property rights."

—"By assisting backward nations, the U.S. Government will teach them the ideals of freedom."

—"Society benefits from minimum wage laws as the standard of living is increased."

—"The Government must provide medical care for the aged for they are unable to provide for themselves."

A score of over 110 on the questionnaire "rating scale" was adjudged "libertarian" by Coast Federal standards. Below that score the classifications were:

"Varying degrees of Republicans and Independent Democrats 51-109
"New Frontiersman 30- 50
"Are you sure you wouldn't prefer England or points farther East? . . . . . Under 30"

Ironically, it was the so-called "Bill of Rights Commemoration Committee," chaired by Joe Crail, functioning under tight control of one of his staff members and housed in Coast Federal's building, that produced the most pernicious propaganda. Most of the prominent public figures whose names appeared over the years on the "Executive Committee" of this group apparently had little to do with preparing the material it published and were largely unaware of its activities.

Among them were the Mayor of Los Angeles, the Chairman of the County Board of Supervisors, the President of the University of California, the superintendents of city and county school systems and leaders of business, church and civic groups, both liberal and conservative.

The Commemoration Committee sponsored an essay contest on the Bill of Rights among high school students in the county school system. Prize money was furnished by Coast Federal—to the tune of thousands of dollars over the years.

Some of the prize-winning essays were then reproduced in an elaborate booklet published annually under the imprint of the Commemoration Committee with the designation "Program and Speakers Manual" or "Digest."

As the contest winners were chosen by a committee established by the school system, the student essays were of a consistently higher quality than other material by "experts" reprinted in the Manuals.

Some of the statements, articles and speeches circulated in the name of the Commemoration Committee over the years were balanced, sound and thoughtful. But viewed as a whole, the material was distinctly slanted—and sometimes made a mockery of the Bill of Rights itself. Frequently this resulted from a subtle shading of tone, a particular emphasis in theme, a choice of writers. Just as often, however, the material was blatantly biased, vulgarly anti-democratic and politically partisan.

Thus the Speaker's Manuals (or Digests) placed heavy stress on alleged usurpation of states' rights by the federal government and courts to the purported detriment of the people; the imminence of total loss of freedoms, particularly property rights; the evil of social welfare and social security programs; the alleged undermining of freedom by programs of federal aid for solving social and economic problems. No counter-balancing view was presented.

Within the recurrent theme of the evils of federal government action, a constant refrain was encroachment by the federal judiciary. The 1955 Manual quoted from a speech by Congressman Howard W. Smith of Virginia:

"We have reached a point of centralized government that has swallowed up the reserve states' rights. We have transferred the administration of justice away from home into the strange and faraway hands of the federal courts."

One of the strong motivations for the attacks on the U.S. Supreme Court was opposition to its decisions against racial discrimination and segregation. This was made clear by the following words of Spruille Braden in a three-page reprint of his speech in the 1960 Speakers Digest:

"Abuses and distorted interpretations of the Bill of Rights have been fortified in recent years by the Supreme Court's and other judicial findings or decrees usurping legislative powers, making policy and, in effect, amending the Bill of Rights and Constitution . . .

"But what deference for the first 10 amendments can we expect from a Supreme Court which based a most important decision, not on the Constitution or Bill of Rights, on law or precedent, but on philosophical speculations in a book by Gunnar Myrdal . . ."

In most instances where federal "encroachment" was attacked in the Manual, what was really involved was the issue of the federal protection of human rights against infringement by state or local authorities. So the Manuals are slanted against not only equal rights action but also against safeguards of the right of collective bargaining.

For example, the concluding paragraph of an article in the 1961 Manual by the Honorable M. T. Phelps (former Arizona judge) reads:

"Even the jurisdiction of courts of sovereign states in labor disputes, where it is alleged (whether true or not) that the Fair Labor Practice Act has been violated, has been denied until consent of the National Labor Relations Board has been procured. This is true even though the NLRB had previously rejected jurisdiction of the dispute."

Disparagement of the democratic process was combined with hostility towards federal programs of social concern and the "welfare state."

In this vein, President Franklin D. Roosevelt was assailed in an article by Felix Morley in the 1959 Manual:

". . . there is little doubt that in this way we have been chiseling at freedom for a long time . . . President Roosevelt's 'four freedoms' statement, made nearly a year before Pearl Harbor, is a case in point . . .

". . . This is emphasized by a glance at the other pair of freedoms—'from want' and 'from fear'—which Mr. Roosevelt said it is the duty of government to provide. These have actually no relation to freedom, properly defined and understood . . .

". . . One could wish that the 'four freedoms' speech had been a mere oratorical gesture, with no continuing significance for the problems of today. Unfortunately, it was the basis of the whole so-called 'Economic Bill of Rights' and therefore the fountainhead from which the current flood of welfare spending continues to pour forth . . ."

Even as the Manuals assailed programs of social concern in general, so did they also attack specific measures—with never a word of reply.

Thus in a page-and-a-half of excerpts in the 1960 Manual, Senator Barry Goldwater was quoted as saying:

". . . You and I must decide whether we intend to continue down the road of federal aid and federal subsidies. Last year the federal Congress passed the so-called 'Defense Education Act.' This year they are being urged to pass a federal subsidy for the construction of schools. We have federal aid for highways. These programs always start small and end big . . .

". . . If we continue down this road, we will become a people who will be leaning on Uncle Sam . . ."

The Manuals, together with other materials, were over the years widely distributed to teachers and students, PTA leaders, civic groups and the general public.

When the County Federation of Labor's pamphlet on Coast Federal began to circulate, intense interest was generated—within the Bill of Rights Commemoration Committee itself no less than among other civic leaders and school-centered groups.

Further evidence, gathered independently of the Federation, was made available. Additional information was submitted to the school system administrators from various sources. Protests were made to the City and County Boards of Education and public hearings were proposed.

A closed meeting of the Bill of Rights Commemoration Committee was called by the Chairman of the County Board of Supervisors. Members present discussed the establishment of objective standards for materials issued in the Committee's name and the possible formation of a screening committee.

In the meantime, the New York Times' western edition carried a lengthy story on the expose by the Federation and quoted Joe Crail as replying:

"They're unwitting dupes of the Communists. They are just carrying out the Communist line. They're pretty ignorant about what's going on. They'll learn."

In the ensuing weeks, newspapers reported several public resignations from the Bill of Rights Commemoration Committee, including that of the Mayor and the Chairman of the County Board of Supervisors. Others resigned without public fanfare.

What had happened to the Committee was made glaringly evident when the new Manual was issued in December of 1962. For the first time the list of Committee members was entirely omitted, except for the name of Chairman Joe Crail.

An offshoot of the Committee, a separate committee with the sole function of conducting an annual observance at the City Council, requested permission in January 1963 to once again conduct its ceremonies. Crail's name was nowhere mentioned in connection with the request. There was a minor flurry of excitement as Councilmen endeavored to learn whether the group was part of Crail's operation.

The observance was subsequently held, but without Crail. Even so, several of the Councilmen protested.

During the same period the County school system quietly dropped the essay contest which had been backed by Coast Federal contributions and the city schools ceased using his material.

Since then Crail has abandoned all pretense that his Free Enterprise Department and his controlled Bill of Rights Commemoration Committee were separate entities. Interested persons are provided materials from both at the same office in the Coast Federal Building.

Despite these setbacks for Crail, it cannot be said that the last battle has yet been fought. He will undoubtedly try a new offensive to regain access to the schools, restore his community position and redeem his prestige.

Perhaps the answer lies in part in another direction. Citing Coast Federal as a case in point, the California Assembly Subcommittee on Tax Administration declared last November:

"We believe that the public should not be required to subsidize, through tax deductibility, the propagation of political opinions of corporate executives."

The subcommittee recommended specific revision of state tax laws. Federal tax reform along similar lines would appear to be an imperative need.

But in any event, labor has shown that by exposing authoritarian extremist groups to public scrutiny, they can be driven into retreat.

ANNOUNCING—
The 1963 Appeal
(Page 4)

FAREWELL TO AN OLD FRIEND

Henry Edward Schultz

ADL's national chairman tells why the Joint Defense Appeal died.

By Henry Edward Schultz

On December 31, 1962, the Joint Defense Appeal, a vigorous and useful organism on the American Jewish scene, went out of existence. In its twenty-one years of life, the Joint Defense Appeal raised many millions of dollars which it divided equally between the American Jewish Committee and the Anti-Defamation League. At the time of its demise, it was raising over five million dollars annually.

The saving of fund-raising expense and the avoidance of multiple appeals were not all of the benefits derived from the Joint Defense Appeal. It attracted to its banner many devoted citizens anxious to enlist in the fight against anti-Semitism and discrimination, and who were not partisans of either of the two agencies which were beneficiaries of the funds raised.

In 1963 both the American Jewish Committee and the Anti-Defamation League will be conducting independent campaigns accompanied by all of the competitive zeal which is an inevitable by-product of the dissolution. In the years of its growth to maturity, the Joint Defense Appeal had truly developed into a heavyweight in the fund-raising field—a strong and vital instrumentality. We deplore its passing and are saddened by it.

Through the decades in which the Joint Defense Appeal contract and arrangement remained in effect, and in the many negotiations which led to its renewal over the years, many differences of opinion between the beneficiary agencies arose. All were resolved by amicable adjustment, until 1962, when the protracted negotiations finally reached a stalemate and dissolution became inevitable. While the details of the negotiations were complicated, the issues upon which agreement failed were really quite simple.

The American Jewish Committee, within its own councils, had come to the conclusion that it should no longer concentrate its major efforts and resources in the field of domestic community relations, but instead should expand into the problems of Jewish communities throughout the world. An expanded international operation required funds which the Joint Defense Appeal could not, in the foreseeable future, adequately provide. Accordingly, the representatives of the American Jewish Committee insisted, as a prerequisite in the negotiations, upon the unfettered right to raise unlimited funds for its overseas and domestic programs other than its human relations activities, while continuing to be the recipient of 50 per cent of the Joint Defense Appeal funds. The restrictions upon Anti-Defamation League raising funds outside of the Joint Defense Appeal were, however, to continue without change.

It quickly became obvious that to permit the American Jewish Committee to raise large sums by a direct appeal to individuals and communities, in competition with the Joint Defense Appeal, would be completely destructive and would inevitably stultify and extinguish the Joint Defense Appeal. It was equally apparent that the leadership of the American Jewish Committee, confronted with the task of raising large sums outside of the Joint Defense Appeal, would be less able to contribute their efforts and talents to the growth and continued progress of the Joint Defense Appeal. These factors combined to make the proposals untenable in the light of the history and tradition, and the years of building, which had been expended on behalf of the Joint Defense Appeal.

In support of their position, the skilled negotiators for the American Jewish Committee brought to the bargaining table an adroit proposal—ingenious and plausible—which, however, turned out to be the rock upon which the continued relationship foundered. The new principle advanced was brilliant in its simplicity and attractively presented. In its new posture and reorganization, the American Jewish Committee would now consist of three divisions, only one of which—an "Institute of Human Relations"—would be concerned with domestic community relations problems. The other two facets of the program, a new giant overseas opera-

50th Annual Meeting Issue

HERE WE HAVE PLANTED FREEDOM

By JOHN F. KENNEDY

I AM honored to receive this award from an organization which, on its fiftieth anniversary, should, itself, be receiving an honor for distinguished contribution to the enrichment of America's democratic legacy. Your tireless pursuit of equality of treatment for all Americans has made a lasting and substantial contribution to our democracy.

The men who first shaped the democratic legacy that you honor tonight were filled with a sense of commitment and of wonder at the importance of the events in which they were participating. It was not only, as John Adams exalted, that they were to have the unique opportunity to write a new Constitution and form a new government and begin a new nation; it was also the deep conviction, as later expressed by Walt Whitman, that here we have planted the standard of freedom, and here we will test the capacities of men for self-government.

America was to be the great experiment, a testing ground for political liberty, a model for democratic government, and although the first task was to mold a nation on these principles here on this continent, we would also lead the fight against its tyranny on all continents. In short, wrote Jefferson to Adams, "The flames kindled on the 4th of July 1776 have spread over too much of the globe to be extinguished by the feeble energies of despotism." Although Jefferson also foresaw that to attain liberty in other parts of the globe, years of desolation must pass over.

ALMOST two centuries have passed since a small, weak nation, a beachhead on a continent, began the great experiment of democracy in a world where government by consent of the governed had been extinguished for two thousand years. As Jefferson prophesied, there have been many years of desolation and destruction. It seems to me that it is our responsibility in this year of change and hope to prove that we are equal to this great inheritance, to make it possible for the four freedoms which Franklin Roosevelt so eloquently described in another time of peril and danger twenty years ago—to make sure that those four freedoms, indeed the great concept of indivisible freedom, are made available to all of our people, to all of our citizens, and to bear our part of the burden, as we have for so many years, in making that great concept available to all people.

THIS is a great inheritance. It is a proud privilege to be a citizen of the great republic, to hear its songs sung, to realize that we are the descendants of forty million people who left other countries, other familiar scenes, to come here to the United States to build a new life, to make a new opportunity for themselves and their children.

I think it is not a burden, but a privilege to have the chance in 1963 to share that great concept which was felt so deeply among all of our people then, to make this really, as it was for them, a new world, a new world for us, and, indeed, for all those who look to us.

That is what this organization has stood for for fifty years. That is what this country has stood for for two hundred years, and that is what this country will continue to stand for.

On January 31, 1963, President Kennedy was presented with ADL's America's Democratic Legacy Award in Washington, D. C. This is his speech of acceptance.

THE NEW SEGREGATION

Americans are ghettoizing themselves by economic and social class, warns this distinguished business leader. But if we are to understand each other, we must come closer together.

By Ralph Lazarus

We are now building a new kind of society. For the first time since tillage of the soil made the existence of towns and then cities possible six to eight thousand years ago, man has reversed his migration and moved en masse out from the center into the country.

Unlike the cities, which were built primarily for the more efficient conduct of business, the suburbs are being built to satisfy mainly human desires. It is legitimate, therefore, to ask ourselves whether we are really getting what we want and what we need.

We have gone far in building history's first suburban civilization. During the 1950's two-thirds of the growth of the U.S. population took place in the suburbs. During the same period, half the counties and eleven of the twelve largest cities in the nation—including New York—actually lost population. Only Los Angeles, which is not much more than a cluster of suburbs, held her own.

As a result, one out of every three Americans today is living in a suburb. To show how widespread this phenomenon is, let me list the big metropolitan areas whose city people by 1960 were outnumbered by those in their own suburbs: Atlanta, Boston, Buffalo, Cincinnati, Detroit, Kansas City, Los Angeles, New York, Philadelphia, Pittsburgh, St. Louis, San Francisco, and Washington. This was true of only three of these thirteen a mere decade before.

These are literally bedroom towns. More and more, people do not live where they work or work where they live. The separation of man from his job, begun by the horse, accelerated by the trolley and the commuter railroad, is now on the way to being made complete by the automobile. In addition to those going to work from the suburbs into the city, we now have reverse commuting and cross-regional commuting. More cars cross George Washington Bridge every morning headed for New Jersey than the other way around. And 60% more people pour into Stamford, Conn., from New York State each day than leave Stamford for New York.

But it is not jobs that are setting the pattern of our bedroom towns. It is the people. They have migrated in hordes to the suburbs, not only to get a little grass, peace and fresh air, and to escape the noise, the dirt, the crowds, the squalor and the switch blades of the city. They have moved to the country mainly to enjoy their new affluence and to give their children a better start in life.

No one could quarrel with these goals. And, with one major exception, these goals are being achieved. By and large, the new suburbanite has left behind what he did not like and has found what he wanted.

KARSH

Mr. Lazarus, president of Federated Department Stores, is a member of ADL's national commission and vice-chairman of its committee on organization and planning. This article is excerpted from his recent address before the Better Business Bureau of Metropolitan New York.

What, then, is the major exception? It is this: Are the parents in these communities actually giving their children a better start in life? On the surface, yes. The average suburban child has better schools, better housing and better health than either his parents or the neighbor he left behind in the city. We will have to scratch below the surface to find out what is missing.

What the suburban child is missing is the experience of being brought up as an American. The walls that surround his environment are almost as high and as difficult as the walls that surrounded the ghetto of Warsaw. They tend to keep out everyone not belonging to a single economic class, whether they be the walls of a low-cost housing project, of a Levittown or Sunny Acres, or the zoning walls of Darien, Conn., or Grosse Point, Mich. Outside these walls is America, with its teeming multitudes, its color, vitality, conflict and choice.

In the process of building man's first suburban civilization, we are segregating our society into tens of thousands of modern ghettos, each housing only the poor, the blue collar workers, the middle class or the rich. We are developing what I call Classville, USA.

Classville is by no means confined to our suburbs. We find scores of them in our metropolitan centers. From time immemorial cities have had their Park Avenues and Lower East Sides. But now, as the middle class flees, leaving its worn-out housing behind for the new migrants pouring in from the farms of Puerto Rico and the Negro South, the city is becoming more and more a place for the very

EQUAL RIGHTS FOR THE SATURDAY SABBATH OBSERVER

Is a Seventh Day Adventist entitled to unemployment benefits although she refused to work on Saturday? The Court's decision will have far-reaching implications for Jews too.

The Fourth Commandment: "Remember the Sabbath day."

By PAUL HARTMAN

"I just want to keep my Sabbath. That's what I want to do. I want to please God instead of man."

IN 1957, Mrs. Adell H. Sherbert of Spartansburg, South Carolina, became a member of the fundamentalist Seventh Day Adventist Church. It was a simple act of faith by a middle-aged woman who had toiled for many years as a spool tender in a textile mill in her home town. No one—least of all Mrs. Sherbert—could have foreseen a by-product of her conversion: a complicated civil rights issue reaching the highest court of the land. But now, the United States Supreme Court must soon decide her case, which bears the formidable title of "ADELL H. SHERBERT, appellant, against CHARLES V. VERNER et al., as Members of the SOUTH CAROLINA SECURITY COMMISSION and SPARTAN MILLS, respondents."

Spartan Mills is the name of the firm for which Mrs. Sherbert worked for thirty-five years. In all that time she had never been asked to work on a Saturday. Then, two years after her conversion, Spartan Mills went on a six-day week. It would have violated the tenets of her religion to work on Saturday and Mrs. Sherbert refused to do so. She was fired from her job.

Seventh Day Adventists hold to a literal reading of the Scriptures. They believe that Saturday, the seventh day of the week, is the Sabbath and that God has forbidden "labor or common work" of any type on that day. They also believe that the day begins and ends at sunset.

THE parallel with the convictions of Orthodox Jewish Sabbath observers is evident. And Orthodox Jews, too, have had the same problem that now confronted Mrs. Sherbert. She had lost her job because she had refused to work on Saturday. There were other jobs available—but these too required that she work on her Sabbath. She could not accept them. The question now came up: Was she entitled to receive state unemployment compensation benefits? And if the state said no, was it abridging her religious and civil rights guaranteed by the U.S. Constitution?

Like other states, South Carolina grants unemployment insurance benefits only to persons who are "available"—able and willing to work. In other states—most recently, Ohio, Michigan, and North Carolina—conscientious Sabbath observers have been ruled "'available" even if they will not on religious grounds take certain jobs they are qualified for. But in South Carolina, for the first time in the case of Mrs. Sherbert, the courts of the state agreed with the ruling of the social security commission that the Saturday Sabbath observer was not entitled to unemployment insurance benefits. Her case had to be appealed to the Supreme Court.

THERE are two constitutional issues involved.

1. The First Amendment includes a guarantee against any prohibition of the free exercise of religion. Like every other state in the Union, South Carolina has a similar guarantee in its constitution. The question: Is South Carolina violating the religious freedom of Seventh Day Adventists (and other Saturday Sabbath observers)?

2. The Fourteenth Amendment declares that "no state shall . . . deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws." The question: In refusing Mrs. Sherbert the benefits that all citizens of the state are entitled to, is South Carolina denying her the equal protection of the law?

Mrs. Sherbert's case will come before the U.S. Supreme Court sometime in April; the Court's decision will probably be handed down before the end of the current term in June. The ADL has joined with the American Jewish Committee and the American Civil Liberties Union in filing an amicus curiae in her behalf. Here is a summary of the brief's argument:

IN THE 1870's in the case of Reynolds v. U.S.A., a Mormon who had been convicted of the crime of bigamy in the Territory of Utah appealed the conviction on the ground that his church required poly-

IN MEMORIAM: JAMES L. McDEVITT

Printed obituaries are the bare bones of a man's existence. They cannot flesh out the meaning of his work, the purpose of his efforts or the impact of his character on those around him.

James L. McDevitt—National COPE Director, who died March 19—was one whose character and contributions no words could do justice to. His dedication was too deep, his good works too wide to be compressed into print.

He devoted himself to one cause: a brighter, more secure life for his fellow human beings through the political and economic activities of trade unions. For this, he gave his energies unstintingly.

Personal reward, beyond the satisfaction that his efforts meaningfully advanced this cause, did not concern him.

If yardsticks were used to assess the value of a man's life, his would come full measure.

He was a kind, warm and gentle man, who will be missed deeply by a devoted family, a host of friends, and a saddened staff, and—though they may be unaware of it—by millions of working people whose lives are better because he helped make them so.

ONE YEAR LATER—REAPPORTIONMENT MOVES AHEAD

Launched by the Supreme Court's historic decision of just a year ago, efforts are moving swiftly to reapportion state legislatures to break the grip of rural-conservative control.

Though some states have passed, or are considering, laws effecting the least possible change, the over-all results nationwide can only add up to fairer representation for the city voter. Since the Supreme Court decision of March 26, 1962, some breakthrough toward reapportionment has been made in 42 states.

Fifteen already have enacted legislation. Proposals are being considered in 17 others. Some 78 law suits have been filed in 38 states and court decisions have been handed down in 41 cases.

THERE'S NO ESCAPING RIGHT WING PROPAGANDA

Don't look now, but your kids, your friends and your neighbors are being exposed to the right wing epidemic. The sickness reaches into neighborhood movie houses, schools, churches, service clubs, industrial plants.

A new book, "The Extremists," by Mark Sherwin, says propaganda cartoon films have been distributed by Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer studios to more than 15,000 moving picture theaters and have been seen by more than 35 million Americans. The films were produced by Harding College, Searcy, Ark., which gushes rightist propaganda like a newly-found oil well.

Another film made by Harding College, "Communism on the Map," has been seen by more than 15 million. It undercuts American foreign policy, implies all major nations except U.S., Spain and Switzerland are under, or nearly under, Communist domination, hints the late Gen. George Marshall helped communize China.

A MATCH MADE IN HEAVEN: PEGLER WEDS JBS

For years, Westbrook Pegler wrote a venomous column for the Hearst newspapers. Not too long ago he got the heave-ho. He found a natural home, however, in the John Birch Society. His first article for the JBS publication, "American Opinion," was typical of the right-wing's undying hatred of Franklin and Eleanor Roosevelt. This quote is from Pegler's article:

"This woman (Mrs. FDR) was as bad as her idolators said she was good, as cruel as they said she was generous . . . (she) was the worst liar in modern times."

AH, THAT SWEET L'IL OLE ETHICAL MEDICAL PROFESSION

Fifty doctors in Los Angeles are under investigation for filing phony claims on county charity cases. The champion of the crowd, a surgeon, already has been convicted after accusations he filed $53,000 in bills to the county, 60 percent of which was sheer padding.

The world breathlessly awaits some word of censure from the American Medical Association. Don't hold your breath too long.

THE MINNESOTA STORY—WHAT THE PAPERS DIDN'T TELL YOU

Nearly five months after election day, liberal Karl Rolvaag was declared governor of Minnesota following a long recount battle which wound up in court. He won by 91 votes.

What didn't come out in newspaper coverage of the extended battle was the fact that Rolvaag's opponent, conservative incumbent Gov. Elmer Anderson, was desperately trying to cling to office as long as possible to sign a series of anti-labor bills the GOP-controlled legislature is expected to pass.

Luckily, the court decision came in time in true Frank Merriwell tradition. Among the measures Anderson favored, but which Rolvaag undoubtedly would veto, were:

Unemployment compensation—Proposed bill would have thrown several thousand off the rolls, chopped benefits for 35,000 jobless, boosted rates for small business and cut rates for big business.

Union political action—Proposal would have put labor's political efforts in a straitjacket.

Other proposals would have killed a current law permitting time off for voting, with pay; made it easier for employers to secure injunctions; restricted picketing rights.

The 91 votes by which Rolvaag squeezed into victory were out of a total of almost 1.3 million cast in November. Did somebody say one vote doesn't count?

THOSE "SECONDARY" OFFICES HAVE PRIMARY IMPORTANCE

A lot of folks who always vote in a presidential or congressional election think other offices are of secondary importance and fail to vote in state contests. They're mistaken. Often, the right man in the right office at the right time makes a key move that can affect the welfare of thousands.

This occurred in Minnesota when liberal Lt. Gov. A. M. Keith outfoxed the conservative majority in the State Senate and stalled approval of a proposal to slash jobless benefits.

This is what happened: The State House of Representatives was debating amendments to the proposal. The Senate had the jobless pay cut first on its agenda for attention, but had to await House action. Presiding over the Senate, Lt. Gov. Keith permitted conservatives to wander on to other issues. He was assisted by a five-hour filibuster by a liberal senator.

When it came time to consider the House amendments to the bill, Keith ruled the Senate was too late and had passed that spot on the agenda. This was one day before liberal Karl Rolvaag was declared governor. Conceivably, had the Senate been able to act, the bill could have become law with the signature of then Gov. Anderson on his last day in office.

So a "secondary" job often has primary importance.

POLITICAL ACTION STIRRING DOWN ON THE FARM

The liberal National Farmers Union has planted political seeds which could sprout into a harvest of progressive legislators from the farm belt.

The NFU represents more than 300,000 farm families in western states. It will attempt to inform its members, and to get them to register and vote, through the newly-formed Rural Political Education Committee.

RPEC will distribute voting records of congressmen and will be financed by voluntary contributions of its members.

For years, the ultra-conservative, union-hating American Farm Bureau has had the barnyard all to itself. Hopefully, the challenge of the Farmers Union could diminish Farm Bureau political success.

AMA UNIT REPORTS SPENDING $250,000, BUT THAT'S NOT ALL, BROTHER

The medical politicians who laid down their stethoscopes to take up arms for the conservative cause shelled out nearly $250,000 in support of anti-health care candidates in the 1962 elections. That is, the American Medical Political Action Committee reported spending $250,000. As a national outfit, AMPAC is compelled to file campaign spending reports with the U.S. House of Representatives. State medical political affiliates are not.

For this reason, the National Senior Citizens Council figures $250,000 was only the tip of the iceberg of spending by the medical profession. It estimates aid to candidates and anti-health care propaganda cost the AMA and its affiliates $7 million last year.

REVOLT IN OAK PARK

A girl with a violin proved to this famous Chicago suburb that it opposed racial barriers.

By Jacob Sloan

Oak Park, Illinois, was in the newspapers again—and the comfortable residents of that well-to-do suburb on the outskirts of Chicago did not like it at all. They read on and were aghast at the image of themselves being presented to the world.

A young Negro violinist called Carol Anderson had been invited by Milton Preves, its conductor, to join the Oak Park-River Forest amateur orchestra. On December 4th, at the first rehearsal all had gone well—the other musicians liked her, both as musician and as a person, and she liked them.

But about a week later the blow fell. Miss Anderson received a phone call from the chairman of the Board of the Oak Park-River Forest Symphony Association. Mrs. Gustave Palmer had unwelcome news. The board had decided not to allow Miss Anderson to play.

Carol Anderson, a pretty, sensitive girl of twenty-three, and a 1961 graduate of the Boston Conservatory of Music (where she had been class president) did not try to argue or force the issue with Mrs. Palmer. For this community has been in the news before because of its unfriendliness to anyone who was not a White Protestant . . .

Oak Park is a large suburb situated just west of Chicago. It is a well-to-do community, and the people who live in Oak Park have a reputation for liking it there just as it is: lovely homes, tree-lined streets and (practically) lily-white. At last count, 62,000 persons were living in Oak Park, or some 20,000 families—of which only two were Negro, and one an eminent chemist. Several years before, Percy Julian had built a home in Oak Park and, despite considerable controversy, had stayed on. But the Julians had been followed by only one other Negro family, although an adjoining suburb — Maywood — has a substantial number of Negro residents.

So Carol Anderson did not remonstrate with Mrs. Palmer at this direct racial rebuff. But Milton Preves, the conductor who had invited Carol Anderson to play with the Oak Park orchestra, was furious. After a heated exchange with Mrs. Palmer, Preves sent in a letter of resignation to the board. His statement was printed in the press:

> "I do not wish to be associated with and particularly known as head of an organization which practices the discrimination of excluding any person because of color."

This was on February 9. Within a week three other musicians had resigned, for the same reason. Quickly the case of Carol Anderson became a national (and international) cause celebre. Literally hundreds of news stories appeared in the metropolitan, special interest and neighborhood press in the Chicago area. There were editorials in all the major papers. The case of Carol Anderson was given wide coverage on radio and TV. Messages of congratulation poured in on Milton Preves—some from as far away as Asia and Europe.

Mrs. Palmer was perplexed, vexed, hurt at "outsiders" who were making a mountain out of a molehill. Why couldn't they just let well enough alone? "I can't understand why a person [Milton Preves] would come in this town and gladly take the money we offer and bring us his problem." The discrimination Oak Park practiced was not Oak Park's problem, as Mrs. Palmer saw it. Whose was it then?

The day the story of Carol Anderson broke in the Chicago press was a Saturday—by coincidence, Race Relations Sabbath. The next day was Race Relations Sunday. In pulpit after pulpit in Oak Park and adjoining River Forest, rabbis and ministers preached sermons decrying the racial discrimination that the local symphony orchestra had shown against Carol Anderson.

On Monday, the clergymen moved

ROCKWELL ON THE CAMPUS

"An interesting phenomenon" for some students; a source of derision for others.

By LYNNE IANNIELLO

A TALL, well-dressed man strides briskly across the college campus. He carries an attache case stuffed with papers, reports, notes for the speech he is about to make. There is nothing in his appearance to set him apart from any other American. But two things do set him apart—a cordon of police marching protectively around him, and a small metal swastika gleaming on the lapel of his jacket. This man is George Lincoln Rockwell.

The head of the American Nazi Party, the would-be "fuehrer" who boasts he will be President of the United States by 1972, has exchanged street corners for a new forum—the halls of our nation's academic institutions. His business suit and attache case are innovations too. Before he extended his activities to the college campus, "Linc" Rockwell peddled hate in a storm trooper uniform; his aides carried picket signs urging the gassing of Jews. Peddler or salesman, Rockwell's line is the same —85 per cent of American Jews must be killed because they are disloyal; American Negroes must be sent back to Africa because they are inferior. And if Rockwell's image has changed of late, it is not his own doing—college officials have forbidden his appearance in uniform.

Rockwell on a college campus—at such institutions of higher learning as San Diego State College, Carleton College, the Universities of Illinois, Chicago and Virginia; a Rockwell "trooper" speaking at Hunter College; invitations for Rockwell to speak (later cancelled by university officials) before groups of students at Northwestern, Bucknell and Pittsburgh. Why is it happening? How? What have been the results?

THE WHY is difficult to explain. One explanation attributes it to nothing more serious than the traditional undergraduate rebellion against authority. In the words of a jocular editorial that appeared in the Richmond, Va., News Leader on the occasion of Rockwell's appearance at the University of Virginia:

> "Since at least the 11th century, it has been the chief creative activity of students the world over to contrive new ways to harass their masters—to put them in a fix where they are damned if they do, and damned if they don't. Here they did it again.
> We may surmise that the university's Dr. Shannon, gazing glumly at this application, ached clear down to his metatarsals. If he granted permission for . . . Rockwell to speak under University auspices at Cabell Hall, influential alumni and the American Legion would be heard from. If he refused permission, he would be denying free speech at Mr. Jefferson's University. Would the students be dissuaded? No. Would they please reconsider? No. In the end, the administration yielded morosely, seized the dilemma's lesser horn, and granted the use of the hall . . . Boys will be boys, and February is a dull month anyhow."

More seriously, a student at the University of Chicago, who had invited Rockwell to address the residents of his dormitory, explained it this way: "I can think of several benefits University students will gain from hearing Rockwell, in addition to familiarization with his beliefs. For one, Rockwell is a very interesting sociological and psychological phenomenon, an unavoidable product of our times.'

The student added that Rockwell's appearance would demonstrate the "aura of freedom" on the campus and would therefore attract scholarly applicants to the university.

THE "aura of freedom" is Rockwell's admission to college. Once he has been invited to speak, usually by some student group, university administrators are placed in a near impossible situation. To allow the Rockwell "lecture" causes heated debate, on campus and off. To forbid it causes just as much debate.

Shortly before Rockwell's scheduled appearance at the University of Chicago this year, Dean of Students Warner A. Wick cited a passage in the University Student Code which provides that recognized student organizations "may invite and hear speakers of their choice on subjects of their choice." The dean said that "although we should have preferred to celebrate our principles on an occasion that promised to be more wholesome, the University will keep its faith with the student code and with the tradition of free interchange that the code embodies."

American colleges and universities must maintain intellectual freedom, free speech, free exchange of ideas. George Lincoln Rockwell, by no stretch of the imagination an intellectual, knows this, counts upon it, plays upon it. For in Rockwell's own words about his Nazi party, "We are not damn fools."

"I was a flop five years ago," Rockwell says, "and now we have reached the public."

And by expanding his activities to college campuses, he has indeed reached the public. Before he even makes his appearance, mass media reports give him what he considers his most important need—publicity. At the University of Virginia, at the invitation of the conservative John Randolph Society, Rockwell candidly told his audience that some of the things he does are deliberately designed to gain publicity for his cause and he hoped they wouldn't be held against him.

WHAT have been the results of Rockwell's campus talks? He has been hooted, booed and laughed at. He has also been listened to by highly attentive audiences —whether through inherent politeness or genuine interest is hard to tell. Most of the colleges at which he has appeared have asked the students not to demonstrate or become unruly in any way, and before he accepts an invitation, Rockwell makes sure he will have police protection.

Where Rockwell does appear, the end result is the same—controversy and publicity. On the occasion of his speech at Carleton College, Minneapolis and St. Paul newspapers featured him in front page stories; TV stations interviewed him. At San Diego State College, where he was involved in a fist fight with a Jewish student, the incident received nation-wide coverage.

AFTER Rockwell's appearance at the University of Chicago, a Chicago Daily News editorial made this comment:

> "The proper treatment for such unutterable scum is to deprive them of the attention they seek, whereupon they would abandon their posturing. We can understand the undeviating devotion to free speech that prompts the University of Chicago to tolerate Rockwell. We cannot comprehend the perverted mischievousness which prompts an invitation to this odious creature."

And at the same university, in a letter protesting the appearance of Rockwell, eleven faculty members wrote:

> "The action of a small group of students was surely a reflection on their judgment and perhaps on the education which we have provided them."

But whatever motivates students to subject themselves to Rockwell ideology —curiosity, "perverted mischievousness," or a lamentable ignorance of history—they would do well to follow the advice which appeared in a letter to the editor of Northwestern's student newspaper.

Wrote Stephen Spender, internationally famous British poet:

> "I would like to recommend anyone who really wishes to attend meetings of Nazis, to resolve also to exercise his freedom by going to Poland to look over the Auschwitz concentration camp. Among the gas chambers, and corridors lined with innumerable photographs of victims all bearing the same expression on their faces, he may find further material for thought in making the difficult decision whether to be for or against the Nazis."

OAK PARK

Churches were unsuccessful, Mrs. Palmer and two other orchestra board members declaring that they would cancel the concert at which Miss Anderson was scheduled to play rather than admit her to the orchestra. At this point, the clergy decided the time had arrived for serious pressure. The Council of Churches issued the declaration they had held in reserve. It was signed by seventeen Protestant ministers, two rabbis, and a Roman Catholic priest

This combined pressure from its own community did the job. Within three days after the story had first made headlines, Mrs. Palmer apologized to Miss Anderson, and affirmed a policy of selection of musicians without regard to race or creed with a view to securing the most competent and talented person available.

The performance, held on February 18th, was a personal triumph for the victim of discrimination and her defenders. The climax to this stormy interlude was an ovation from an audience swollen to 700 compared to the 400 that normally attended concerts.

WOULD Oak Park return to its former ways, now that the furor was over? In one of the many editorials that appeared in the Chicago press, the Daily News touched the heart of the problem:

> "One of the sad aspects is [Mrs. Palmer's] conclusion that it's the other fellow's job. Moral buckpassing . . . has characterized race relations in urban areas. We are asked to believe that Oak Park had no racial problems until Preves brought them . . . that the only moral obligation of an organization is to abide by community custom. To wait for 'community opinion' is to relinquish the right to make one's own moral decisions."

The community of Oak Park had finally assumed that responsibility, in the case of Carol Anderson. But one incident does not make a practice. Whether Oak Park would extend nondiscrimination to other areas—housing for example—remained to be seen.

DEFIANT MARTYR

permission for the transfer of much-needed food. The old doctor went to the Gestapo office and complained. He was brutally beaten and arrested, but his spirit was unbroken.

Arrested again and asked by the Nazis why he refused to wear the arm-band, Korczak replied:

> "There are God-given laws and man-made laws. So long as I live I shall heed only God's eternal laws. The decree that Jews wear arm-bands I consider man-made. Such decrees are ephemeral, and I will not obey them."

The Warsaw Ghetto was flooded with the abandoned and neglected children of Jewish refugees who had died of starvation and disease. These children became Korczak's concern. Taking them into his already overcrowded orphanage, he pleaded, cajoled, harassed the Jewish Council that administered the Warsaw Ghetto and the few more fortunate Jews in the ghetto for help, for food, clothing, fuel.

WHEN the end came, Janusz Korczak was prepared. For months the Gestapo had been systematically liquidating the Warsaw Ghetto of "useless mouths" by "deportations"—to the extermination camp of Treblinka. SS detachments roamed the streets, burst into homes, and dragged victims to the Umschlagplatz, where trains waited to be packed for the final journey.

Wednesday morning, August 12, 1942, Nazi troopers converged on the orphanage. Janusz Korczak was ordered to prepare the children for "deportation." Korczak himself was exempt. But he refused this last opportunity to save his life. As the folk ballad by Wladyslaw Schlengel tells us, Korczak had the children dress in their sabbath best on the pretext that they were going on an outing to the country. Then he marched them, in perfect order, holding hands and singing, to the Umschlagplatz. Korczak went at the head of the procession, holding the two youngest children in his arms. A twelve-year-old boy playing a violin walked on one side of him; on his other side walked a boy bearing the orphanage flag—the color of green, for life.

The heroic example of Janusz Korczak, the most famous martyr of the Warsaw Ghetto, has remained green in the memory of Jews, and of humanity.

THE ORDEAL OF AMERICAN NEGROES

Disenchantment with "gradualism" has built fires of resentment -- even against white liberals.

By Dore Schary

James Howard Meredith recently told a reporter, "I'm not a well-adjusted Negro. I don't want to ever think I'm well-adjusted as a Negro."

He meant, of course, adjustment to the separate but unequal life of a Negro in Mississippi. His mother, the wife of a cotton farmer, approved of her son's role as the first and only Negro enrolled at Ole Miss. It called for him to walk the gauntlet of hundreds of jeering, name-calling white students. "I'm glad he did it," she said. "I never once doubted he had the courage."

There is a new militancy among Negroes. Along with it is a greater resentment of whites because of ever-broken hopes and promises. And these expressions of resentment are today more candid and forthright than ever.

The causes of resentment are itemized in the newspapers every day. It is sufficient to note that the Emancipation Proclamation is now 100 years old—and its promise still remote from reality; that the Supreme Court's decision on desegregation of public schools came in 1954—and to this day no more than 7 to 8 per cent of Negro children in the South attend integrated schools.

This new militance toughens and mobilizes parts of the Negro community which have never before been involved in civil rights activity—the very idea seemed remote to them a few years ago. The old established forms of protest and improvement — leaving things in the hands of experts and lawyers—no longer satisfy great parts of the Negro community, especially the young people.

The motives of the white liberal community, the meaning of the Judeo-Christian tradition are being seriously questioned. The Black Muslims are but the most publicized of various Negro movements produced in dire reaction to the cruel past. They have a tragically racist appeal, they preach a hate produced by hate, they deny that all men are brothers. If white Northerners feel the slightest bit smug about their treatment of Negroes, let them be reminded: The Black Muslim movement is essentially a phenomenon of the urban North, a reflection of the Negro ghettos, poverty, inadequate education—and again—broken promises.

In a complicated way, Jews often appear to Negroes to be members of the propertied white Establishment, its nearest representatives, and a special target. In urban areas of the North, often enough, Negroes moved into communities after first-generation American Jews started to leave them for better housing. But Jewish "influence" continued to be felt by the newcomers; for many years now the term "Jewish landlord" has had a special and negative meaning to many Negroes. In the North and South, the Jewish peddler became the local shop or department store owner; Negroes had contact with them, all out of proportion to numbers. The Negro-white conflict expressed in current Negro boycotts of retail stores in primarily Negro sections often adds to Negro-Jewish tensions, too.

Today, inevitably there are expressions of anti-Semitism among Negroes. The Black Muslims express it one way; its leaders tell followers that Jews might serve as an example: "Jews are unified and well-organized, Jews have managed to get hold of property, own their own facilities, hotels, and restaurants, Jews have carved out their own state in Israel. We can learn, should learn how they did it, do it ourselves, do it better." Implicit in this is both envy and hostility.

Anti-Semitism is occasionally seen even in the more conservative Negro press —and in the statements of the more demagogic Negro political leaders. A news magazine recently planned to feature a story about anti-Semitism among Negroes; it sent a reporter to Harlem, a Negro, to research the story. He came back to his office to shake his white colleagues by the virulence of the anti-Semitic remarks he had heard during his interviews.

ADL research in the South has found anti-Semitism among Negroes there too. Since the Supreme Court decision, the South has been a special target for the anti-Semitic and racist literature of such a man as Conde McGinley in his Common Sense, and The Thunderbolt of the National States Rights Party. This material is now getting into the hands of Negroes too; the racist anti-Negro portions they take for granted and ignore—the anti-Semitic portions they seem to have a tendency to read and retain.

Negro anti-Semitism is a particular

White Supremist Party Recruits In Ohio For Presidential Election

DAYTON, Ohio — (UPI) The National States Rights Party, a white supremist, anti-semitic group, was reported to be recruiting members in preparation to getting a presidential candidate on the ballot in Ohio next year.

The candidate would be chosen at the party's 1964 convention. In 1960 the party nominated Gov. Orval E. Faubus of Arkansas.

Irving Thacker, state organizer for the NSRP which has national headquarters at Birmingham, Ala., said "we want to get on the ballot as soon as possible in Ohio. We consider Republicans and Democrats evil. However, there is a lesser evil.

"We will vote for a lesser evil until we get on the ballot."

Two national officers of the party, national chairman Ned Dupes of Knoxville, Tenn., and J. B. Stoner of Atlanta, the party's legal counsel, held meetings at Columbus, Friday, Cleveland, Saturday and here on Sunday.

OHIO RATES HIGH

Stoner called Ohio one of the best northern states for its acceptance of the NSRP, and also ranked California as a good one.

Thacker said more meetings throughout the state were planned for the near future.

The party last made news in Ohio, just less than a year ago when police in Wilmington investigated the distribution of the party's organ, The Thunderbolt.

At that time, reliable sources told United Press International the little-known party has been in existence since the late 1950's and that it's total membership figure is not known.

TOTAL SEGREGATION

Included in the party's platform as outlined to UPI last year were total segregation of non-whites, the banning of interracial marriages, ending of school integration, an end to aid to Israel and the resettlement of Negroes in Africa.

As the party's name implies, it also stands for state's rights.

The party circulated petitions in 1962, UPI was told, calling for the impeachment of President John Kennedy on the basis of 11 charges, mainly on alleged actions and attitudes not opposed to the Communist line.

The group in the past has attempted to establish itself as a third national party, but has not been successful in this effort. The party has been active in southwestern Ohio.

States Rights Chapter Formed

Greensboro Daily News High Point Bureau

HIGH POINT, June 8—A local chapter of the North Carolina Defenders of States Rights Inc., has been formed here according to a group appearing before the High Point bi-racial committee.

Thomas E. Davis, of 1612 N. Hamilton St., told the committee that he had been appointed chairman of the High Point chapter by Rev. James P. Dees of Statesville, state president of the organization.

He said the organization is against supreme court rulings on segregation on the grounds that the court has exceeded its authority. Davis said that the chapter here already has some members but did not say how many. He said literature and other material will be made available within the next few days to outline the chapters position fully.

He declared that operators of the theaters, restaurants, and other private businesses have the right to "refuse service to anyone." He added that his organizatione does not advocate picketing and is opposed to violence in any fashion. The bi-racial group heard Davis during a meeting in the city-county building. He was told by Gen. Capus Waynick, chairman, that the committee is planning to hold a public hearing next Monday night regarding racial policy in High Point.

President Kennedy addresses the nation on civil rights.

"Here, Now, All!"

THE CHALLENGE TO CONGRESS

It can help the peaceful revolution in race relations -- if our legislators rise above archaic rules and methods.

By Herman Edelsberg

"The (civil) rights here asserted are . . . present rights; they are not merely hopes to some future enjoyment . . . The basic guarantees of our Constitution are warrants for here and now."

U.S. Supreme Court
May 27, 1963

A new impatient mood is abroad in the land. It was only yesterday that Southern liberals were wont to discuss a staggered timetable of Negro rights, and civil rights leaders—white and Negro alike—were debating priorities in legislation. The Attorney General spoke of voting as being the key right, while the Housing Administrator said equal job opportunity is the door-opener. But in today's dominant Negro mood, timetables and strategic priorities are obsolete. Rev. Martin Luther King, Jr., asked about his civil rights goals, answered with irreducible terseness, "Here, now, all!"

The unhappy fact of the here and now, however, is that constitutional rights of Negroes are still in the future. They are still widely flouted—by governors as well as by local voting registrars, by school boards as well as by restaurant owners, by policemen as well as by nightriding hoodlums.

Long-pent-up Negro grievances and aspirations are exploding North and South—in Philadelphia and Birmingham, in Maryland and Mississippi. In the face of this danger, President Kennedy went to the nation on June 11 to plead that all Americans work to bridge the gap between constitutional promise and civil rights performance. In plain but eloquent words he ticked off the evil fruit of racial discrimination:

"The Negro baby born in America today . . . has about half as much chance of completing high school as a white baby born the same place on the same day; one-third as much chance of completing college; one-third as much chance of becoming a professional man; twice as much chance of becoming unemployed. No American can fully excuse, explain or defend the picture these statistics portray."

He warned that the nation faced a revolution in race relations, that the issue should not be fought out in the streets. He called upon Americans to do what must be done to make the inevitable change peaceful and constructive.

The judiciary, the executive, the private employer, he said, have a role in making that revolution peaceful. "But there are other necessary measures which only the Congress can provide." Specifically, the President called for legislation to give Negroes the right to be served in facilities that are open to the public—restaurants, theatres, retail stores. He called also for legislation to authorize the Attorney General to initiate litigation to end school segregation, thus lifting the burden from Negro parents and their organizations. Earlier in the year, he had requested legislation to strengthen the Negro right to vote by making a sixth-grade education proof of literacy in federal elections, and by authorizing the appointment of federal registrars in counties where less than 15% of qualified Negroes are registered.

The Birmingham riots and the Presidential appeal have given new impetus to this legislation, and Washington observers have become more optimistic about passage. Some would call the civil rights bill the "Governor Wallace bill" or the "Bull Connor bill" in ironic tribute to the unintended contributions of these strong segregationists. Fire hoses trained on praying Negroes, police dogs snarling at Negro children have indeed played a large part in hardening national determination to secure justice for Negroes. But, clearly, principal credit goes to the increased determination of Negroes themselves and their dangerous mood of revolutionary impatience as the goal of equality comes closer into sight.

The fate of this legislation is, however, far from assured. It is clear enough that the majority of the members of the Senate and House are ready to vote for it; the problem is whether they will get the chance to vote. Can it get by the Rules Committee in the House unscathed? Can

Young GOP 'Shocked' Moderate Minnesota Delegate

[Reprinted From Minneapolis Sunday Tribune]

By MERCER CROSS

MINNEAPOLIS — Leonard Nadasdy said Saturday he is "still in a state of shock" because of the Young Republican National Federation convention in San Francisco, Calif.

Goldwater

"The whole thing has been very disillusioning for me," said the immediate past president of the 500,000 member federation.

Narrowly elected to succeed Nadasdy for the next two years was Donald Lukens, 32, Washington, D.C., who campaigned as a supporter of Sen. Barry Goldwater, (R-Ariz.) for president.

Defeated was Charles McDevitt, 30, Boise, Idaho, who took no stand on a GOP presidential candidate. McDevitt had the unanimous support of the 15-member Minnesota delegation.

McDevitt had the edge going into the YGOP convention, said Nadasdy, 32, a General Mills public relations man who lives in Plymouth, Minn.

But, he said, Lukens' supporters "used the old Communist technique of causing a lot of dissension and a lot of furor, at which they were eminently successful."

THEIR PURPOSE, said Nadasdy, "was to completely ensnarl the convention and confuse everyone. All this was accompanied by screaming and hollering."

At the center of the confusion were members of the John Birch Society and the radical right, Nadasdy said.

Two years ago the Minnesotan was elected chairman as a member of the Young Republicans' moderate faction. As convention chairman this year, he said:

Right-wing delegates shouted at him to "go back to Russia."

"They made a couple of rushes at the podium to take the gavel away from me."

"There were fist fights on the floor."

"At one point the national anthem had to be played to make the delegates sit down, and police were summoned to keep order.

Radicals distributed scurrilous printed matter attacking Nadasdy.

McDEVITT'S HOTEL room was broken into and campaign literature, two typewriters and some briefcases were stolen.

"I've never seen such violence at a Young Republican affair," said Nadasdy. "It was like a nightmare to be there."

Goldwater appeared at a rally the first night of the convention.

Nadasdy said he appealed to the senator to help restore order. Goldwater said he would try to calm down the delegates and would say he supported no YGOP candidate for chairman, Nadasdy reported.

"He apparently forgot what he said to me," said Nadasdy. "All this did was to pour gasoline on the flames."

THE MINNESOTAN made this prediction concerning Goldwater:

"Unless the senator starts getting some sane conservative people around him, he's going to have a very difficult time getting the nomination and being elected."

Nadasdy said he has set out on this personal mission:

"During the coming year I want to try to alert the people, and especially the Republicans, as to the real objective of the John Birch Society and the radical right, which is to subvert the Republican party and to seize control, rather than just nominate a presidential candidate."

* * *

PARTICULARLY IN Minnesota, where Birchers are scarce, said Nadasdy, "It really worries me. I'm just afraid people aren't going to see the danger. I think we're complacent."

The radicals are "not reasonable," he said. "They know what they're doing. They know where they're going. They're extremely dangerous. They're after power for power's sake."

And the significance to the senior party?

"The significance," said Nadasdy, "is a word of warning that the national convention in San Francisco next year is going to be one of the toughest ones the party's ever had."

FAR-RIGHTERS spent much time and money to elect their man to lead the Young Republicans, said Nadasdy, and they'll spend 10 times as much to take over the senior party.

"It's a question whether the party's going to allow mob rule or whether they're going to see an orderly conducted convention."

As for Lukens, the new Young Republican chairman, "He is not a Bircher, but he certainly began to say everything they wanted him to say," said Nadasdy.

Lukens campaigned for abolition of the federal income tax, United States withdrawal from the United Nations and a "court of the union" higher than the U.S. Supreme Court.

"I'M VERY concerned about what's going to happen to the organization," said Nadasdy. "Only time will tell. I just want to see if Lukens can stand up to the people who elected him."

John Birchers at the Young Republican convention were mostly from California, Illinois and Iowa, with a scattering from other states, Nadasdy said.

"These people are a minority. They don't even represent one-fourth of the people in our party," he added.

"This radical element are just like the Communists. They drive the good people away."

Creates Conflict, He Warns

Colston Condemns Hate Leaflet Distributed Here

An inflammatory leaflet charging that welfare agencies are conspiring with the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) to promote adoption of white children by Negroes, was condemned today by Marshall Colston, local NAACP president.

Colston said the mimeographed leaflet, which has been distributed in downtown Madison at various times during the past two weeks, is, "clearly intended to inflame passions and create racial conflict, mistrust and fear in this community."

Police Friday arrrested a 23-year-old paroled convict from California for passing out the leaflets in downtown Madison, but released him when the district attorney's office could find no charge to bring against him.

Printed by the "National Putnam Letters Committee" of New York City, the leaflet states that the NAACP and welfare agencies, "inspired by the Communists," would, "after you die in an automobile or airplane accident . . . get . . . a real genuine colored man to take your daughter into his home . . . for as she is still young and helpless."

Colston's statement said that "the contents and composition of the sheet suggest a person or persons who may be dangerously ill."

"The childish, sick inferences of the sheets cannot be dignified by a denial from the NAACP and need no denial from any social agency," he said.

The leaflet has been turned over to postal authorities for investigation of possible violations of federal laws, he said.

Rev. Noebel Will Speak At Right Wing Meeting

The Rev. David Noebel, unsuccessful candidate for the 1962 Republican Second District congressional nomination, this weekend will join Robert Welch, director of the John Birch Society, and Evangelist Billy James Hargis, at the speakers' rostrum at the national convention of the Christian Crusade.

Mr. Noebel

Welch

Mr. Noebel, pastor of the Fundamental Bible Church here, is listed as the youngest of a quartet of ministers that will speak to the group in Oklahoma City.

The Christian Crusade has been associated with the extreme Right-Wing.

Mr. Noebel will speak on "The Liberal Papers," a document he frequently attacked in the last election.

A bitter critic of Rep. Robert Kastenmeier (D-Watertown), Mr. Noebel is a strong supporter of the House Un-American Activities Committee.

Mr. Noebel is now working on his doctorate at the University of Wisconsin. He has served as an instructor at the Christian Crusade's Anti-Communist Youth University, Manitou Springs, Colo.

Also listed as speakers for the convention are Fulton Lewis Jr. and former Maj. Gen. Edwin A. Walker.

Birch Group Has Record Income

BOSTON (UPI) — The John Birch Society had an income of $737,716.87 last year, one-third more than in 1961.

The financial report, filed by law with the Massachusetts Division of Public Charities, listed its chief source of income as $306,527.24 in contributions and $296,326.66 in dues.

In 1961 the society listed its total income as $534,241.58.

The society's largest expense was $370,474.95 for salaries, an increase of $102,000 more than the $268,745.65 spent in 1961.

The second largest expense was $139,066.60 for expenses and travel costs of the society's co-ordinators.

Officials said no accurate membership estimate could be ma from the dues since men a charged $24 a year while female members are assessed $12.

White Rights Leaders Assailed by Powell

He Says He'll Follow Only Negroes From Now on in Efforts for Equality

From Press Dispatches

Representative Adam Clayton Powell, speaking at a New York civil rights rally Sunday, said he was disillusioned with "white liberal" civil rights leaders and henceforth would follow the lead of the top Negro spokesmen.

Powell, Harlem Democrat and chairman of the house education and labor committee, said his disillusionment stemmed from a recent civil rights conference that voted against a plan to force a fair employment practice bill to the house floor through a rarely used legislative procedure.

Powell said:

"No white man any more is going to tell me what I should do in the field of civil rights."

He said he welcomed the support of white leaders "but the white liberal has got to make up his mind he must accept a secondary role."

In Los Angeles, Massachusetts' Atty. Gen. Edward W. Brooke, the nation's first Negro elected to a top state-wide office, Sunday asked delegates to the national Urban League convention to assume a more militant posture.

Brooke cautioned Negroes, however, to avoid demonstrations purely for the sake of demonstrating.

"If Negroes demonstrate while the white population is trying in good faith to meet their demands, if the Negroes' demands are unreasonable, if they ask for special privileges, then Negroes are walking perilously close to losing everything."

In Chicago, the National Catholic Conference for Interracial Justice passed recommendations to improve opportunities for Negroes and made plans to join the civil rights march on Washington Aug. 28 in support of President Kennedy's right program.

The action taken did not commit the bishops of the church, it was pointed out. "But we've seen signs of support for our program," said Mathew Ahmann, conference director.

In Washington, the post office department was accused by one of its unions of compromising its merit promotion plan by practicing "discrimination in reverse" in promoting Negro employes.

The United Federation of Postal Clerks (AFL-CIO) charged that a "quota of promotions is seemingly based on one's racial or ethnic background."

Postal officials emphatically denied, however, that there was a quota of Negroes who should be promoted or that qualification standards had ever been waived in order to promote a Negro.

The union sought to write into the merit promotion plan a clause requiring that promotions be made strictly on a seniority basis from a qualifying list.

Florida Gov. Farris Bryant asked congress Monday not to bury the rights of businessmen in the drive to assure equality for Negroes.

Bryant was the fourth southern governor to testify before the senate commerce committee against Mr. Kennedy's proposal to ban discrimination in hotels, restaurants and other private businesses serving the public.

Bryant said he was not arguing for or against segregation and added, "While I believe the federal government has the power, I do not believe it has the right to do what it proposes."

In Philadelphia, the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People picketed the main post office Monday tionokcz cmfwyp cmfwyp ppp to protest alleged discrimination against Negroes in promotions.

Danville (Va.) police intercepted 77 Negroes marching on city hall and loaded them into paddy wagons and a truck when they sprawled out on the pavement.

Police in Torrance, Calif., aided by mounted deputies, arrested 24 pickets protesting alleged racial discrimination at an all-white housing tract. The pickets, members of the Congress of Racial Equality, were charged with aiding, abetting and consoling other demonstrators who staged sitdown protests the day before.

McNamara Fills New Rights Post

Washington, D. C. —AP— Defense Secretary McNamara chose Alfred B. Fitt Monday for the new post of deputy assistant secretary of defense for civil rights.

Fitt, 40, of Highland Park, Ill., will be responsible for riding herd on the services in carrying out McNamara's orders to insure against discrimination involving Negro servicemen on military bases and in surrounding areas.

He has been deputy undersecretary of the army for manpower for more than two years.

Fitt directed Pentagon studies in the wake of a report by the president's committee on equal opportunity in the armed forces.

THE DEFENSE PROGRAM — AND THE NATIONAL NUT HOUSE

SCIENTISTS of the mind teach that frustrations and excessive fears lead to hysteria and neurosis, which in turn can bring insanity. This is true of nations as well as of individuals. The world saw this happen to the German people under Hitler. There is sound reason to believe that our own nation is entering on this path. A further descent could be swift.

FRUSTRATION AND EXCESSIVE FEAR we have, due to our failure to curb Communist expansion, which in turn arises from our inability to understand the nature of its aggressive thrusts. (Communism expands, not through the invasive power of Russian armed might but through Marxist education, Marxist infiltration and internal subversion — culminating in internal revolution.) There are organizations sprouting in this country as looney as anything in the early days of the Nazis — the John Birch Society, the fanatical "Christian Crusaders," etc., who are utterly blind to the way communism really advances through feudalism, political frustration, poverty and illiteracy. Meanwhile they scream about the threat of a Russian invasion and the Communists to be found under university dormitory beds and church pews.

Then we have the ever-growing, profit-ridden corruption-laden defense program that reeks with intimations of mass insanity.

SEVEN NOTED scholars, headed by Dr. Seymour Melman, professor of industrial engineering at Columbia University, have presented a statement, arising out of careful research and analysis, titled A Strategy for American Security — that lays bare in startling manner this growing national mental illness. Dr. Melman and his associates are deeply concerned over the mental and financial bankruptcy that threatens our country because of the grossly excessive creation of unneeded weapons.

MENTAL BANKRUPTCY threatens us because two-thirds of American engineers and scientists have been squeezed out of the civilian economy to engage in the sterile unproductive work of creating weapons.

FINANCIAL BANKRUPTCY threatens because American manufacturers, with so much of their talent and energy drained off for war preparations, can't compete with the Germans, Japanese, Italians, French and others whose military preparations are but a fraction of our own and whose industrial plants are daily becoming more modern and more efficient than our own. American shipyards can't compete with shipyards anywhere else in the world; American steel producers can't compete with German or Japanese steel; typewriter manufacturers have lost 40 per cent of their market to European countries. So much of American resources are devoted to military spending that there is not enough money left for civilian research and new modern machinery, concludes this analysis.

WE ARE OVERBUILDING our weapons by several hundred per cent, according to the evidence presented. The thousands of missiles and bombers we now have could destroy every city in the Soviet Union with a population of more than 100,000, more than 1000 times over. And this, if 50 per cent should fail to reach their targets! The Soviet Union has the capacity to destroy all similar cities in America over 100 times. We have enough atomic power to destroy all the cities in the Russian-Chinese bloc with a population above 100,000, more than 500 different times. About 70 per cent of the American nuclear arsenal could destroy all the cities of the world with a population in excess of 100,000 more than 125 times. (One major atomic missile can destroy any large city and we have over 4000 large caliber bombs and missiles.)

PRESIDENT KENNEDY'S SCIENTIFIC ADVISOR, Dr. Jerome B. Wiesner, is quoted as saying in 1961 that "200 secured missiles would provide an adequate deterrent." Even 100 of them could obliterate all the Russian population centers in the first strike with 100 left for a second strike. If the United States limited its defense spending to the maintenance of 940 missiles and only 2500 planes (we have over 10,000 planes) which is several times what Dr. Wiesner said was adequate as a deterrent, our military budget could be cut from $56 billion to $9 billion. Please note: The Melman group recommends holding our military power at present levels and only limiting our overkill capacity. By maintaining our present strength and replacing weapons as they become obsolete, we could still cut $22 billion off the defense budget.

MOST NEWSPAPERS, like most Congressmen, are chiefly interested in getting larger missile and plane contracts for their communities instead of smaller, therefore most of them ignored the findings of these eminent scholars. (The Vancouver, B. C., Sun carried the story on the front page on April 30, the Miami Herald also gave it space.) Among the prominent names who signed these findings are the noted child specialist of Western Reserve University, Dr. Benjamin Spock, William Vickery, professor of economics of Columbia University, Otto Feinstein, political scientist of Wayne University, and many others.

The Question

ON UNDERSTANDING EUROPE: DEMOCRATIC SOCIALISM

TO understand what will be happening in Europe during the coming months, one must understand the word socialism. It is an important and respected word, quite dissociated from communism in the minds of the people of Europe — and, for that matter, Asia, Africa and Latin America. Only in the U.S. is socialism a bad word. The Communists are partly to blame for this since they speak of socialism and communism as synonymous terms relative to Marxism. But we should know better. Likewise strident efforts are made by the radical right in the U.S. to give the word but one connotation: that socialism is the same as communism, that all socialism leads to communism — which is false. There are varying degrees of socialism. While the Socialists of Italy lean further leftward than do those of Scandinavia and England, the Italian Socialists are still very anti-Moscow and abhor the idea of any foreign Marxist domination of Italian life, while the Italian Communist Party must accept the close liaison of all orthodox Communists with Moscow.

THE SOCIALISM OF SCANDINAVIA AND ENGLAND is more properly called democratic socialism for both maintain the principle of complete political freedom, private ownership and a multi-party system rather than the one-party monolithic collectivism of the Marxists. Socialism in this European sense, simply stated, means government regulation and control of private wealth, that it not become exploitative. Scandinavian businessmen and British Laborites find little difference between their economy and that of the U.S. and laugh at the way Americans shy from and misinterpret the word socialism, for in our continued concern for economic justice to all classes we have followed much the same path as the prosperous Scandinavian countries and England.

PROTESTANTS IN AMERICA have a particular obligation to understand these differences for most Protestants in Europe are Socialists, just as the Protestant countries of Scandinavia are Socialist, and Protestant England has often had Socialist party rule. Protestant groups in Italy, France and elsewhere are comprised almost entirely of the middle classes who will not support the right-wing reactionary parties, which are always closely aligned with the Roman Church; nor can the Protestants vote with the Communists who largely dominate the lowest working classes — miners, transport and dock workers. Moreover, the statement that all socialism leads to communism is patently false; the fact is that no country with a Democratic Socialist government has ever gone Communist. Finland, Sweden and Norway are so closely bound to the Soviet orbit there is hardly breathing space between them. Yet because, under democratic socialism, there are no dominating land-owning and industrial aristocracies, communism has never gotten a foothold. Most farmers own their own farms in Scandinavia, while in old Poland and Hungary few farmers owned their land — which is still true today in Italy. In Sweden the Communist vote is about 3 per cent — in Italy, nearly 30 per cent!

It is the Roman Catholic and Greek Catholic countries of Europe — Poland, Czechoslovakia, Bulgaria, Hungary, Yugoslavia and Russia, with their old aristocratic oligarchies — which have gone Communist, while Protestant Socialist Finland, Sweden, Denmark, etc., have remained free. All this must be borne clearly in mind if we are to understand what will be happening in Europe during coming months. For socialism, as a force quite separate from communism, will play a large part in the political life of each country.

Right Wing Crusade Hit by Hard Times

Its Director, Hargis, Blames 'Smear' by Liberals, Growth of Rival Groups

© New York Times News Service

Oklahoma City, Okla. — The Christian Crusade of the Rev. Billy James Hargis, a right wing organization, has fallen on hard times. Income has declined so sharply this year that almost half of the 50 man staff has been laid off and the rest have taken a 10% salary cut. The headquarters building in Tulsa has been sold. The organization is now renting space in it.

Hargis

Circulation of the group's monthly magazine has been cut almost in half to eliminate those who have stopped contributing. The magazine is in the red.

Plans for an elaborate new headquarters and a "cathedral" in Tulsa have been temporarily shelved

Income for the first seven months of this year was $396,000, compared with $470,000 for the same period last year. It is expected to fall well short of the annual income of $800,000 reached previously.

Hargis, 36, founder of the organization, disclosed these facts in a report to the annual convention, which ended this week. He elaborated on the report in an interview.

Hargis attributed the decline of the crusade to "smears" by liberals and, most of all, to rival groups that siphoned off financial support he might have received.

He said the growth of the John Birch society had also cut into the crusade's support.

The Christian Crusade was a fundamentalist religious movement when Hargis started it in Sapulpa, Okla., 17 years ago.

In recent years he has shifted its emphasis to "Awakening America" to the internal threat of Communist domination that he says he sees.

The crusade relies on contributions from citizens who hear Hargis' message and are moved by it to give the evangelist money to spread the alarm.

Hargis is heard on radio stations in 55 cities in the south, west and middle west. This also represents a cutback, of about 30%, from more affluent days.

However, the stations still include the mainstay, the 100,000 watt clear channel outlet in Monterey, Mexico, where his broadcasts began in 1954. Hargis reaches more followers over the station than all the others combined.

He also brings funds into the crusade's coffers with personal appearances, at which he warns with fervor of the Communist menace and then takes up a collection.

He said that on a recently completed "midnight ride" across 25 states with former Maj. Gen. Edwin A. Walker, he added 10,000 new names to the crusade's mailing list. The general lost his army post for trying to indoctrinate his troops with his political views.

Goldwater Resents Rockefeller Remarks

© New York Times News Service

Washington, D. C.—Senator Barry Goldwater Tuesday said he felt that Gov. Nelson A. Rockefeller was using "the old Democratic technique of guilt by association" in attempting to identify him with the radical right.

Rockefeller said at a press conference in Albany Monday that he would not support Goldwater as the Republican party's nominee "if he were a captive of the radical right." The New York governor has previously criticized the conservative Arizonan for not disowning the support of right wing groups. The danger, he has said, is that "the radical right, which is a part of the Goldwater following, will be able to capture its leader."

"I'm not going to answer this sort of thing from Rockefeller," Goldwater said in an interview. "He's using an old trick which the Democrats have used against us for a long time, and I'm not going to fall for it."

Goldwater said he thought it would be helpful if Rockefeller, Senator Jacob K. Javits (Rep., N. Y.) and other critics would define what they meant when they spoke disparagingly of the "radical right."

"Unless they are talking about Fascists, or this little Nazi party over here in Arlington, all the other groups I know anything about are completely within their constitutional rights in advocating the kind of stand they do," he said.

"Are the professional anti-Communists, like (Billy James) Hargis' Christian Crusade out in Oklahoma, or the prosegregation people down south a part of the 'radical right'? If that's the case, it would seem to put anybody who is not an anti-Communist or who is an integrationist in the 'radical left' and that's absurd."

Even the John Birch society, he said, is within its rights in advocating the impeachment of Chief Justice Warren and the abolition of the income tax, although he disagrees with both objectives.

"But if I were a candidate," he said, "I wouldn't disavow their support on that account, any more than I would that of ADA—and I doubt that I would get either." (Americans for Democratic Action is a liberal, anti-Communist political organization, which usually supports Democrats).

Racial Unrest Based on Legacy of Hatred

Negro Leader Says This Helps Explain Temptation to Turn to Violence

By JUNIUS GRIFFIN
Of the Associated Press

"We are not something from 'Porgy and Bess' . . . we want to share equally with our white brothers—yes, brothers."

These are the words of Herbert Fielding, businessman and a leader of the Negro community of Charleston, S. C.

An official of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, Fielding prides himself on being a moderate. But he sums up the temptation to violence, to express old angers that many American Negroes feel in this summer of crisis. He says:

"The Negro is mad, not angry, but mad and filled with a hate he has nourished for almost a lifetime."

The feeling is echoed in the north as a Negro youth suddenly snatches a white woman's handbag and flings it into the street.

"I did it because I hate white people," he explains.

"Hate" Heard Often

You hear the word "hate" again and again as Negroes, packed into the ghettos of Harlem and Washington, try to articulate their feelings. In Savannah and Charleston you hear it, too.

In Columbia, S. C., a Negro talks of his "intense dislike" of the white man.

In Charlotte, N. C., a Negro says: "We dislike the white man, but he's doing better."

North and south, animosity is a palpable thing. In the south because the Negro feels the weight of "Jim Crow" laws, written and unwritten; in the north because he faces discrimination when he wants to get a job or live in certain neighborhoods.

Where did it all begin . . . and where will it end?

Hosea Williams, 37, militant head of the Chattam County Voters league in Savannah, said:

"We Negroes weren't born hating the white man. We have cultivated this hatred and nourished it for years hoping that one day he would make us ashamed of ourselves. But he hasn't . . . he has given us pride . . . pride to protest and if necessary to tell him to go to hell if he doesn't allow us full and equal opportunities."

Williams said he once worked for the NAACP.

"But I became too hot for them, or rather too radical. I don't believe in tomorrow. I want equal rights for my people now. If necessary, I intend to die in Georgia fighting for what I believe is right and to leave my children an honorable legacy," he said.

Just as Prideful

In Charleston, NAACP official Fielding delights in talking about the historic beauty of the city and its traditions.

"The white man's great failing here is that he doesn't know that his Negro neighbors are just as prideful, stubborn and sensitive about this great city as they are."

Speaking of the racial crisis, Fielding said:

"We are at the bottom, the end of the rope. The only way the Negro can go is up. And if we must fight to get there, both races will wear the battle scars for generations to come.

"From where I view the racial situation, I see us emerging with a victory. And I see the white man going down in defeat. With just a little sincere effort on the white man's part we can both leave the battle scene in victory, knowing that we have solved a century old problem through mutual effort."

The Rev. I. Dequincey Newman, NAACP state field secretary, foresees a long and bitter fight ahead for Negroes in Charleston and other parts of South Carolina.

Take Down Barriers

"If the white man had any sincere desire about ending this problem, he would take down the barriers of segregation and allow responsible Negro leaders to concentrate on preparing the poor and impoverished Negro for the role he is to play in our new society," Newman said.

In Columbia, Dr. Howard E. Wright, president of all-Negro Allen university, said: "The task of helping our students to face the realities of our times is just as important as sending them out into the world with an academic education.

Complexion Fights

"The racial tempo here is such that any incident in a downtown restaurant or store can cause our students to drop their books and take to the streets.

"It's too bad that I can't join them. I can't tell them that everything will work itself out. This would be a lie."

Negroes in Columbia and Charleston live in a caste system within their own race.

Negroes who have light complexions are disdainful of their darker brothers, so much so that often they do not worship in the same churches, frequent the same clubs, live in the same neighborhoods, or even speak to each other.

E Cedric Hart, publisher and editor of South Carolina's only Negro newspaper, said this intraracial color problem hindered the solving of the larger racial conflict.

"My attitudes are those of a militant person," Hart said, "but I refuse to use my newspaper as a militant mouthpiece for the NAACP and disgruntled persons in the Negro community until they unite for a common good and stop bickering among themselves."

"We Want Rights"

Charlotte, N. C., has eased racial barriers in hotels, restaurants, schools and recreational facilities, but still is plagued with racial problems in hospitals and in job opportunities.

Dr. Reginald A. Hawkins, a Charlotte dentist and ordained Presbyterian minister, says:

"I served in World War II and the Korean war and I have no intention of stopping my people's fight for equal rights. We want those rights now, not gradually . . . but now."

Dr. Emory L. Rann, a Charlotte physician and leading Negro moderate, has spoken against racial demonstrations.

"Our demonstrations have simply outgrown their usefulness," Dr. Rann said. "It is now time we started negotiating with the city council. I don't see what good we can now derive from an ugly incident which could occur during a demonstration."

Dr. Rann stands almost alone in Charlotte's Negro community.

In addition to the division between militant and moderates in the Negro movement for racial integrgation there also is a split between what Negroes call "ceremonial" leaders and others who are close to the pulse of America's Negro masses.

S. Summer Stone, jr., editor of Washington's Afro American, declares:

"We need leaders who will continue to meet this problem head on—courageous and valiant fighters for racial equality in America."

Exciting Books That Deserve Reading

By IRVING DILLIARD

CHICAGO — Summer supposedly is a time for "light" reading. But in view of the domestic problems that confront us in addition to those on the world scene, it is a fair question whether any of us can afford reading these days that does no more than kill time. Here are some new books that are more exciting than most whodunits— and certainly more worthwhile:

Dilliard

"The Far Right" by Donald Janson and Bernard Eismann (McGraw-Hill). Two able, experienced newsmen have a careful, thorough look at the strongly reactionery element in American life and politics. Here are Billy Hargis, Gen. Walker, the Minutemen and all others who would take the law into their own hands.

"Men of Far Right" by Richard Dudman (Pyramid Books). A talented Washington correspondent reports on the Goldwaters, Buckleys, Welches, Towers, Thurmonds, Dirksens, and their political kin as a "new force" in our country. He gives much attention to the John Birch Society and Australian Fred Schwarz' "crusade." Gen. Eisenhower is commended for his warning about the "military-industrial complex."

"I Write for Freedom" by Thomas M. Storke (McNally and Loftin). The 1962 Pulitzer Prize in editorial writing went to the editor and publisher of the Santa Barbara News-Press for lowering the boom on the Birchites after their scurrilous attacks on Chief Justice Warren, President Eisenhower, the Dulles brothers and other patriotic Americans. This book is Tom Storkes's story of more than 60 years of fearless newspapering, topped by his revelations against the character assassins.

Era of 1930s

"THE TEMPTING Years" by Edwin P. Hoyty (Scribner). The decade from 1929 to 1939 began with the economic crash and ended with Hitler's invasion of Poland. Those crucial, turbulent years are recounted in terms of events and personalities — Hoover, FDR., Joe Louis, Earl Browder, Charlie Chaplin and Gangster Dillinger.

"Franklin D. Roosevelt and the New Deal" by William Louchtenberg (Harper). This excellent volume in the Commager - Morris New American Nation Series places the New Deal in historical perspective and shows the origin and development of influences and programs which we live by a generation later.

"Freedom of Speech and Press in America" by Edward G. Hudon. (Public Affairs Press). A specialist traces the development of the law on free speech, press and movies, with emphasis on Supreme Court decisions. His work recalls the great studies of Zechariah Chafee.

"Commitment" by Willard Uphaus (McGraw - Hill). This Methodist lay leader, peace advocate and religious educator, in the tradition of John Bunyan, went to jail rather than compromise his conscience. His autobiography must bring a feeling of both pride and shame to every American who reads it.

Lehman Cited

"HERBERT H. Lehman and His Era" by Allan Nevin's (Scribner). One of the bravest men in our entire history is the former Governor and Senator from New York who called Joe McCarthy to account. Distinguished historian Nevins gives Lehman his full due.

"My Life" by Claude Bowers (Simon and Schuster). From his picture on life in a small Hoosier town in the 1880s through politics, newspapering on the New York World and diplomacy as well as a literary career, Claude Bowers left us a book of memoirs that is informative, instructive and delightful.

"The Miseducation of American Teachers" by James D. Koerner (Houghton Mifflin). This book indicts American school and colleges of education for doing more harm than good. If it can be answered, somebody ought to be answering it and in a hurry. The charges are serious.

"Strike in the West" by James Daniel and John G. Hubbell (Holt, Rinehart, Winston). The authors reconstruct the Cuban crisis so as to make a collected, exciting whole out of one of the central historical events of our time.

Challenge to Peterson

New Democratic Leaflet Doubts GOP Birch 'Purity'

The first issue of the "New Wisconsin Democrat," a four-page newsletter which will go monthly to state party members, questioned the ability of GOP state chairman Talbot Peterson to really repudiate the John Birch society.

The newsletter, which is printed on slick paper and replaces the newsprint tabloid format used until now, also accused Republicans of blocking a fair legislative reapportionment.

Peterson, who recently said the Republican party has no room for the ultra-conservative John Birch society, was challenged to shed John Birch policies.

"We feel you (Peterson) have put yourself in an untenable position," the newsletter said. "On the one hand, you have said 'no room' for John Birch, while on the other, your party's domestic record and a goodly share of its record on foreign policy is at least dangerously close to Mr. Birch."

The newsletter also quoted James Buckley, deputy state Democratic chairman, as saying that the new Ninth Congressional district composed of Waukesha county and parts of Milwaukee county, is not the complete GOP stronghold many observers believe.

Buckley has been considering running as Democratic candidate in the new Ninth district in 1964.

yeah," he told a companion, "they're having the time of their lives. They get to come up here and see The Nigger."

For ten months, from that first riotous night to graduation day on Sunday, the role Ole Miss assigned Meredith was simply that—The Nigger. He was The Nigger through the first ugly month of jeers and threats and cherry bombs, through nine months more of stony isolation. He was still The Nigger even when a second Negro, Cleve McDowell, enrolled in law school last June.

Nice Guys: His life had been tougher and lonelier than Jimmy Hood's at Alabama. Denied quarters among married students, he had left his wife and 3-year-old son behind in Jackson. He could count his campus friends on one hand—a couple of liberal professors, a student from California who dropped by nights to help him with his trigonometry, and, lately, his roommate Cleve. "There are a lot of people here with good intentions," Meredith said. "A lot of them—most of them, in fact—are nice if there is nobody else around. If I'm in the library studying and there isn't anybody else around, they're the nicest people in the world. But if someone else comes in, they go to the other side of the room."

Yet Meredith endured what Hood could not—and more. At 30, he was ten years older. And unlike Hood, he is a loner by temperament—a solemn, proud, withdrawn man, unsettlingly so to Mississippi whites, opaque even to his friends. He came inured to the icy hostility about him: "Something like this is nothing new to a Negro." He grew impervious to danger: "Maybe a threat hanging over your head isn't so bad. It makes you get up off your tail and do the things you have to do."

It hurt more when Negroes turned on him for a speech he made at the NAACP convention in Chicago, a knuckle-rapping critique of young Negro activist leaders. That night, Meredith cried. But he has learned to live with that hurt, too. Though his eyes well up at the thought, Meredith understands that his loneliness is partly of his own making. "You're right," he said, when a visitor at Ole Miss suggested as much, "and I'll tell you something else—there aren't five Negroes in the world who understand me or what I have been trying to do."

Dreaming: The fact was that he had tried to do too much. But his dream —however quixotic—had helped sustain him. "The main object I had in coming here," he says, "was to change the basic relationship between whites and Negroes in Mississippi . . . to replace this basic governing principle of white supremacy." At first, he thought his presence alone might be the catalyst. In January, when he took stock—when he found himself in quarantine and still on campus only under armed guard—he thought of quitting.

But he stayed, and he scaled down his dream closer to one-man proportions. "Just having one or two Negroes at Ole Miss doesn't mean anything," he said. "I want to see 250 or 300 here. But the bulk of the people in Mississippi can't afford to go, and 90 per cent couldn't qualify if they could afford it." So, with the money that came in his daily bag of mail, he started the Meredith Education Fund to help Negroes—principally Mississippi high-schoolers—prepare for and pay their way to college. Meredith now plans to make it a full-time job, starting with a speaking and money-raising tour this month, hopefully building the fund to a $1 million operation, headquartered in Washington.

And so he endured, even when his schoolwork seemed to him—as it might to any undergraduate of 30—"just a job." At the end, Gov. Ross Barnett—who failed to keep Meredith from coming in the front door—tried one last time to shoo him out the back, demanding that his degree be held up for making "inflammatory" statements. But the state college board—nervous about Ole Miss's accreditation—turned him down. "I guess," Barnett said, "that ends it."

"To tell you the truth," James Meredith said after ten lonely months at Ole Miss, "I'm tired. I think if I had twenty hours more to go, I wouldn't make it." But with the end in sight, he was buoyant, willing to allow himself the luxury of a smile. "Just for this project," he said, "I feel I've done all I could do. I feel accomplished. I'm satisfied."

KU KLUX KLAN:

Button-Down Bed Sheets

"Let's be nonviolent," urged the man in the pulpit, and there was a spatter of applause from the 350 faithful gathered in the clapboard chapel in an oak grove outside Athens, Ga. In this summer of the Negro revolt, the way to win was peaceful protest—marches, sit-ins, boycotts, voter-registration campaigns, and, above all, a good public image.

"Let's be nonviolent," said Calvin Craig, Grand Dragon of the United Klans of America, Inc., Invisible Empire, Knights of the Ku Klux Klan. "We've got to start fighting just like the niggers."

That was the twist the Klan was turning across the South this summer—and selling hard enough to stir a small renaissance. The KKK had fallen far from its glory days of the '20s, when its roster numbered 4 million and—so the legend went—there was hardly a bed sheet south of the Mason-Dixon line without eyeholes. Now, according to the B'nai B'rith Anti-Defamation League's Atlanta regional office, the Klan has 40,000 to 55,000 subjects in an increasingly visible empire. But this summer, ADL said, it has enlisted 5,000 new members.

Its reputation tarnished by the flogging and lynching bees of bygone years, its racist thunder stolen by the white-collar white supremacists of the Citizens Councils, the Klan has become acutely conscious of what people might think. It hungers for respectability. It courts the press. "The purpose of this meeting is open to the public," Imperial Wizard

Newsweek—Karl Fleming

Rally in Savannah: The talk was heady but self-conscience

Robert Shelton proclaimed at the Empire's biggest recent pageant, a rally of 3,000 at Savannah, Ga. Later, Shelton—a former rubber worker from Tuscaloosa, Ala., who now travels about "Kluxing full time"—explained to NEWSWEEK's Karl Fleming: "You have got to have public relations. Our program is going to be on more of an informational basis."

Tactician: The new Klan flatters the unlikely likes of Martin Luther King Jr. by imitation. Sit-ins? Singling out the Athens branch of a cafeteria chain that had desegregated in Atlanta, Craig exhorted: "... You good white folks ... just go in there and get you a glass of water and just sit." Mass marches? "If the mayor doesn't stop these niggers from marching and demonstrating in Athens, then we're going to march and demonstrate too." Biracial negotiating committees? "We want the Klan to represent the white folks ... You don't ever have anyone but those left-wing liberals and niggers. The white people have been left out."

Some members find the new look too tepid. At a recent rally at an Augusta, Ga., auto race track, one parboiled Klansman simmered through a long, droning Shelton philippic about the Kennedys and Communist "infilteration" of the civil-rights movement and egalitarian clergymen: "It behooves me to see such large masses of these ministerial associations as they sit back and draft their resolutions . . ." Halfway through, the Klansman boiled over, slipped under the wooden grandstand, and got into a fist fight with a Shelton fan. "I didn't come out here to hear him talk about all this Communist stuff," he bellyached as a Shelton aide intervened. "Why doesn't he talk about the niggers?"

Eulogy: Klan old-timers, indeed, prefer a headier oratorical brew. At the Savannah rally, red-robed Georgia Kleagle Fonnie Miles eulogized the slain NAACP leader, Medgar Evers: "A certain jig down in Mississippi got himself killed—"

"Yeah!" whooped the crowd.

"—for sticking his nose in other people's business ... Why that's just another dead nigger, and that's the only good ones there ever is—the dead ones."

Yet even Miles was a mite image-conscious. "I know some of these press people are gonna say about me being illiterate because I say nigger," he said. "I guess they think I'm self-conscience about it. But I ain't."

The top leaders are self-conscience. Shelton and Craig have been circuit-riding the South in mufti, enlisting new members for a $10 Klektoken (initiation fee) and $1-a-month dues. Most of all, they have tried to wash the Klan image as bright as a freshly laundered bed sheet. "The Klan," Shelton says, "is not as derogative as you might think."

WASHINGTON

Recovering Congress

by Kenneth Crawford

CONGRESS stirred last week. There were manifestations of life both in the House and Senate. After more than seven months in a state of catalepsy, the legislative branch seemed to be coming around. An invigorating wave of cool, dry air out of the north may have had something to do with it. Predictions that the session would drag on into the Christmas season (and then fizzle out in futility) certainly did. Whatever the reason, committees long deadlocked began to make decisions, and bills long delayed began to make progress.

The crispness of Senate hearings on the test ban was enough in itself to give the Capitol new tone. Secretaries Rusk and McNamara were persuasive witnesses, knocking down objections as they came up, with certainty and tact. Backed up by chairman Seaborg of the Atomic Energy Commission and chairman Taylor of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, they dispelled whatever doubt remained about Senate ratification of the treaty by a majority well in excess of the two-thirds required.

Questions indicated that there would be a few holdouts, but probably not more than ten. Several senators seemed to be genuinely concerned about the possibility that the Soviet Union, in its last test series, had learned more about the effects of big bomb explosions than the United States knows or will be able to learn without further atmospheric tests. Others seemed to resent the success of the test-ban negotiations for political reasons. Senator Hickenlooper of Iowa, for example, said he knew what the treaty wouldn't do but not what it would do. Senator Goldwater took the same line.

MAIL FROM MOTHER

What they knew—and what every senator knew—was that cessation of testing by the big atomic powers would shut off the principal sources of noxious debris in the atmosphere and that this was what interested their constituents most. Congressional mail suggested that voters were quite willing to be uncertain about the effects of the Soviets' big bombs if their worries about the genetic effects of fallout from tests could be relieved. Much of the mail came from mothers of young children. This could account for the grumpiness of Hickenlooper and Goldwater.

While the treaty was winning the consent of the Senate, the House Ways and Means Committee at long last reported a tax-reduction bill. It had been working at this project almost since the start of the session, often with tantalizing slowness. The bill that finally emerged was shorn of most of the so-called reforms demanded by chairman Mills and Secretary Dillon and cut down to offset resulting losses to the Treasury. However, it would still provide almost $11 billion of tax relief for individuals and corporations, starting in 1964 and taking full effect in 1965.

TAX CUT LIKELY

In the opinion of President Kennedy's economic advisers, this will assure a high level of economic activity in the years just ahead although it will probably not, by itself, solve the unemployment problem. Public support of the measure has been surprisingly lackadaisical and Republican leaders Dirksen and Halleck keep predicting that it won't pass for this reason. But a 19-to-4 committee vote for its major features almost guarantees its passage by the House. And the Senate will pass it if it can get by Senator Byrd's Finance Committee.

The present plan calls for House action on taxes while the Senate is getting the civil-rights filibuster out of its system. Administration strategists are confident now that they can push through a civil-rights bill with some kind of public-accommodations section included. They confess concern, though, about the Aug. 28 "March on Washington," feeling that much will depend upon the impression made by the anticipated 150,000 demonstrators.

They expect a series of education bills, several already passed by one branch, to make it at this session. They also hope for a substantial foreign-aid bill, unpopular as they know it is. They concede that mass transport, medicare, and domestic youth corps legislation won't make it. Even so, this session can turn out to be respectably productive, after all.

JOHN BIRCH HIGH COMMAND INTERLOCKS WITH OTHER RIGHTIST GROUPS TO FORM DIRECTORATE OF REACTION

On Pages 2 and 3 of this issue of the Political Memo is a chart which links the high command of the fascistic John Birch Society (center column) to other right wing organizations (left-hand column), and to business groups, government, universities and private corporations (all in right-hand column).

The chart is by no means complete, but its net effect is to show how the influence of the John Birch Society fans out. It shows that the men who control JBS share control in other ultra-right groups. It shows how close are the ties of some big industries to JBS and to the right wing at large.

The Birch Society was chosen as the subject of this chart because it is highly-organized, active and troublesome, more so perhaps than any other right wing organization. Many of its leaders, herein listed, are "pillars of the community," industrialists, bankers, retired generals. They are mostly men of status, whose anti-labor, anti-progress views find an outlet in the press and other mass media.

It is impossible to trace all the lines on the chart. But with patience, good eyesight and the help of a ruler, most of the connections can be found.

In the left-hand column are listed the most prominent of the rightist groups. Many of them were on the scene long before the Birch Society, but many are Birch fronts. The Birchers believe in using fronts. In fact, JBS dictator Robert Welch urges his followers to "organize fronts—little fronts, big fronts, temporary fronts, permanent fronts, all kinds of fronts," for the Birch Society to hide behind.

One front Welch boasts of as a JBS promotion is ORFIT, the Organization to Repeal Federal Income Tax. This is the outfit behind the so-called "Liberty Amendment," which has been approved by six state legislatures.

The center column, listing JBS leadership, contains some of the biggest names of the far right. As the chart shows, their connections with other rightist groups are abundant. Among them are William J. Grede and Ernest Swigert (former NAM presidents), A. G. Heinsohn and Roger Milliken (union-hating industrialists), Fred C. Koch and Clarence Manion ("right to work" promoters), T. Coleman Andrews, Spruille Braden, F. Gano Chance, E. Merrill Root, Charles Edison, J. Bracken Lee, J. Howard Pew, Billy James Hargis, Gen. Bonner Fellers.

HOW BIRCH SOCIETY IS LINKED WITH OTHER RIGHTIST GROUPS

Among the big industries listed in the right-hand column are Avco Mfg. Co., J. I. Case, Chrysler Corp., Deering Milliken, General Motors Truck Co., International Tel. and Tel., Jones and Laughlin, Kimberly-Clark, Raytheon, Rock Island Oil, Sears-Roebuck, Sun Oil, U.S. Gypsum, U.S. Steel, a bunch of banks, textile firms and others.

Business groups listed are the Farm Bureau Federation, U.S. Chamber of Commerce, NAM and their state affiliates.

It adds up to a threatening picture: Men of influence and community standing—many of them representing giant industries—are banded together in an organization dedicated to shattering trade unions and preventing social welfare progress. This organization in turn interlocks with others with identical causes, forming a well-organized, well-heeled apparatus that is a threat to democracy itself.

JOSEPH ROURKE NEW COPE DEPUTY DIRECTOR

A veteran labor and political leader, Joseph M. Rourke, has been named deputy director of COPE by AFL-CIO President George Meany. Rourke succeeds Al Barkan who was recently appointed COPE director as successor to the late James L. McDevitt.

A member of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers since 1928, Rourke served as secretary-treasurer of the Connecticut Federation of Labor after World War II and retained the same post when the AFL and CIO merged in Connecticut.

He has served three consecutive terms in the Connecticut House of Representatives, formerly was a state senator and a New Haven alderman.

MEANY WARNS OF RIGHTIST POLITICAL DRIVE IN '64, URGES ALL-OUT LABOR EFFORT IN CITIES, SUBURBS

AFL-CIO President George Meany has warned "the money and manpower of big industry and the right wing will be pumped into the 1964 elections in unprecedented amounts to elect conservative candidates."

In a kickoff address to last week's COPE Big Cities Conference, Meany urged delegates to offset the conservative drive by using "our natural advantage in the big cities and their suburbs. We must register record numbers of union members, their families and friends, and we must conduct a massive get-out-the-vote campaign."

About 80 delegates, representing the nation's 22 most populous metropolitan areas, attended the conference.

Meany said, "The outcome of the presidential and congressional elections next year will hinge on what we are able to accomplish in the major industrial cities and the fast-growing suburbs around them. Nothing can be taken for granted. We can afford no illusions about the prospects for liberal victories in 1964. Only if we get our members to register and vote can we feel confident of reasonable success."

He said, "We certainly must improve on past performance." He pointed out in 1960 only about 60 percent of union members voted in the presidential contest, and approximately 50 percent voted in the 1962 congressional elections. "This just about equals voting performance of the population as a whole, but we should do better."

Recent formation of conservative political action groups provides conclusive evidence that reactionaries are stepping up their political efforts in hopes of making 1964 a year to elect a Congress and a President who will "turn back the clock on progressive legislation," Meany stated. Among such groups, he said, are the American Medical Political Action Committee of the American Medical Association, and the Business-Industry Political Action Committee, launched this summer by the National Association of Manufacturers.

Meany called on delegates to "redouble your efforts to increase the effectiveness of citywide register-and-vote drives, and to vastly expand the political participation of union members."

Also addressing the conference was political analyst Louis Harris who cited statistics showing the gap in voting performance between city-dwellers and rural and other non-urban residents.

Harris said in 1960 in New York State, 18 percent less of the total number of urban citizens eligible to vote turned out than in non-metropolitan areas of the state; in Missouri, 15 percent; in Ohio, 11 percent; in Wisconsin, 9 percent; in Illinois and Minnesota, 7 percent; in Michigan, 6 percent; in California, 5 percent.

He said this lag in voting performance of city-dwellers "costs hundreds of thousands of votes for liberal candidates."

Harris predicted pivotal issues in the 1964 presidential race will be health insurance for the elderly, taxes, Cuba, civil rights, foreign aid and President Kennedy's handling of the economy. On all of these issues, Harris said, public support of the President's programs hovers around 50 percent, making them "battleground" issues. Issues working strongly for the President, he stated, will be defense, space, foreign policy, education, labor policies, Peace Corps and Kennedy's personality.

Agriculture, government spending and his handling of Congress will be issues on which the President may be vulnerable, Harris forecast.

Among other speakers at the COPE conference were James McGregor Burns, professor of political science, Williams College; Roy Reuther, citizenship director, United Auto Workers; Richard Scammon, director, U.S. Census Bureau; Rep. Frank Thompson (D.-N.J.); Rep. James O'Hara (D.-Mich.); AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler; Lawrence O'Brien, special assistant to President Kennedy.

Vice President Lyndon Johnson also addressed the meeting, commending COPE's non-partisan registration campaigns. Delegates capped the conference with a visit with President Kennedy at the White House Rose Garden.

GOP PROS SEE GOLDWATER AS 1964 NOMINEE . . .

A majority of Republican party professionals see Sen. Barry Goldwater a lead pipe cinch to be the GOP presidential nominee in 1964, according to New York Times writer Cabell Phillips. Informed sources inside the GOP, Phillips says, claim Goldwater is a candidate despite his "Who, me?" disclaimers.

Goldwater has a stranglehold on GOP national convention delegations from southern and border states, as well as southwestern and Rocky Mountain states, Phillips says. Only in the northeast and Great Lakes states is Goldwater weak.

Party leaders, the Times reporter says, are willing to swallow Goldwater's ultra-conservative views. They feel whatever the outcome of a Kennedy - Goldwater presidential contest, with Goldwater heading the ticket, more GOP senators, governors and congressmen would be elected.

. . . AND A HUGE FUND BUILDS UP FOR GOLDWATER CANDIDACY

A bottomless well of funds apparently awaits Sen. Barry Goldwater's push for the presidency. Roll Call, a Washington, D. C., weekly publication, reports $7.5 million already is in the bank and another $17 million is pledged for use the moment Goldwater wins the GOP nomination, if he does.

Roll Call quotes one source on Capitol Hill as saying the Arizona senator "can tap right in on Texas oil money," and there's little doubt that all the resources of rich right-wingers would be at his disposal.

BARRY'S BACKERS GET 'HOW TO WIN' BY CLOAK-AND-DAGGER PLOY

Reporter Jack Anderson, writing in Drew Pearson's Washington Merry-Go-Round column, reveals the Draft Goldwater Committee is secretly using COPE's How to Win Handbook as its political guide. He described the following cloak-and-dagger operation:

"F. Clifton White (Draft Goldwater director) was afraid to be seen at the AFL-CIO headquarters, lest he lose his standing in the Goldwater movement. So he sent an office girl to make the purchase (of the handbooks), cautioning her to use a phony name and office. She identified herself at the AFL-CIO as 'Jack Anderson's secretary,' then delivered the manuals to Goldwater headquarters."

The Goldwater folks don't just tear a leaf from someone else's book, they use the whole thing.

PASTORE QUESTIONS GENEROSITY OF AMA

The Senate recently passed a bill providing funds to aid construction of medical and dental schools and for low interest loans to students of medicine, dentistry and osteopathy. Before passage, the Senate rejected an amendment proposed by Sen. Barry Goldwater which would have killed the student loan section of the bill. Goldwater said the loan program was unnecessary since the American Medical Association already provides such loans.

But Sen. John Pastore (D.-R.I.) pointed out AMA loans are at the high interest rate of 6½ percent. "That's how generous they are," Pastore said of the AMA.

GOP MEETING TO MAP DIXIE DRIVE

Republicans are marshalling their troops preparatory to an all-out drive into the south in the 1964 elections. A two-day strategy meeting, first of its kind ever held in the south by the GOP, is planned November 8-9 in Charleston, S. C. The Republican National Committee is sponsoring the meeting.

I. Lee Potter, special assistant to GOP National Chairman William Miller, is masterminding "Operation Dixie" and says prospects "were never brighter" for Republican success in the south. Party people have sprinkled Dixie with bumper stickers levelled at President Kennedy and his brother, Attorney General Robert Kennedy, bearing the message, "Ban the Brothers." Sponsored by the GOP National Committee, a special publication written for southern consumption is published, the Republican Challenge.

Potter claims the Republicans will win votes in the south on their appeals for fiscal conservatism. But it was only a year ago, the fall of 1962, when GOP candidates in two major elections—the Senate races against Olin Johnston in South Carolina and Lister Hill in Alabama —relied heavily for votes on appeals to race prejudice, with fiscal conservatism a distant second.

UNWAVERING WELCH NEW ALLY OF MEDICS

The professional medical politicians have found a staunch ally in their battle against health insurance for the aged. He is Robert Welch, founder of the John Birch Society. Welch was featured speaker at a recent meeting of the Los Angeles County Medical Association Section on General Practice.

In a letter to members announcing the meeting, the president of the group praised Welch for "espousing the cause of private medicine" and for his "unwavering stand against bureaucratic contamination of the physician-patient relationship."

Welch's "unwavering stand" is pretty expensive. It cost members of the medical group $10 a head to hear him.

Office memo

WHILE "word of mouth" has always seemed to us a graceless phrase, it best expresses the person-to-person link that has built the solid chain of loyal subscribers to The Progressive. A letter last month from Manny Mittler, San Francisco, is a dramatic example:

"I recently 'inherited' the June copy of The Progressive through the good graces of one of your subscribers, the Honorable Chester Bowles, the newly appointed Ambassador to India.

"I am a steward on the SS President Cleveland, a passenger ship which travels to the Far East every six weeks. Mr. and Mrs. Bowles were passengers on this ship from San Francisco to Yokohama on this last voyage as the first part of their trip to Mr. Bowles' post in New Delhi. I had the good fortune to be able to enjoy several short conversations with them and as a result Mr. and Mrs. Bowles learned that my ideas and attitudes were somewhat 'progressive' and subsequently gave me your very fine magazine.

"I found the June issue very enjoyable and every article, without exception, extremely informative, stimulating, and tremendous food for thought, as did several other members of the crew. One crew member is becoming a new subscriber. I will continue to purchase the magazine at newsstands. I am enclosing $1 for two copies of 'A Century of Struggle.' "

Thank you, Ambassador and Mrs. Bowles—and Mr. Mittler.

A perennial question that we enjoy hearing every autumn is, "Do special student rates still exist this year?"

Special rates for students, teachers, and adult study groups are still in effect, at the same low rates of other years. Where there are ten or more subscriptions going in a single bundle to one address, The Progressive is available for $1 per student per semester (five months).

Bulk orders for The Progressive are now being shipped to several thousand high schools, colleges, and community groups around the country. If you want to experiment with the controversy-generating power of The Progressive, we will be glad to send you sample copies free, with no obligation.

Last year a social studies teacher in a West Coast high school who has used The Progressive for years in his classes complained gently that his file of the magazine was worn out. "Unfortunately," he wrote, "these magazines are also of tremendous value to the other members of my department." Fortunately, if there are ten or more members, each can have his own copy under this extraordinary bulk rate.

For more information and a convenient order form, please turn to the back cover.

The Test Ahead

SENATE RATIFICATION of the limited nuclear test ban treaty seemed certain as we were going to press in late August. The only questions that remained were the size of the victory margin and the extent to which the few avowed opponents and the more numerous "yes, but" school of Senators might try to nibble away at the treaty with destructive reservations.

The signing of the treaty by the United States, the Soviet Union, and Great Britain in Moscow on August 5, followed by its acceptance by more than sixty other nations, stands as the high-water mark in mankind's fitful quest for peace since the end of World War II. It represents the first concrete achievement in the long and painful struggle for international control of the atom since the dawn of the atomic age eighteen years ago. It constitutes the first major East-West accord on any issue since the signing of the Austrian State Treaty on May 15, 1955—a treaty, incidentally, the Soviets have honored with scrupulous care these eight tense years.

Much has been said and written during the past month on what the treaty does not do, and the list is long and formidable. It was nice to know that the Soviet band played George Gershwin's When Love Walked In as Soviet, British, and American officials gathered in the glittering ballroom of the Kremlin to toast the signing of the treaty, but no one thought for a moment that love and understanding had replaced their opposites in Soviet-Western relations.

Little love walked in when Senate committees conducted their hearings on the test ban treaty. In fact the Kennedy Administration, in its anxiety to appease and reassure Senate critics and doubters, kept emphasizing the enormity of our nuclear might and how much more we can achieve in weaponry through legal underground tests. Administration witnesses were so persistent in pounding at this theme that a listener at Senate hearings, The New York Times observed, "might be forgiven if he thought at times that what was under discussion was a proposal for intensifying both the arms race and the cold war." The test ban accord seeks just the opposite, of course.

The treaty agreement, banning all forms of nuclear testing except those underground, is a first step. No more. Its significance is more symbolic than concrete, although it would be a grave mistake to underestimate its very real benefits in reducing worldwide radioactive pollution of our planet and in slowing down the spread of nuclear weapons.

Herblock in The Washington Post

"As I Was Saying, A Test Ban Agreement Might Have Resulted in a Fatal Gap"

Although the treaty is severely limited in its immediate application, its authors hopefully planted the seeds for a more bountiful harvest in the future. Their aspiration for far greater goals was stated in the Preamble which asserts that the "principal aim" of the signatory nations is "the speediest possible achievement of an agreement on general and complete disarmament under strict international control, in accordance with the objectives of the United Nations, which would put an end to the armaments race and eliminate the incentive to the production and testing of all kinds of weapons, including nuclear weapons."

While reaching this glittering goal of general and complete disarmament may take a long time, it is clear that the test ban treaty opens the door to a series of intermediate agreements—some of which are even now under consideration—that could go far toward relaxing the fears and suspicions generated by the cold war. It was this note that President Kennedy struck when he emphasized that the underlying significance of the treaty was that "it may lead to further measures to arrest and control the dangerous competition for increasingly destructive weapons."

It is here, however, that powerful opposition is mobilizing. The President's determination to regard the treaty as only the first step in an ongoing process of peacemaking, rather than as an isolated prohibition of specific forms of nuclear testing, has set the stage for a bitter, basic struggle between those who believe in the urgent need for negotiated settlements with the Soviets, and those who regard negotiation as appeasement and coexistence as a Khrushchev trap for gullible Americans, and who are therefore committed to what they characterize as "total victory" over the Kremlin.

The "total victory" forces, bent on a far more aggressive foreign policy that could lead to nuclear war, reject the prospect of accommodation with the Soviets. They have not dared engage in a frontal attack on the nuclear test ban treaty. They know that it commands widespread support in the country and they are especially fearful of what they call the "mother vote" for peace. But they are much bolder in waging their open warfare against the Kennedy Administration's commitment to searching for the next steps in the pursuit of peace.

Thus, even before the conclusion of the Moscow meetings on the test ban treaty, the two leading Republicans in Congress, Senator Everett McKinley Dirksen, Illinois, and Representative Charles Halleck, Indiana, the minority leaders who make up the tiresome twosome of the "Ev and Charlie" show, opened fire on the Administration. Halleck denounced the "Kennedy Administration's deplorable history of concessions to the Soviet Union," and Dirksen asserted that "the President's departure from a policy of strength is a grave error that will come to plague America more and more if the new policy of coexistence is pursued."

More recently, Senator Barry Goldwater, who didn't seem to know where he stood on the treaty itself as we were writing this, expressed fear of what might follow ratification of the treaty. "One of the areas of gravest concern to us, as we consider the proposed limited nuclear test ban treaty," he said, "is the so-called next steps that will be taken on the basis of the treaty."

Perhaps the most revealing disclosure of the mood of those who fear further agreements with the Kremlin was reported by Chalmers Roberts, foreign affairs analyst for The Washington Post: "One Republican Senator commented that some of his colleagues fear the treaty may be just a beginning and that what they worry about is what might follow. For one thing, some worry about the economic effects of disarmament, if it should lead to that. For another, some worry that the treaty may be a prelude to closer Soviet-American relations, to 'peaceful coexistence' with the Communists in such areas as Eastern Europe and Cuba."

It seems to us inconceivable that United States Senators, who know better than the average citizen the destructive power of nuclear weapons, can be more fearful of "closer Soviet-American relations" and "peaceful coexistence" than they are of all-out nuclear war which, as President Kennedy told the nation, could destroy a minimum of 300 million human lives in less than sixty minutes.

The opposition to continuing negotiation with the Soviets springs in part from an inferiority complex—the fear that Khrushchev will outwit and outmaneuver us in any agreement reached. This is a preposterous position, given the history of negotiations over the last decade. The fear of next steps in negotiation is rooted, too, in the conviction that Communism is fixed and unchanging, that the ugly experiences of the past, and there have been many, make it impossible to consider accord in the future. But the record is clear that the Soviets have changed, markedly and in many ways in recent years, however wide remains the gulf between them and us. It was the late Pope John, in the celebrated encyclical he issued shortly before his death, who emphasized that the original concepts of a political movement may remain constant, but the movements themselves "working on historical situations in constant evolution, cannot but be influenced by these latter and cannot avoid, therefore, being subject to changes, even of a profound nature."

Interlandi in The Los Angeles Times

"Fallout from testing doesn't bother me, but if we vote against the test ban treaty, the political fallout next year could kill us"

The powerful forces mobilizing against further negotiated settlements with the Soviets contend that "total victory" over Communism is the only patriotic goal we can embrace, given the kind of world in which we live. Anything less than "total victory" involves the surrender of our principles of freedom to a nation whose philosophy and way of life are repugnant to everything we say we believe in. In other words, the alternative to "total victory" is "total defeat." This argument, about which we shall hear much the rest of this year and all through the campaign year of 1964, is shot through with fatal fallacies. Thus:

¶ Total victory over Communism can be achieved only through total war, which would mean the destruction of our way of life, along with that of the Communists'. The advocates of total victory are understandably shy about openly demanding all-out nuclear war, but they have offered no alternative approach to total victory.

¶ Historically, total victory has turned out to be neither total nor victory. The Allied powers achieved total victory in World Wars I and II, but victory in both wars created as many problems as it solved. More to the point, total victory for us in World War I was accompanied by the triumph of Communism in Russia and total victory in World War II was followed by the triumph of Communism in China. Will total victory in World War III, assuming survivors, result in the ascendancy of Communism in Latin America or Africa or both?

¶ The assumption that the only alternative to total victory is total defeat is simply not true. We have lived in the same world with Communist Russia for nearly half a century and there is no reason to assume we cannot go on that way indefinitely without surrendering the principles of our democracy in any way. The alternative to total victory is not total defeat, but rather, as a beginning, the development of a live-and-let-live arrangement under which both sides yield enough to prevent the destruction of both.

¶ Coexistence does not require that we modify our way of life to accommodate the Communists or that the Russians adjust their ways to suit us. On the contrary, implicit in the concept of coexistence is the certainty that struggle between the two systems will go on for a long time, but the struggle will be ideological, social, economic, and political—rather than military. Khrushchev has insisted that the conflict in the realm of ideology will continue no matter how many and how great are the agreements designed to relax tensions and prevent war, and the Kennedy Administration has cheerfully accepted the challenge on these terms. This is the difference between coexistence and coannihilation.

The real issue between the two civilizations, said Senator William Fulbright, chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, "will not be decided at the frontiers where they confront each other, but by what happens within each of the two societies." It is within our power, he added, "if we are wise and strong and patient, to shape our destiny toward the fulfillment of the highest values of our civilization while encouraging the forces of moderation and common sense that are by no means entirely absent from Soviet society."

Here is the heart of our problem—to develop within our own society the creative surge and progressive program that will enable us to demonstrate the superiority of our free way of life over the totalitarianism of the Communist system. This means democratic planning and action to abolish unemployment and poverty, wipe out racial discrimination, build better schools and homes and hospitals, expand our social security system, and provide greater cultural and recreational opportunities for all our people.

It is a curious and tragic fact that the same forces in this country that demand "total victory" over Communism are opposed to the very domestic programs which would enable us to win the only kind of victory that we can achieve in this nuclear age—a victory that demonstrates through what we do here at home that democratic planning is superior to totalitarian regimentation.

The big test ahead is what happens after the limited test ban treaty is ratified. The "total victory" crowd will demand an end to further "appeasement," their synonym for negotiation. The Kennedy Administration, if it does not, for political reasons, wander away from its present proclaimed position, will press forward to negotiate the next steps toward peace. In this effort it merits the all-out support of everyone of us. We find it hard to believe that many Americans will reject the concept of coexistence, with its underlying challenge to peaceful competition, in favor of the doctrine of "total victory," with its underlying acceptance of coannihilation.

A Refreshing Breeze

It is only in the true blue superpatriotic atmosphere of fear and timidity that constitutes the slowly-dwindling legacy of the McCarthy era that a concept as absurd as "overkill" can go so long unchallenged by the nation's leaders in Congress. The ability of the U.S. military machine to wipe out the Soviet Union many times over was achieved several years ago, yet the Pentagon, with Congress egging it on to ever-greater efforts, has continued to build a mounting stockpile of missiles and nuclear warheads. Today current overkill capacity is so great that our ability to destroy the Russians—and theirs to annihilate us—is estimated at several to more than a thousand times over.

The seeming lack of logic in pursuing this policy, and the growing danger it perpetuates, have been a source of grave concern to many Americans. But their political leaders have shied away from even an examination of the military value of overkill capacity. Congress all too frequently has rushed Pentagon appropriations through to passage without the semblance of debate or discussion, and, on occasion, votes to increase the astronomical demands of the military establishment. Now, at last, a voice has been raised in the Senate itself to question the efficacy of creating still more nuclear arms to add to "a stockpile of nuclear weapons in excess of any conceivable need."

Senator George McGovern, South Dakota Democrat who has not yet completed the first year of his first term in the upper chamber, dared ask the Senate recently: "Has the time not come to question the assumption that we are adding to defense and security by adding more and more to the nuclear stockpile?. . . . We need a thoroughly honest discussion and debate . . . about the basic postulates of our defense strategy." The courageous young Senator then followed up his sensible question with a practical proposal that to Congress is the equivalent of heresy: Senator McGovern suggested a $5 billion reduction in the military budget now under review, currently pegged at $53.6 billion—well over half of the total Federal budget.

The Senator made it clear that his proposal made no concession to a policy of "passive surrender" to Communism, which he rejects along with the other extreme of a nuclear "preventive" war. Rather, McGovern contended that a reduction in arms production would strengthen the nation morally and economically, reduce the dangers of inadvertent war, and lead to a more stable world condition offering greater national military security.

Senator McGovern's challenge to the nation is a refreshing breeze in a stale smog of militarism. Coming in the midst of debate on the test-ban treaty, it strengthens the hope that the monolith of the military and the conspiracy of silence based on a false sense of patriotism may yet be breached.

No less a witness than the Secretary of Defense himself, Robert S. McNamara, has estimated that the first blows of a nuclear war between the Soviet Union and the United States would kill as many as 300 million people in the two warring nations and in Europe.

"It is very difficult," the Secretary told the Senate Armed Services Committee, "to conceive of what kind of military weapons would continue to exist. . . . It exceeds the extent of my imagination to conceive of how those forces might be used and of what benefit they would be to our nation at that point."

Why, then, asked Senator McGovern, should we continue to add to our surplus of nuclear weapons?

The Senator's answer to his own questions were that "we cannot afford this policy economically, politically, or morally, and if we persist in following it we will weaken our nation both at home and abroad. . . . What possible advantage can there be to the United States in appropriating additional billions of dollars to build more missiles and bombs when we already have excess capacity to destroy the potential enemy? How many times is it necessary to kill a man or a nation?"

Planning for Peace

Senator McGovern went beyond a critical examination of the military questions involved in overkill to the economic problems inherent in reducing arms production. He proposed that to minimize dislocation, facilitate industrial expansion, reduce regional dependence on the military market (one in three Southern California workers, to cite one example, is dependent on arms contracts), and to reduce unemployment, that these initial steps be taken:

¶ All large defense contractors be required to form a committee to plan for conversion from military to civilian production in the event of termination or reduction of defense requirements.

¶ The creation by the President of an Economic Conversion Commission to estimate Federal support that may be needed to supplement local and regional efforts.

¶ The convening by this Commission of a national conference to focus national attention on the problems of conversion and economic growth. The conference would include trade associations, labor unions, professional societies, representatives of government agencies, and industry.

It is clear that the American economy is in grave need of long-range planning to avert chaos if peace, or even a reasonable facsimile, were to break out. Ten per cent of our gross national product goes into military goods and services. Half of our scientists are involved in military-related projects.

Even today, as McGovern pointed out, this excess military emphasis hobbles our economy in many respects. American machine tool production, once the envy of the world, has skidded to fourth or fifth rank among industrial nations. The U.S. government finances sixty-five per cent of all research and development, mostly for military purposes, whereas in West Germany—a typical example—eighty-five per cent of research is privately-financed, nearly all for civilian purposes. Belgium, Holland, Italy, and Japan provide similar contrasts. The result is that the United States is steadily losing ground in world industrial competition.

Yet a recent survey by The New York Times revealed that defense industries are doing next to nothing in planning for conversion from war to peace production. When asked if they were doing any planning, the Times reported, "many contractors reacted with surprise and even shock, as if they were ice cream vendors being asked what they would do if children were abolished."

There is little immediate "danger" that arms production will be seriously curtailed. But there are enough straws in the wind, in the form of the test ban treaty and Defense Department admissions of excess nuclear baggage, to indicate immediate need for planning for the time when—and if—the threat of mutual destruction is eased and the American economy begins a shift away from arms production toward more constructive civilian pursuits.

Senator George McGovern, to his everlasting credit, has at least broken the long conspiracy of silence by his call for a rational re-evaluation of basic policies that have too long been placed outside the realm of debate in what its members are pleased to regard as "the world's most deliberative body."

Rich Man, Poor Man

Unlike water, money does flow uphill, to the top of the economic pyramid. During 1962 enough flowed upward so that 398 persons reported to the Internal Revenue Service that they had made at least a million dollars (the average was two million) during the year. This was ninety-two more million-makers than in 1961. With the IRS list at 398, only two short of Mrs. Astor's plutocratic and socially elite "Four Hundred," the buildup of new millionaires has been roaring along at the fastest pace since the Twenties.

This trend is bound to accelerate with the recently disclosed higher dividend yield accompanying the present record boom in profits. Not all dividends, of course, will go to those making at least a million dollars in 1963, and to the estimated 100,000 persons with assets of a million or more. But the one-eighteenth of one per cent of the population who are millionaires will get a bountiful share of the U.S. corporate profits now piling up at the incredible rate of more than $28 billion a year.

Some of the dividends will trickle downward through the economic strata, but not even the brokerage house of Merrill, Lynch, Pierce, Fenner & Smith, the great Wall Street evangelist of common stocks for the common man, will be able to find enough traces reaching the poorest one-fifth of our nation to dampen a litmus paper. This neglected one-fifth, numbering more than thirty-four million Americans, lives at the lowest depths of poverty. Their incomes average less than $2,700 a year for a family of four. This estimate by Robert J. Lampman, consultant to the President's Council of Economic Advisers, applies to the desperately poor. What AFL-CIO economists call the "really poor" number forty-two million. Still other sources, government and private, using a higher figure as the poverty indicator, estimate the total at forty to fifty million.

These millions of the poor, struggling in their own grim world at the bottom of the economic pyramid, do not look upward for the torrent of dividends that have thrown Wall Street into ecstasy (mixed with complaints that the Kennedy Administration is bad for business). Their immediate ambition is to work for and get a decent wage. Among them are nearly all of the country's unemployed, some 4.3 million jobless, or 300,000 more than a year ago. Others are employed only part-time, or at full-time wages which are too low to feed, clothe, and house a family decently. In this nether world of the economic underprivileged, seven million are Negroes, eight and a half million are more than sixty-five years old, and several million are youths who are either now jobless, or likely to be, within the next few years.

The presence of these vast pockets of poverty in the midst of record-breaking affluence for those at the top of the economic pyramid does not seem to disturb the latter in the least. On the contrary, some of them seem determined to whittle away at the modest measures adopted by Congress to provide a tiny degree of opportunity for the poorest among us. To achieve this goal they have established still another activist organization on the extreme right.

With a kitty of $100,000 from the National Association of Manufacturers, a key directorate of top officials from industry, finance, the utilities, and publishing have set up a new organization to elect more conservatives to Congress. The new group, the Business-Industry Political Action Committee (BIPAC), describes itself as the "new force in politics." It wants to "protect the principles of individual freedom" and "represent the competitive, free enterprise viewpoint." This old NAMese, translated, means less liberty, less competition, and even less Federal legislation to relieve the distress of those at the bottom of the economic pyramid.

BIPAC seeks members and contributions. No doubt many of the new millionaires will be allowed to rub shoulders democratically with old ones as they flock to the colors of BIPAC with their checkbooks. The phrase "new force in politics" has an almost proletarian sound, like a mass movement, and not at all like the cover for an old force that has been working in politics, and elsewhere, against the common man's needs throughout most of this century.

Trouble on the Right

The battle for cash supremacy between the Big Two of the ultra-Right rapidly approaches a climax. As of now it appears that the Christian Crusade, headed by the Reverend Billy James Hargis, will surrender first place to the John Birch Society of Robert H. W. Welch, Jr., before the year is out.

The income of the Crusade is now running at an annual rate of less than $700,000, compared to $760,000 in 1962 and $800,000 in 1961. If the Birch Society merely maintains its 1962 pace of $737,000 in revenues, it will wind up at least $37,000 ahead of the Crusade this year.

Things have been going so badly for the Crusade that the Reverend Hargis has been forced to lay off half of its fifty man staff and give the survivors a ten per cent salary cut. His broadcasts, once heard on radio stations in about eighty cities, have been pared down to fifty-five cities in the South, Midwest, and West. (He retains his powerful radio outlet in Monterey, Mexico, which reaches more of his followers than all the other stations combined.) His 75,000 circulation magazine has gone into the red. The Crusade's annual duespayers at $10 each now number only 3,500, a figure which sadly disappoints the Oklahoma crusader against "Communist infiltration." However, he insists his Operation Midnight Ride speaking tours across twenty-five states, with former Major General Edwin Walker as co-alarmist against a Red "take over" of the country, added 10,000 names to a mailing list claimed to total about 400,000.

Facing his crusaders recently assembled in convention at Oklahoma City, Hargis pleaded: "We need help and we need it desperately. Who will electrify this crowd by standing and pledging $10,000 for God and country?" No one did, but his audience finally produced six pledges of $1,000 voltage each, along with a number of lesser contributions.

The drop in the Crusade's income, now at a three-year low point, is ascribed by Hargis partly to "smears" by liberals but mostly to the fact that the Birch Society's growth has cut into his support, while other Right-wing groups are getting more numerous and siphoning off funds for themselves.

The money has been rolling into Birch headquarters in a way that Hargis envies. Mr. Welch's Society has filed a report with the State of Massachusetts showing $737,716 income during 1962, compared to $534,214 in 1961, a handsome increase of nearly forty per cent. The Society has said it has 124 full-time employes but it has not disclosed its membership total. However, on the basis of total dues revenue officially reported, estimates are that the membership ranges from 12,000 to 24,000 members. More revealing than a breakdown of the nearly $300,000 in dues payments would be disclosures of some of the important sources of the other $437,000 in Birch revenues during 1962.

Despite its rosy financial position, all is far from well in Birch ranks. In two rare interviews Welch has admitted that the rate of membership growth has slowed. Moreover, a Harris poll in The Washington Post demonstrates that its immediate potential is not as great as some have thought. Of those interviewed who said they had knowledge of the Birch Society—representing seventy per cent of the populace—only five per cent said they approve, forty-two per cent said they disapprove, and fifty-three per cent said they were not sure. Even Americans who identify themselves as conservatives expressed opposition to the Society by more than four to one—eight per cent for, thirty-five per cent against, and fifty-seven per cent not sure. This repudiation by top heavy majorities among those who know about the Birch Society should give Welch solid cause for gloom these days.

A Ghost

THE continued existence of Morton Sobell is an offense to the things we hold dear. The things we hold dear are peace and quiet. Sobell, by his continued existence, leaves us none.

If he were dead and buried—like his "fellow-conspirators," the Rosenbergs—we'd have peace and quiet. If he were free, we'd have peace and quiet and never hear of him again. (He's no genius as a scientist.)

But alive, and thirteen years in prison, and seventeen to go, he torments us.

With the Rosenbergs he was convicted on disreputable testimony—there was no evidence—at the peak of the McCarthy panic in the Korean War. They "gave the atomic bomb to the Russians," said the judge; and now we know that the Russians had the basic "secrets" in 1940—before we had them.

If the Rosenbergs had confessed, they'd be alive; clemency by telephone was available to them even in the death chamber. (Ten years later the Circuit Court of Appeals held that their trial was unfair under, alas, the present interpretation of the law.) If Sobell had confessed (like the state's witnesses), he'd be free and (like them) in clover.

But the criminals didn't commit the crime—indeed, as we know now, nobody did—so they wouldn't confess. And Sobell won't. He was kidnapped by "persons" acting secretly for the United States government. He was falsely accused, falsely tried, falsely convicted, and falsely imprisoned—all by the due process of law. The Supreme Court has never reviewed the record.

There's new evidence, and no way to get it heard. Mr. Kennedy turns his courageous profile away from his executive power. The parole board—without saying why—refuses a parole after the most competent possible witnesses testify that Sobell is an ideal candidate for it.

This living ghost of McCarthyism haunts us from his cell and shames our pretense that we are different from them because the state exists for man in our society.

Morton Sobell is no great shakes. Neither were Sacco and Vanzetti. We made them great. We can unmake Sobell, and deprive him of his power to torment us, only by freeing him. But then the Rosenberg case will break wide open again.

Do we dare? Do we love our country? Do we love it enough to want to set it free from its shame? The address of the Sobell Committee is 940 Broadway, New York 10.

Exporting Greed

A significant segment of the drug manufacturing industry is up to its price-fixing, profiteering tricks again, but this time there is a new twist to the shenanigans which could seriously undermine our relations with Latin America.

The minister of public health of the poverty-ridden South American country of Colombia had entered into an agreement with McKesson & Robbins, one of the larger U.S. pharmaceutical firms, for the purchase of low-cost drugs and antibiotics, to be provided under generic rather than under high-cost brand names. The health minister has estimated that four-fifths of Colombians are too poor to buy these essential medicines at the list prices quoted by other American manufacturers. Even at prices far below those charged by competitors, McKesson has reported that it is earning "very satisfactory profits." But the greedy competition was determined to block the McKesson arrangement.

The Colombian government has produced evidence that a number of leading American drug firms met and formulated plans to enlist the support of the U.S. government in an effort to prevent the distribution of the low-cost drugs. The Senate Subcommittee on Antitrust and Monopoly, under the chairmanship of the late Senator Estes Kefauver, conducted an inquiry whose conclusions substantiated the Colombian charges. But to head off a formal investigation of the activities of the drug makers, the Kefauver Subcommittee's case was transferred to the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, which in turn recommended that the matter be turned over to the Justice and State Departments, where it now rests, in a sort of limbo.

The irony in the situation is that Colombia's only practical alternative to the McKesson arrangement for low-cost generically-labeled drugs is a government-owned drug-manufacturing monopoly which would freeze out private competition entirely.

Many of the same drug companies involved in the Colombia affair were recently found guilty by the Federal Trade Commission—after five years of legal maneuvering—of fixing prices on an antibiotic whose sales run to $100 million a year. The avaricious companies, whose margin of profit is almost twice the national industry average, were characterized by the Commission as acting "with unclean hands and bad faith."

So far, Congress has not been willing to enact the kind of legislation necessary to prevent the drug industry from stealing the American consumer blind. Now that the industry is trying to export its monopolistic practices overseas, damaging the Alliance for Progress in the process, perhaps Congress could be persuaded to take a fresh look at the drug industry's rapacious practices.

Estes Kefauver

Back in those dark days of 1954 when McCarthyism was riding high, liberal Democrats in the Senate panicked at the prospect of being branded "soft on Communism." To prove their patriotism and appease McCarthy they sponsored a bill to outlaw the Communist Party. The stampede to support the measure was one of the saddest scenes in the Senate in our generation. The vote for passage was eighty-one to one. The lone dissenter was Estes Kefauver. His friends and staff had pleaded with him not to vote against the bill; it would be political suicide, they warned. But Senator Kefauver refused to be a party to the rampant hysteria in the Senate. He went it alone, as he had before and would again. And he proved that courage and integrity are not necessarily fatal handicaps to a successful political career.

The tragic death of Estes Kefauver at age sixty silences one of the most persistently authentic voices for progressivism heard in the halls of Congress in our time. Although soft-spoken, patient, and relaxed, the tall Tennesseean was a driving, relentless crusader for the underdog in our society. Although not a great orator—his delivery was dull and his content riddled with cliches—he managed to reach the people far more effectively than many a more eloquent orator.

Senator Kefauver first gained national renown through his investigation of organized crime and its corrupting effects on public morality, but it was his later work as chairman of the Senate Antitrust and Monopoly Subcommittee that proved most productive and is likely to be most enduring. In his role as champion of the consumer against monopoly power, he conducted deep-going investigations into price-rigging in steel, automobiles, bread, electrical equipment, and drugs. His inquiries led to enactment last year of legislation controlling the marketing of drugs and in 1961 helped to expose and break the price conspiracy in the electrical machinery field.

A Southerner, Senator Kefauver did not flinch in the struggle for civil rights. He took no part in Southern filibusters against integration measures and he risked the wrath of his Dixie colleagues—not to mention a substantial portion of his constituency—by refusing to sign the Southern Manifesto calling for massive resistance to desegregation.

We of The Progressive will miss not only his significant contributions to the development of a new American progressivism, but we shall miss, too, his warm personal friendship. He was a devoted admirer of this magazine. Each year at Christmastime he gave several dozen gift subscriptions to his friends. Every time we asked him to do an article, he cheerfully assented, no matter how burdened he might be by the wide-ranging pressures on his time.

Perhaps more than any of his colleagues, Estes Kefauver was the "Senator of the People." It is they who have lost a constant friend and indefatigable champion.

The New Leader

Last month we published in these columns a commentary on testimony presented before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee in its investigation of paid lobbying by American firms for foreign interests. One of the Committee disclosures cited was a statement by Hamilton Wright, Jr., who with his father operates a public relations firm that numbers Chiang Kai-shek's Republic of China as one of its principal clients. Wright testified before the Committee that his firms had contributed $3,000 to The New Leader for publication of an article by Richard L. Walker regarded as friendly to Chiang's Nationalist regime.

A subsequent statement by The New Leader, made public soon after we had gone to press, denied Wright's allegation. Arrangements to publish the Walker article, The New Leader said, "consisted of the American-Asian Educational Exchange's agreeing to purchase 10,000 copies of the Walker study for private distribution, thereby making its publication possible." It was with Marvin Liebman, executive vice-president of the American-Asian Educational Exchange, a non-profit foundation, that Wright dealt, not The New Leader, and the magazine has denied having had "any knowledge of the Wright organization, or any involvement it may have had with the American-Asian Exchange."

"Moreover," The New Leader's statement continued, ". . . the Wrights never saw a copy of the Walker manuscript before its publication . . . Dr. Walker's paper . . . was originally prepared in 1957 as a Rockefeller Brothers Fund Special Studies Project . . . [which] gave him [Walker] permission to publish it. . . ."

While our report in the August issue was accurate as far as it went, we are glad to be able to present a more complete version based on The New Leader's statement.

The Federal Union Under Fire

by FRED J. COOK

Three Constitutional amendments whose total impact would weaken the Federal union, imperil progressive legislation, cripple civil rights and liberties, and perpetuate minority rule, have achieved an extraordinary degree of approval in a number of state legislatures in the first round of the struggle to make them the law of the land. Fragments of the story of this organized assault on our Constitutional system have appeared in a number of publications, but they have lacked many of the essential ingredients of the whole story. The Progressive assigned Fred J. Cook, a seasoned reporter-investigater, to dig deeply into every phase of this dangerous development. He was aided in his extensive researches by a grant from the Stern Family Fund. Mr. Cook is a free-lance writer whose major magazine work has appeared in The Nation; he has also written for The Reader's Digest, American Heritage, The New York Times Magazine, Comet, Saga, and others. He has won four major awards for the excellence of his magazine articles.—THE EDITORS.

ON JULY 27, 1962, delegates from twelve Southern states met in Biloxi, Mississippi, for a conference that was to have far-reaching effects. It was a conference that was to stimulate a racist, ruralist, right-wing attempt at counter-revolution in America. It was a conference that was to develop a unique power-play of national dimensions, a play directed from the top by a group of powerfully placed legislators, supported by reactionary business and rural interests, whooped on by adherents of the lunatic fringe; a play that at its inception could boast virtually no grass-roots demand or support, but that, if successful, would alter drastically the American system of government by stripping away Federal power, instituting state supremacy, and reducing the nation to little more than a confederation of states.

This was the program, mapped tentatively at Biloxi, that has only now, more than a year later, generated a mounting measure of alarm by its phenomenal success—a success that has seen three proposed radical-right amendments to the Constitution speed through the legislatures of a broad cross section of states. One proposal has received full approval in fifteen states and partial approval in five others; another, full approval in twelve states and partial approval in seven others. The spadework begun at Biloxi has, so far, tunneled its destructive way into, or through, more than half the state capitols in the Union.

The Southerners who met at Biloxi, all officials of Southern states, were attending a regional conference of the Council of State Governments. They were possessed by a states' rights fervor which John C. Calhoun might have envied. Many elements contributed to this state of mind. Southern politicians long had been alarmed over a Federal power that reached down into their states and threatened their stubbornly-maintained racial primitivism. Ever since the U.S. Supreme Court's unanimous school desegregation decision in 1954, they had been in covert or open rebellion. Now, in 1962, they had a new case, a new cause—one that presented them with a golden opportunity.

In March, the Supreme Court in Baker vs. Carr—the Tennessee reapportionment case—had made another landmark decision. Many states, dominated by rural political machines, had ignored the specific mandates of their constitutions to reapportion legislative districts to keep up with shifts in population. This failure to redistrict legislative seats continued through an era that has seen America change from a predominantly rural economy to one so overwhelmingly metropolitan that it is estimated eighty per cent of us ultimately will be living in cities. Tennessee had ignored this change; it had not reapportioned its legislature in sixty years. As a result, it had virtually disenfranchised hundreds of thousands of city voters, maintaining a "rotten borough" system in which rural influence was predominant. It was this system, common across the land, that the Supreme Court struck down in Baker vs. Carr. The Court ruled that when legislatures failed to correct such serious distortions of voting equality, the Federal courts themselves could reapportion legislative districts. It was a ruling that could topple rural and small town dominance of legislatures in the South and other regions. Implicit in Baker vs. Carr, if carried out in full measure, was the naked threat of extinction to every rural political oligarchy in the land.

This new "court crisis" gave Southern politicians a rare opportunity to join forces with legislatures in every region in a common "resistance cause." Southerners had been toying for years with the hope of forming such a new power base. Alone, they had recognized their helplessness, but they had long dreamed of fusing Dixie with the Midwest farm belt and the Mountain states in a rural-oriented complex that could counterbalance the voting power of the great industrial states. This, essentially, had been the dream of Senator Lyndon Johnson in his abortive campaign for the Democratic Presidential nomination in 1960; it remains the gleam in the eye of Senator Barry Goldwater as he looks hopefully to 1964. In Baker vs. Carr the Southerners found a fulcrum with which to lever national political action, and the evidence demonstrates that the more perceptive among them seized the opportunity.

The Biloxi regional meeting adopted two important resolutions. The first asked Congress to draft a Constitutional amendment forbidding the Federal courts to interfere in reapportionment cases. The second cited a long list of grievances, replete with condemnations of Federal judicial power. It called for a strict separation of Federal-state powers, demanded judicial restraint, and appealed for legislation to curb the authority of the Federal judiciary. The two resolutions formed, in effect, a states' rights manifesto. The Southerners, having adopted them, looked for a base of support. They set their sights on the annual conclave of the influential National Legislative Conference, to be held in Phoenix, Arizona, in September, 1962.

Step by step there now developed the inside power-play that was to lead to the launching of three drastic Constitutional amendments. One would so alter the method of amending the Constitution that the states could propose and ratify amendments without any participation by Congress, by legislative action on the state level with no national forum to focus and crystallize public opinion. The second would deny the Federal courts any jurisdiction over the apportionment of legislative seats. The third, and most radical of all, would create a Court of the Union, composed of the chief justices of the fifty states, with power to overrule the U.S. Supreme Court in all cases involving Federal-state relationships.

Such was the explosive package for which the fuse was to be lighted by the Southerners when they moved on to the next stage of their power-play in Phoenix.

To understand the sequence that now unfolded, one must first appreciate the interrelationships and the interlocking power of a number of organizations of legislators and state officials.

At the pinnacle is the Council of State Governments, a thirty-year-old agency maintained by the states. Its objectives are to improve state procedures, further cooperation in solving interstate problems, and improve Federal-state relations. Since it is the one permanent, functioning body in its field, it also serves as a secretariat for a number of other loosely affiliated organizations.

Two of these were to achieve special importance in the developing amendment drive. The first was the National Legislative Conference. This is composed of two elements: staff personnel who work for state legislative bureaus or committees, and legislators and other elected officials who serve as members of permanent or interim committees directing such personnel. The second organization is the General Assembly of the States. This is composed entirely of state officials and legislators. The Assembly meets biennially, its convention details arranged by the Council of State Governments, to discuss state problems and the relationships of the states to the Federal government.

Herblock in The Washington Post

"If You Don't Like This Situation, You Can Cast Your Twentieth of a Vote Against It"

Even a cursory examination of this interlocking chain is revealing. It is obvious that although the bases for membership in the various organizations differ slightly, their directorates, which are dominated by important legislative leaders, often overlap. This enables an inside power complex of extreme conservatives in the National Legislative Conference also to exert influence on the General Assembly of the States and to a marked degree on the highly prestigious Council of State Governments itself.

Certain other vital aspects of these organizations must also be noted. First, though they have a quasi-official prestige, they are not truly official nor truly representative. The word "delegates," when applied to attendance at their conventions, has meaning only in the loosest sense. Anyone who qualifies for membership is entitled to attend. There is no formal selection of those who should attend; the only determining factors are private desire and financial means. As a result, attendance is likely to be composed principally of axe-grinders who have been supplied with either public or private resources to get to the site of the grinding.

A spokesman who has observed from inside the mechanics of these interrelated groups puts it this way:

"Most state legislatures tend to be quite conservative, and usually it is the more conservative of these conservatives who attend the meetings. It is the old story. Those who are passionately against something, those who are really wrought up, are the ones most likely to show. The good guys, the lofty idealists, you might say, tend to be less well-organized, and they don't charge into the breach until the damage has been done and a crisis is at hand."

In 1962, the normally strong conservatism of these legislative conventions was intensified to an ultra hue by states' rights pressures, especially by the emotions aroused by Baker vs. Carr. This was the nettle in the minds of some 750 state legislators and officials from forty-six states who gathered in Phoenix for the three-day convention of the National Legislative Conference held September 19-21. One observer, who watched the delegates in action, has provided this description:

"It is important to remember that members of the state legislatures felt themselves most affected by Baker vs. Carr. As a group, they certainly felt changes were going to affect them personally—things were going to be done to them. There had been, of course, for some time, a large amount of underlying criticism of Supreme Court decisions, but it was Baker vs. Carr that crystallized resentment into action at this particular time."

Definitely, says this observer, there were strongly organized groups within the conference who knew exactly what they wanted and were determined to get it. He explains that he does not mean radical right organizations like the John Birch Society. The wheels were set in motion by highly-placed men, jealous of their own prerogatives. The Southerners, in their segregationist fervor, were a dynamic force but they were only part of a national coalition, which powerful leaders had been assembling for months.

From as unlikely a state as New Jersey (heavily industrialized, in 1960 the second state in the nation in population density) came a delegation as united in purpose as any delegation from the South. Its leaders were Assemblyman Frederick H. Hauser, a Democrat from the declining one-time Hudson County stronghold of the late Boss Frank Hague, and Senator Wayne Dumont, a Republican from Warren County, and in 1961 an unsuccessful contestant for the state gubernatorial nomination against President Eisenhower's one-time Secretary of Labor, James P. Mitchell. The Baker vs. Carr decision had shaken Dumont. Though the limits of the newly-proclaimed Federal power were still to be defined by future court decisions, Dumont, a lawyer, read into it a declaration of carte blanche authority on the part of the Federal judiciary to revamp the entire legislative membership of the states.

What most disturbed him was the prospect that the Federal courts might order reapportionment of the state senates, as well as the lower houses, on a strict population basis. The present New Jersey Constitution, adopted in 1947 by popular referendum, provides that each of the state's twenty-one counties shall have one senator and that each county shall also have a minimum of one assemblyman, with the remaining seats in the lower house apportioned on the basis of population.

"We have built into our Constitution a system of checks and balances," Dumont says, "and if you do not have such a system in the legislature, the smaller counties will never get any legislation passed. A few large counties like Essex [Newark] and Hudson [Jersey City] would dominate everything, and out here we would be lucky if we even got crumbs. People who want to base everything on population may be idealists, but I'll say one thing—they've never served in a legislature. If they had, they'd soon have found things don't work that way. You have to have bargaining power."

It should be noted that Dumont's fears may not have been exaggerated, for on July 17, 1963, a three-man Federal court, in the first action of its kind in the nation, reapportioned both houses of the Oklahoma legislature on a strict population basis.

"If this is what is going to happen, the counties will lose their political identities completely," Dumont says. "Any red-blooded individual who is going to let that happen to him is nuts. And I mean that literally."

In Phoenix, he found other state legislators whose views were virtually identical with his own. "Everybody was aroused about it, and we all felt the same way," Dumont says. "I have never seen all the states so united on anything."

The issue came up for discussion on the last day of the Phoenix conference. The original intention of the Southerners, reportedly, had been to get the conference to endorse the Biloxi resolutions, but, instead, a change in strategy was adopted. The conference passed a resolution of its own, entitled "Strengthening the States in the Federal System." The resolution cited the "increasing concentration of power in Washington" and instructed the Conference's Federal-State Relations Committee "to prepare a report exploring a clear-cut approach" to a method of amending the Constitution through action initiated by the states. The committee was instructed to report its recommendations at the next meeting of the General Assembly of the States in Chicago in December.

The ball had now been passed from the meeting of Southern delegates at Biloxi to the National Legislative Conference, from the Conference to its Federal-State Relations Committee, and the next step had been charted—the step by which the committee would trigger action in the General Assembly of the States and the influential Council of State Governments.

With the end of the Phoenix conference, one comes face-to-face with a key figure in the amendment drive—Representative W. Stuart Helm, Republican Speaker of the Pennsylvania House. Helm was chosen chairman of the National Legislative Conference at Phoenix. He was also second vice-president of the Council of State Governments and, as such, a member of the Council's executive committee. As Legislative Conference chairman he had the power to appoint the members of the Federal-State Relations Committee that would draft the amendment proposals. In these overlapping capacities, W. Stuart Helm was highly influential, with the power to initiate action and to influence the reception given that action.

Speaker Helm comes from a declining rural-industrial region. His home is in Kittanning, in Armstrong County, about fifty miles from the Ohio border. He has been a member of the lower house of the Pennsylvania legislature for twenty-four years, is now its fourth oldest member in length of service, and is serving his second term as Speaker. He began his career operating a service station, but for the last twenty years he has been employed by the Sun Oil Company, which is controlled by the Pew family, long noted as bankrollers of Republican and right-wing causes. Now an executive in Sun Oil's merchandising division, Helm exhibits considerable sensitivity about intimations that, because he works for Sun Oil, he is in reality only a mouthpiece for Pew interests.

"I'm employed by Sun Oil, yes, but that's as far as it goes," he insists. "Every year when the legislature meets, I take a leave of absence from my job for several months while the legislature is in session. I've been very careful about that. I don't want anyone to say that there's a conflict of interest."

Obviously, Sun Oil is honored at having on its payroll the Speaker of the Pennsylvania House and, patriotically, does not mind the sacrifice it must make in depriving itself of his services for several months each year so that there may be no conflict of interest.

Helm, now in his fifties, stands close to six feet tall, has a pleasant, slightly sharp-nosed face and thinning gray hair that gives him a distinguished look. He is proud of his staunch conservatism. Drew Pearson, he says, called him a "liberal" conservative, and he bridles at the tag. "I don't know where he gets anything liberal about me," he says. "I've always been a strict organization Republican which, in my understanding of it, tends to be more on the conservative side. I'm certainly no ADAer."

Helm discusses the amendment drive with apparent candor, yet he is sometimes far less candid than he appears. For instance, asked how the idea was born, he responded emphatically:

"I can tell you exactly. We have this committee, a subcommittee of the Conference on Federal-State Relations. This committee came up with these ideas at a time when the Conference was not in session. This was following the National Legislative Conference at

Long in The Minneapolis Tribune

"We're Gettin' Up A Little Party to Show Yuh Our Appreshiation"

Phoenix. Since we were not going to be in session, we had provided that any recommendations made by the committee should be submitted to the Assembly of the States meeting in Chicago in December . . . and that was how the whole thing started."

This is at best a deceptive oversimplification. Helm insisted he had never heard of the Biloxi meeting; he even made the astounding statement that the amendment issue had not even been discussed at Phoenix—indeed, had never been discussed before the National Legislative Conference. "We didn't discuss it at Phoenix, and we haven't discussed it since," he said. "We have had no occasion to"—a statement that is only technically correct from the viewpoint that specific amendments had not yet been drafted at the time of the Phoenix meeting. The actual proposals, of course, were the work of the committee that Helm named to do the deed.

"The men on the committee were appointed because they were all men I knew," Helm says. "I called them or wrote them—in most cases I called them personally, but in some I wrote letters—and asked them if they would serve, and they agreed."

Subsequent evidence reveals that Helm knew his men well; for of the nine-man committee he appointed, eight were militant advocates of the amendment. Since it was in this Helm-named committee that the deed was done, the identification of its key members becomes important.

Its chairman was Assemblyman Lloyd W. Lowrey, of California, who had begun his career as a teacher but had spent the last thirty years farming and livestock raising. Though elected as a Democrat, Lowrey in recent years had been considered as anti-progressive on most legislative issues. Those who know him rate him an ideal presiding officer for Helm's committee—a man with a definite bias, but one who would consider his role almost judicial and would try to be fair. He would not lead; he would preside and rule—and, though he would strive for fairness, his own personal slant would weight his ruling on any sensitive issue.

With such a chairman, committee sparkplugs would be needed to fire the work, and there is no question Helm found them. All accounts agree that the principal sparkplug was William V. Chappell, forty, a former Speaker of the Florida House and a man deemed in Florida political circles to be a radical rightist. During a special session of the Florida legislature in 1956, Chappell was a leading spokesman for die-hard segregationists sponsoring a series of racist bills, some of which would have closed the Florida schools. Some Florida newspapers have labeled Chappell and his political cohorts "the Pork Choppers" from North Florida and have editorially denounced a favorite scheme of theirs to resurrect the so-called Blindfold Bill. This would set up two slates of unpledged Florida electors in the next Presidential election, in effect depriving the electorate of any real choice.

The Florida interests, with Chappell as their moving spirit, were to become dominant in drafting and pushing the amendments. But they received major assistance from at least one Northern legislator—Warren Wood of Illinois. Wood, born in Joliet in 1910, represents Will County, south of Chicago. He is vice president of the Union National Bank and Trust Company of Joliet, and with banking he combines farm management. He served four terms as Speaker of the Illinois House, and in 1959 became minority leader. A power in the Illinois legislature, his political philosophy is reflected by what is perhaps his best-known quote—that the Tenth Amendment to the Constitution "has been raped twice a day for ten years." The most radical and controversial of the three proposed Constitutional amendments, the Court of the Union proposal, is the brain child of Warren Wood.

Other pro-amendment members of the committee, all active in backing one phase or another of the proposals, were: James Turman, then Speaker of the Texas House, later to be defeated in a contest for the post of lieutenant governor; Thomas D. Graham, Speaker of the Missouri House; Robert D. Haase, Speaker of the Wisconsin Assembly (he at first substituted for and later succeeded Speaker David J. Blanchard following Blanchard's death); Clarence L. Carpenter, President of the Arizona Senate, soon to be elected first vice president of the Council of State Governments; and Assemblyman Hauser, of New Jersey.

This was a solid, conservative phalanx. The ninth committee member and lone dissenter was state Senator Frank King, of Toledo, Ohio, a liberal Democrat with a pro-labor background. King himself is mystified as to how he came to be chosen. He had not attended the Phoenix meeting, but he had served for several years on the executive board of the National Legislative Conference, he was well-known to many delegates, and he suspects that, since his views were not definitely known, a wrong guess was made in his case. Helm gives a different explanation.

"Originally, King wasn't on the committee," Helm says, "but then someone said that we were loaded with members who were all for the amendments and we should get all shades of opinion, we should hear all sides—and so we asked him to serve."

This passion to hear both sides did not extend to the point of setting up an even debate; Frank King was left alone to battle eight opponents.

The National Legislative Conference's Committee on Federal-State Relations met in Chicago two days after the 1962 general election. It had before it as a working base, according to Senator King, the resolutions that had been adopted at the Biloxi conference in July. The purpose was to rework these resolutions and put them in the form of specific proposals to be submitted to the General Assembly of the States.

The drafting committee began work early in the morning, labored throughout the day, and did not finish until late at night. Frank King was appalled by the determined and, to him, radical attitude of his conferees.

"That fellow from Florida, Bill Chappell, was loaded for bear," King recalls. "He brought a whole delegation with him, judges, lawyers, constitutional experts. Any question that came up, he had an expert there to answer it. They were well-financed, well-prepared; this was an expensive operation, no question about it. But where the money comes from—that's the $64 question you can't get an answer to."

King still sounds baffled, a man wrestling with extreme frustration, when he tries to describe his attempts to talk sense to his fellow committee members. He could find no possible meeting of minds.

"Take Warren Wood, for example," King says. "To sit down and have dinner with him, he impresses you as a very decent sort, a likable guy. He's not the starry-eyed, fanatical type at all. But he has this twist to him. He thinks that something drastic has to be done to save the nation, and he's ready to do it if he has to die for it. A lot of these fellows seem to really believe it. They don't seem to realize that the very things they advocate would ruin the nation they say they're ready to die to save."

By the time the day's work was done, the three amendments had been whipped into virtually final form. The strategy of the proponents called for the various state legislatures to pass three resolutions calling upon Congress to summon a Constitutional Convention. This procedure, though provided for in the Constitution, and intended as an avenue for the states to offer Constitutional changes, has never been used in our history by the required two-thirds of the states. There are virtually no guidelines for the organization and functioning of such a convention. Clearly, however, if two-thirds of the legislatures passed the proposed resolutions, the same rural-dominated bodies could handpick the delegates to dominate the convention. Such a convention, if ever called, could dismember the basic structure of the governmental system created by the Constitutional Convention of 1787. Here are the proposed amendments:

One—This amendment calls for a radical addition to the methods of amending the Constitution. It provides that whenever the legislatures of two-thirds of the states—thirty-four—pass identically-worded resolutions, Congress would be compelled to deem such amendments proposed. Then, ratification within seven years by three-fourths of the legislatures—thirty-eight—would make such amendments the law of the land. This procedure would make it possible to by-pass Congress in the amendment process and raises the prospect (as, indeed, was soon to be demonstrated in the amendment drive) that powerful, conservative insiders in the state legislatures could maneuver passage of such amendments before the public knew what was happening. Commenting on this amendment, the American Civil Liberties Union warned that such a step might make it "possible for such basic rights as freedom of speech and religion, the privilege against self-incrimination, the right to jury trial or other freedoms in our Bill of Rights to be removed from the Constitution by a minority point of view."

Two—This amendment is designed to maintain rural control of legislatures in perpetuity. It would prohibit the Constitution "or any amendment thereto" from restricting or limiting "any state in the apportionment or representation in a state legislature." It would also bar "the judicial power of the United States" from ruling on any case involving "apportionment of representation in a state legislature."

Three—Warren Wood's Court of the Union proposal would set up a super-court, composed of the chief justices of each of the fifty states. Within two years after any ruling by the U.S. Supreme Court involving Federal-state relations, a demand by the legislatures of five states, "no two of which shall share any common boundary," would be sufficient to bring the Supreme Court's decision before the new super-court for review. The decisions of this new Court of the Union would be "final" and could be changed "only by an amendment to this Constitution."

With this package virtually completed, the Council of State Governments was asked to place the amendment issue on the agenda of the General Assembly. It complied. The amendment-drafting committee met once more, in Chicago, on December 4. This was a brief session, devoted to a final review of the previous month's handiwork. The committee, on this second look, liked what it had wrought and ordered its proposals printed for presentation to the General Assembly.

The climax now approached, and the insiders had one more move to make. The Board of Managers, ruling body of the Council of State Governments, was meeting in Chicago on December 5, the day before the General Assembly's convention. If the amendment proposals could go before the Assembly with the Council's august blessing, their chances would be greatly enhanced. And so an effort was made to gain the endorsement of the Council's Board of Managers.

This time, Brevard Crihfield, executive director of the Council, carried the ball. In his annual report to the board, Crihfield minced no words. In explicit terms, he denounced the Baker vs. Carr decision.

"The Supreme Court," he said, "has planted both feet in the political jungle. To me, the only surprising facet of Baker vs. Carr and its aftermath is the relish with which some Federal courts have wielded their now-declared power to tell the states what they shall do—or else. . . .

"What can be done? We can wait, wring our hands and hope that subsequent Supreme Court determination of specific issues . . . will perhaps leave some small area within which the states can retain authority over basic apportionment policies. Or we can decide to take a stand . . . "

Crihfield left no doubt about what the stand should be. "We must have close to unanimous state agreement," he declared, "if the states are to be successful in initiating any amendments to the basic law of the land."

This all-out endorsement by Crihfield has caused considerable trauma within the Council of State Governments itself. Even now, months later, responsible Council spokesmen will try to tell you that Crihfield's words did not really mean what they seem to say—that he was not recommending action, merely explaining the problem. Crihfield himself, however, is entirely candid about his position.

"You will notice," he said, "that I said nothing in my remarks about Amendment three [Warren Wood's Court of the Union proposal]. I will say that on the other two my remarks supported those, and I still do."

This, then, was the position of the powerful executive director of the Council, backed by support in the Board of Managers, for Helm, Lowrey, and Carpenter were all members of the board. Despite this, the board did not take a position on the issue. It simply passed the hot potato to the General Assembly of the States.

Legal Opinion Asked For — and Rendered

It is intriguing to note that up to this point, except for the Southerners at Biloxi, no organization in the circle had irrevocably committed itself. The National Legislative Conference, since it was not meeting (and would not until late this summer, in Honolulu), had not formally ratified the work of its committee. The committee's work had been reviewed by the governing body of the Council of State Governments, but this body had not committed itself either. Yet, despite this lack of full commitment, the ideas germinated at Biloxi had been steered through the channels of command by deft manipulation and were now ready for the General Assembly. And, significantly, though the Council's top board had not taken a stand, Crihfield's report, fully supporting two of the three amendments, was placed in the hands of all Assembly delegates.

These delegates, it turned out, needed little stimulus. When they met on December 6, it quickly became apparent that many were aroused and angry men. As usual, it was the axe-grinders who had taken the time and spent the money to attend, but this year, incensed by Baker vs. Carr, there were more and angrier axe-grinders.

"I wouldn't want to call this mob action, exactly," says an observer, who was there in an official capacity, "but it was certainly mob hysteria. There was nobody actually foaming at the mouth, but they were certainly wrought up."

Frank King agrees. Once more he found himself a lone voice. The speakers' platform was packed and so, seemingly, was the audience. The Florida delegation, sensing a Twentieth Century Bull Run, had turned out in full force. "There must have been a dozen or more of them," King says, and this time they had brought with them a real rabble-rousing voice—that of Millard Caldwell, former governor, now the state's chief justice.

Florida newspapers have written that Caldwell, as governor, was virtually the patron saint of the Pork

Choppers. In the 1960 Florida gubernatorial campaign, The Miami News criticized him for his "medieval philosophy" and commented bitingly on a "pinko" smear he had employed, characterizing his remarks as "pine and palmetto McCarthyism." Excerpts from some of Caldwell's public speeches seem to justify the appellation. He had bitterly criticized a 1944 Supreme Court decision opening Democratic primaries to Negro voters in the South; he had called Harvard "the rallying ground of the bleeding hearts," and Princeton "the center of egghead internationalists." He had seen Russia, thanks to American camp followers, winning "the first rounds of the cold war and unless those of us who are concerned for the future get busy, they can win the hot war." In a speech distributed by Fact Finder's Forum, an ultra-right organization, Caldwell had heaped ridicule upon all liberals as "do-gooders" and "bleeding hearts," and by some weird distortion of history had concluded that "Hitler and Mussolini are extreme examples" of what is produced by this type of thinking.

Caldwell, with his racial bias, his anti-intellectualism, his conspiracy view of modern history, was virtually the archetype of the radical rightist, and it perhaps says much for this convention that it was Caldwell who was to be its most persuasive voice. All sources agree on Caldwell's dominant role. Frank King gives what is, of course, a highly personalized version of events, but one that agrees in its essentials with the views of other observers.

"The segregationists were in the van," King says. "Unless you had seen and heard it, you wouldn't believe that it could happen and that you were in the United States of America. I never heard such nonsense. They had some real spellbinders; they would shout and rant—and then they'd wave the flag. It was well-staged, well-planned, and there was practically no opposition. I made a speech against it [the package of states' rights amendments]; I told the delegates that all it was, was a bald-faced attempt to perpetuate ourselves in office, regardless of the welfare of the country. But the whole thing had caught the delegations, most of them, flatfooted. They had only the vaguest idea what it was all about, and in these circumstances, you know, some of these glib-tongued birds can make you believe almost anything the first time you hear it. And they certainly had the glib-tongued birds, especially that former governor of Florida."

An observer at the session agrees with King. He points out that copies of the amendment proposals were not available until the day the Assembly met. The insiders, of course, knew what was going on, but other delegates had little opportunity to study the amendments, to ponder their real significance. And Caldwell was the William Jennings Bryan of this convention. "I know he swayed at least half-a-dozen states," this observer says. Strikingly enough, Wayne Dumont of New Jersey gives an identical estimate. "I know that Caldwell influenced at least half-a-dozen votes on the Court of the Union proposal," he says, "and remember it only passed by one vote."

In this atmosphere of passion, frenzy, and rank-and-file ignorance, the amendment resolutions were whipped through the General Assembly. They were "brought out, read, debated, passed all in two hours," one informant says. "We usually take longer to pass courtesy resolutions."

The first proposal, to change the amendment process, gained the approval of thirty-seven states; four opposed and four abstained. Twenty-six states favored the reapportionment ban, but ten opposed and ten did not vote. On the Court of the Union proposal, twenty-one states were in favor; twenty opposed; and five did not vote.

The insiders had won their major victory.

With the amendments endorsed, the next step was to get action in the state capitols. Once more, the inside power-players called on a strategically placed group in which they wielded potent influence. This is still another state organization, called the National Conference of State Legislative Leaders. It is composed, as the name implies, of top-level leadership, the presidents pro tem of the Senates, the speakers of the lower houses, the majority and minority leaders of both bodies—the dominant officials in every legislature. The General Assembly called upon these key leaders "to lend their good offices in seeking favorable state legislative action" on the amendments.

This organization of state legislative leaders had been organized in 1960 with financial help from the Richardson Foundation. The foundation, representing a Vick chemical fortune, in recent years has poured $532,880 into the Foreign Policy Research Institute of the University of Pennsylvania, and the result has been the promulgation of a hard right-wing doctrine in foreign affairs, expressed in the ridiculously simplified imagery for the nuclear age that ours is not the lot of peace but the sword. On the domestic front, the Richardson Foundation had been sufficiently interested in the National Conference of State Legislative Leaders to bestow upon it $10,000 "to enable the Conference to perfect its organization . . . "

Other traces of ultra-right enchantment with the amendment proposals soon became evident. Early in 1963, Human Events, the Washington news sheet that is one of the principal bibles of the far right (it also prints and distributes the hard-right Congressional voting index of Americans for Constitutional Action), devoted major space to an article explaining the wonders of the proposed amendments. The exposition was prefaced by a ruled box, reading: "Human Events suggests that you write your state legislators to back these amendments. With vigorous action, they can be passed." Shortly afterwards, when the reapportionment amendment was introduced in the Texas legislature, copies of Human Events were widely circulated in both houses. The legislature passed the amendment with virtually no discussion, with no one even explaining its purpose.

The amendment push was now getting into high gear, and to keep it rolling still another organization was formed, one whose origins and finances remain something of a mystery. It was called the Volunteer Committee on Dual Sovereignty, and its chairman, by the strangest of chances, turned out to be none other than W. Stuart Helm. Helm gives this explanation of the birth of the Dual Sovereignty Committee:

"Since the National Legislative Conference had taken no official action, we felt we couldn't come out and back the proposals on behalf of the Conference. We felt that the best way they could be promoted would be to form a separate, volunteer committee to work for the proposals. They called me and asked me if I would serve as chairman. At first I said I wouldn't, but then I agreed, only with the specific understanding that there should be no official connection with the National Legislative Conference."

"Who were the 'they' who called you?" Helm was asked.

"Well," he said, "the men who were leading the fight for these proposals."

He identified them as Chappell, Warren Wood, and "that fellow from California who was the chairman of the committee." The name of Lowrey, whom Helm himself had appointed, seemed to escape him, but when his memory was jogged by mention of Lowrey's name, he indicated that the formal request for him to accept another chairmanship had come from Lowrey.

So the Dual Sovereignty Committee was created, with six vice chairmen assisting Helm. These included four members of the original drafting committee—Chappell, Wood, Hauser, and Haase. Two new names were added—Republican Lieutenant Governor Harold H. Chase of Kansas, and J. D. McCarty, Democratic Speaker of the Oklahoma House. Since Helm was chairman, the Dual Sovereignty Committee listed itself as operating from Harrisburg, Pennsylvania, but actually its literature began to bear a Tallahassee, Florida, postmark. For it was in Tallahassee that the committee established a novel public relations setup.

There, in a cubbyhole office tucked away under a staircase in the State Capitol, a thirty-seven-year-old former newspaperman, George Prentice, set up shop. After leaving the newspaper profession, he had established his own radio and television bureau in Florida, had run into financial difficulties, and finally wound up as public relations man for House Speaker Mallory Horne, of Tallahassee, another close political associate of Chappell.

Prentice says that he was asked to coordinate the effort to pass the amendments "in December" after the General Assembly had endorsed them. His principal functions have been to contact state legislative leaders to urge introduction and passage of the amendments—and to try to keep the movement from being tarred by open involvement with racist and Birchite groups.

"We had some strong approaches from the White Citizens Council of Mississippi and the National Citizens Council, but we have not taken advantage of their offers," Prentice says. "If they want to support the amendments, that's their business. But we don't want our purposes linked with theirs."

Prentice insists that no money has been spent on lobbying. This may be true, since the entire movement is geared to operate from the top, through the close personal ties of powerful legislative leaders. Even so, news releases, long-distance telephone calls, and salaries require quite a bit of money. Prentice's own salary comes to $1,000 a month, he says, and he has one secretary whose salary is paid by a generous Florida state government. In an interview with The Miami Herald, Prentice estimated that the total cost of his Dual Sovereignty promotion comes to about $1,500 a month, and he added: "My salary is paid primarily by the Dual Sovereignty Committee. Only about twenty-five per cent comes from the Speaker's office."

This statement doubtless will come as a shock to W. Stuart Helm. For in Harrisburg, when asked the vital question—where the money was coming from—Helm declared with great emphasis: "We have no money, no organization. We haven't a nickel. We don't spend any money promoting the amendments because we don't have any money to spend. Prentice is a public relations man for the Speaker of the Florida House, and whatever he gets paid, he gets for his services as a public relations man to the Speaker. We haven't paid him a dime."

Obviously, the gentlemen should get their stories straight.

Such was the behind-the-scenes picture when the amendment drive began to produce astonishing results in the late winter and spring of 1963. State after state, in rapid-fire sequence, began to approve one or another of the amendments. Only then, at a late, late hour, was there any genuine public awakening and opposition.

Two legal experts, Arthur J. Freund, of St. Louis, and Professor Charles L. Black, of the Yale Law School, were first on the battle line. They corresponded about the amendments soon after they were proposed in Chicago, and Professor Black, in a stinging article in the Yale Law Journal, led the attack. He labeled the proposals "radical in the extreme" and argued that they were aimed "not at the preservation but at the subversion" of our governmental system.

"They constitute, collectively, one more attempt, so late in the day, at converting the United States into a confederation . . . , " he wrote. "The wisdom of peace and the sacrifices of war alike warn against starting down that ruinous road."

Analyzing the proposed changed method of Constitutional amendment, Professor Black argued that it would be "easily possible for a proportion of the American people no greater than that which supported Landon in 1936 to impose on the rest of the country any alteration whatever in the Constitution." He stressed that, as a result of apportionment inequities, legislators representing only thirty-eight per cent of their state populations have the power to pass measures in the thirty-eight least populous states. These states contain only forty per cent of the American population. As a result, Pro-

Turning the Clock Back

"Taken collectively, the three proposals would result in (1) placing the power to amend the national Constitution in the control of state legislatures, (2) placing the final construction of the Constitution in the hands of judges whose offices are created and whose salaries are paid by state legislatures and (3) exempting state legislatures from any effective policing by the U.S. Supreme Court or Congress of their representative character. . . .

"Considering the far-reaching character of the proposed amendments, they have made remarkably successful, but until recently unnoticed, progress in state legislatures since they were proposed by the Council last December. . . .

"Advanced by their sponsors in the name of conservatism and the tradition of states' rights, the full impact of these three proposals, when viewed in the light of our constitutional history, is radical in the extreme. It is not overstating to say that should these amendments to the Constitution be adopted it would revolutionize our form of government and turn the clock back to the Articles of Confederation of 1777—which proved to be a failure and which were replaced ten years later by the Federal Constitution."

—from a report prepared by the Executive Committee of the Bar of the City of New York

fessor Black pointed out, the minorities controlling this minority could work fundamental changes and impose their will on the majority. He estimated, for example, that the income tax established by the Sixteenth Amendment could be repealed by the votes of legislators representing no more than fifteen per cent of the people of the nation.

Black's article had profound impact in legal circles; yet, as late as April 27, 1963, when Chief Justice Earl Warren spoke out on the amendment issue, he reported in shocked amazement that, after researching all law society publications and legal reviews, this was the only article he had been able to find. The Chief Justice lectured the legal profession for its lethargy and called for "a great national debate" on the three proposals. This call finally broke the barrier of public somnolence and indifference, but the fact that it was needed poses a most disturbing issue.

When the belated awakening came, when it finally dawned on liberal and labor and civil rights groups that the amendment drive must be taken seriously, there was an outcry that the amendments had been "sneaked" through various state legislatures in a devious campaign of deceit and concealment. This charge contains some elements of truth, but also much untruth. For the cardinal and glaring and most unpalatable fact is that, in this stultifying age of conformity and nondissent, few persons were awake; few gave a damn. This applies with almost equal impartiality to virtually everybody—to a soporific and superficial press, to labor leaders, to liberals, to lawyers, and to intellectuals.

Crihfield, the Council of State Governments' executive, snorts his disdain of liberals when this liberal "sneak" charge is mentioned to him.

"All the charges that have been made that these were sneak amendments are a lot of nonsense," he says. "The [General Assembly] meeting in Chicago was open to the press, the press was there, but frankly, they paid no attention to it."

Wayne Dumont agrees with Crihfield. He, at least, expected and hoped for publicity. "The next day I went out and bought the papers to see what kind of a press we got," he remembers. "I had to hunt through The Chicago Tribune to even find the story. It was buried in the back somewhere, with hardly any mention of the amendments. It was the same with all the papers."

Frank King, in essence, agrees with his opposition in this estimate of the situation. In his state, a few newspapers like The Toledo Blade were awake and aware from the beginning but generally there was a fog of indifference. "At the outset," King says, "I think a lot of people tended to dismiss this business too lightly, to laugh at it as a crackpot affair. In my estimation, many people still do. But I think it's something not to be taken lightly; I think it's damned serious. I've been fighting this thing in Ohio, and it's involved me in the toughest battle of my political life—and I've been in the legislature fifteen years."

These views are reinforced by personal observation. More than six months after the Chicago meeting, long after Professor Black and Chief Justice Warren had sounded the alarm bells, there was an amazing paucity of information in usually well-informed circles. In Washington, even in the offices of liberal Senators worried about Birchite threats in their states, the files were barren of any useful information about the amendment drive and the forces behind it. Most labor circles, stirring slowly to opposition, acknowledged that they had done virtually no spadework.

In exculpation, it must be stressed that there were two aspects of the amendment drive that encouraged such lethargy. First, as Frank King noted, the proposed amendments were so extreme that it seemed, to many sensible men, they could never gain wide acceptance. Second—and this is perhaps the most vital single point of the entire story—there had been no public demand for such drastic changes, and it seemed inconceivable, to anyone who recalls how difficult the amendment process has been for even widely publicized causes, that the three-amendment package could get anywhere without a strong basis of grass-roots support. That, in spite of this basic weakness, the amendment drive could become a menace expresses something relatively new in the American experience—the determination and ability of top-ranking, ultra-conservative elements of the Establishment to engineer and organize changes from the top downward while the people sleep.

There can be no question about this. In Ohio, where the apparently-stymied amendment drive was sparked by Lieutenant Governor John Brown, King exposed the movement's glaring lack of popular support. "The Lieutenant Governor was the only witness to testify for these things before our committee," King declares. "I challenged them. I demanded that they produce one witness, one resolution—that they show me even one letter that had been written urging this action. They couldn't do it."

In New Jersey, the situation was even more dramatic. Wayne Dumont, worried about the state apportionment issue, was opposed to the radical Court of the Union idea, but he was ardently in favor of the other two amendments. "I went around to all the Senators," he recalls. "I explained to them just what the amendments were. There wasn't one of them who was misinformed. They all knew what they were doing. And they all approved; they all wanted to be co-sponsors of the resolution."

The result was that on January 14, 1963, with no debate, just as in Texas, the first two amendments flitted through the New Jersey Senate without a dissenting vote. Later, while action was pending in the Assembly, came the first stirrings of public reaction. Civil rights groups began to rouse themselves. U.S. Senator Clifford P. Case called for repeal of the state Senate action. A backfire started. As a consequence, a scheduled Assembly hearing was abandoned; the Senate recalled the unanimously-passed amendments; and on June 28, with desertions taking place on all sides, Dumont withdrew the proposals. They are now, he concedes, definitely dead in New Jersey.

Even Helm, the man at the heart of the amendment effort almost every step of the way, acknowledges that the national drive originated with the legislators, not the public. Discussing public reaction, he said, without any prompting: "Originally, of course, there was none at all. Then, after the amendments were introduced, my mail ran pretty heavily against them. Now, since they've been out for some time and there's been a chance to explain them, there's been a complete change, and my mail is running about four to one in favor." Helm added that this may not truly reflect public sentiment because "the people who write are almost always those who feel especially strong about something."

Asked if there had been any demand for amendments of this kind before the legislators themselves suggested them, he said: "Oh, no, there was no pressure from the public."

The picture that emerges is clear—and potentially fateful. Amendments that, in the words of Professor Black, could reduce this nation to a loose confederation of states, had been spawned and promoted by Insiders of the Establishment with such success that only one (the Court of the Union proposal, which has passed only five legislatures) seems definitely doomed. The other two, adopted by a growing number of states, will come before legislatures again this fall and winter, and no man can say what may be the outcome. That so much could be accomplished by a small cabal of strategically-placed officials, backed by wealthy and largely hidden interests, aided by the frenzied cries of racists, states righters, ruralists, and Birchites—all without any perceptible stirring or demand among the people themselves—this is a pattern that speaks of a deep and fateful schism in the American body politic.

It has been obvious for some years that the ultra-wealthy, ultra-conservative part of our society has been divorced from the broad base of the people, as virtually every Presidential election since 1932 has demonstrated. It has been obvious that the power of highly-placed rightists has been bolstered mainly by a show of strength on the racist and rabid fringe which, to a great degree, they have actively encouraged and promoted. The rural, rotten borough system, easy to manipulate and control in blocking progressive legislation, has helped to maintain this power, and the coalition in Congress of racist Southerners and ultra-conservatives mainly from rural areas around the nation, has stood as testament, for the last quarter century, to the existence and influence of reaction. All that was needed for a further grab for power, for an additional effort to roll back the tides of the Twentieth Century, was some catalytic agent to fuse the coalition tighter and broaden its base. This spark was supplied by Baker vs. Carr.

There is no question that this decision brought a great many legislators, some honestly worried about extreme extensions of Federal reapportionment power, into the amendment camp. They have helped to make possible the success of the amendment drive so far. But, significantly, they did not initiate it; they did not bankroll it; they did not control it. At most, to hold on to their own legislative seats, they collaborated. The significance lies, not in the fact of their collaboration, but in the power of the cabal at the top that has been revealed. When drastic and radical changes that would alter fundamentals of the American system can come so close to being imposed from the top, by inside manipulation, without the shadow of public demand; when, to this use of power and position, there is wedded an all-pervasive lack of dissent and controversy and interest on virtually every level of American society, we are confronted clearly with the potentials for an anti-democratic disaster of appalling magnitude. Whatever ultimately happens to the amendment drive, it has demonstrated the existence of these potentials.

They remain, ready and malleable elements, awaiting the masterful hand of this political junta, or some other, that might use them in new reactionary attacks against the Federal Union and against the degree of democracy so painfully achieved in the 176 years since the convention met at Philadelphia and agreed upon the document that begins: "We the People of the United States, in Order to form a more perfect Union . . ."

The Nervous Networks

An interview with Howard K. Smith

Howard K. Smith, the celebrated news analyst, has dared deal with basic, often highly controversial issues on television. As a consequence he has had major programs shot from under him, first while at CBS and more recently at ABC, where his present role is largely confined to the kind of dead-pan questioning of public officials that prevents Smith from expressing his own opinions. On a recent visit to Chicago, Smith was interviewed by Jay Selz, editor and publisher of Chicago Scene. Smith's reflections on news coverage and network behavior strike us as an unusually revealing picture from the inside.—THE EDITORS.

Q. Eric Sevareid said several years ago: "The problem of complexity is even worse than the problem of withholding news. Even if you had access to all of the news you wanted, you probably couldn't make it understandable to people. We used to feel, give people the facts and they'll make the right judgments. But what if they can't understand the facts?" Are we any better off in this regard today?

A. No, I don't think so. Eric's statement is perfectly accurate: Complexity is the problem and not enough people are meeting the problem. I was in Europe for twenty years and was accustomed to working with European politicians and diplomats. When I moved to Washington, I was overwhelmed at the abundance of information that is just free. I am not worried about news management at all. With a little digging you can get any information. But I do think the issues have become much more complex.

I went to see my friend Raymond Swing [former news commentator] the other day in Washington. I have trouble with news analysis and commentary. I have had it with one network and am still having a little difficulty. I said to Raymond, "How is it you got away with it and I can't?" He said, "Oh, the issues were so simple. I attained my maturity when a war was going on and the issue was to beat the enemy. Issues have become so complex today that it is really a job of education that needs to be done on the public."

Q. Has the increased complexity been matched by increased competence of reporters and increased comprehension and effort from the public?

A. I think the public standards have risen and the reporters I know in Washington are really scholars. But the complexity has increased faster. And the boldness of the outlets has not gone up to meet the complexity. The outlets have become more timid, and I think that's true of newspapers and it is certainly true of radio and television.

Q. In line with what you say about the outlets, Douglass Cater said in his book on the press: "It was not intimidation that caused the press to serve as the instrument of McCarthy's rise. Rather it was the inherent vulnerabilities, the frozen patterns of the press which McCarthy discovered and played upon with unnerving skill. Straight news, the absolute commandment of mass journalism, had become a straitjacket to crush the initiative of the reporter."

In the same connection, Sevareid said: "The objectivity of the press added to the distortion rather than exposed it."

A. To pick up the first point, the one that Cater mentioned: In the world of technological change, in fact change in every respect, it's remarkable that newspaper writing has not changed. It is still clamped in formulae that were prescribed a long time ago. And they are not good formulae. It is as stylized as ancient Egyptian art. You could make the human body only in one shape because the priest permitted only one shape. And it is not right.

Time magazine's phenomenal success rests solely on the fact that newspapers are so dull and in their way uninformative because of the stylized form of writing they require. Time, which follows no rules, lets you understand things better even with the bias of Mr. Luce.

I believe McCarthy did exploit this rigid form we have of news writing. Objectivity in the case of McCarthy meant you tell what he said and add nothing to it. That particular objectivity turned out to be a lie. It would make far more sense to say that Senator McCarthy said somthing today that we don't believe is true. But newspaper journalism doesn't allow that.

Q. One more quote. This is Barbara Ward: "We must get people to steadily and systematically stay with the news because it can be presented in such a heightened and sensational form that people can become crisis drunk. In most media, we only get crisis reporting, the breaking story, and not much background information." Are broadcasting and the press doing anything about that? I realize it is a tough one.

A. No, I don't think they do much about it, and it is tough, because it is simply hard to get people's attention for something that's going right. We suffer it in our daily lives. If nothing is wrong with your liver, you really aren't aware of it—until it has gone bad. I think it is human rather than journalistic.

Q. Getting to television news, something seems terribly wrong with a system when so much prestige can accrue to Network A outrating Network B on election night, at the conventions, covering space shots, and so on. It's sad when news, of all things, becomes personality packaging. At CBS—the desperate and forced extrusion of reporters into something they are not in order to compete with Brinkley and Huntley.

A. Personality packaging and also propaganda build-up. Again, it is a very profound thing in our way of life, and I don't know what you can do about it. They build stars the same way. People are given reputations by one incident, though the rest of their lives are a rebuttal of that incident.

And the rating system, I hope, is thoroughly discredited. I am not sanguine about it, but I hope that the networks are going to be forced to apply judgment, human judgment, and do what Hollywood is doing: Bring in creative people and tell them to go to work and do something good. And by good, I don't mean it has to be highly intellectual. The test of whether a television program is good is: When you come home at night tired of what you have been doing, and you say I want to rest, I want to see something, not necessarily something that carries me away from myself, but rather makes me more important because it deals with problems I have faced in a way that makes me interested.

Q. What was the strategy at CBS for replacing Mr. Murrow? Who was tried?

A. I don't think they tried to replace him. I really have a sneaking suspicion they were glad to get rid of him. They made life pretty miserable for him in his last years, and he suffered from it. He was a very unhappy man. And the change in Murrow! Now he has one of the toughest jobs there is in Washington: Stating America's case to the world and with darned little money, and I have never seen a man so happy. I forgot that Ed Murrow can be gay. He can be. He cracks jokes.

No, I don't think they tried to replace him. I don't think they want a star like that again. I think they felt that he was too independent, which gives a clue to my problem as well, though I was certainly not as big a man as Murrow.

Q. Aside from his falling out with Mr. Paley [CBS board chairman] and always his differences with Dr. Stanton, [CBS President] was there resentment of him on the part of other newsmen at CBS?

A. No. In fact, they were all very close to worshipping him.

Q. Are attempts at stardom necessary in order to maintain one's power position in network news?

A. Well, television is still in its infantile stage, and it certainly gives you a bit of a lever against television executives, if you have support from an audience. And you need it in this business in its present primitive stage. It has not grown up. It is frantic. I am not even sure it is a good business. I am not sure I like it.

Q. Getting back to Mr. Murrow, I often wondered how a man who seems so uneasy, uneasy with people, could function so brilliantly on television.

A. It is a very good question. I will tell you, Murrow is not a simple personality. The New Yorker tried to make him one and Time in a cover story tried, but no one succeeded. He is ill at ease, and I have seen no man sweat as much as he does in front of the camera.

When I had him on my program recently, we had to freeze the studio because he sweats so badly he'd be terribly uncomfortable. And when he used to make radio broadcasts, under the table his feet were always shaking.

I can't tell you why he is so effective. I suppose I have met about four or five people in my life whose personalities are so strong that when they come into a room, even if your back's turned to them, you know that something is happening in that room, and Murrow is one. He is a powerful personality, yet uncomfortable in public appearance. But I just can't classify him as an extrovert or an introvert. I think the good contrast was the two succeeding Prime Ministers in Great Britain. Anthony Eden, when he went on television, died a little, he suffered. And when he got through, he was exhausted. Harold Macmillan loves it; in fact, if he goes on television tired, when it is over he feels better. Murrow is one of those people who died a little bit every time he went on television. And [Walter] Cronkite is one who thrives by going on television.

Q. So many good men are underused: Eric Sevareid, for instance. I had the feeling in your programs with Walter Lippmann, they would have been more interesting as an exchange of views, a discussion, rather than the straight interview with you playing a very self-effacing role.

A. Walter wanted it that way, too, but CBS wasn't allowing me to say anything those days, so I stuck to questioning a man who had a lot to say. One way to get things across is to get someone else to say them.

Q. It always seemed to me that fifteen minutes of radio—the great Sunday broadcasts from London when you had it, Sevareid, Collingwood, and now Kendrick—said much more than even a half-hour of television.

A. I agree with you. I still feel that way. I much prefer talking than this business of production. But the reason I am in television is because that is where the people are. Right now I am just a little weary of it, and ordinarily I would sacrifice a great deal to stay on television because that is where the American people are.

Q. You don't see any rejuvenation for radio?

A. No, I don't. Radio in part killed itself. It had its opportunity to become a great music and talk medium, and instead it has become a jingle box.

Q. How precisely does the freedom of reporters vary at the three networks?

A. Well, I think at CBS it is the most restricted. And NBC, I gather from information I have had, nearly so and is becoming more so. There was a time when NBC White Papers and other documentaries ended with the reporter saying, "And now here is a comment." That is out. And it is not by accident that it is out.

Q. How did these restrictions develop at CBS over the years?

A. It is my impression that the Murrow-McCarthy broadcast was the beginning. That was done, it is my understanding, without the full knowledge and accord of the top management. They felt it hurt them. At least it frightened them. And from that time on, I noticed the limitations growing and growing and growing, to where I could say almost nothing.

Q. And yet that See It Now telecast was so effective in breaking up the McCarthy ice floe.

A. Yes. Well, in a much smaller way, some of my most effective broadcasts have frightened the network the most.

Q. I suppose your radio broadcasts from Birmingham.

A. Yes, that was the beginning of my downfall. I watched the police leave the streets, and I watched these hoodlums carry out their planned beating up of everybody. I must admit I had some animated things to say about it. I think it had a little to do with starting the downfall of "Bull" Connor [Birmingham's safety commissioner]. But after that things began to clam up and one thing after another was withdrawn, including my Sunday radio broadcast, so there was not much point in my staying there just to earn a high salary.

Q. Weren't there restrictions at CBS from the start of radio news?

A. Yes, but they were rather more rational about it. Then newsmen ran the place. Now a lawyer [Richard Salant] runs it, a lawyer whose training has been as a lobbyist, a man who tries to please people. His instincts are: Don't offend anybody. He calls it objectivity but that is a totally sterile definition. He is an awfully nice man, and very intelligent, but his instincts are not those of a journalist.

Q. There has been a great deal of talk about the dissolution of the great CBS news department—the fact that you and Murrow are no longer there and Sevareid seems to be benched. Are we simply being sentimental about the "good old days" or is this in fact true?

A. No, there is a drastic change. It has been deliberately disintegrated on orders from the top. This is no sentimentality at all. Originally they accused me of changing my commentaries, but I was able to show them from scripts I had done every year for the past fifteen years that I hadn't changed, their policy was changing. I think the stakes became so high in television, the fall in character so great in executives, that they were not willing to take any chances on those huge stakes—millions of dollars involved in programs.

Also I think the present age is an age of blandness. In my view, it shows itself in our leaders. I think Truman and Roosevelt, whatever you considered them, were not bland men. They were fighting men. They made enemies, and finally had impossible relations with Congress, but before they did, they got an awful lot of things done. Now we have Eisenhower and Kennedy who are physically extremely attractive men, nice men, likable men, whose ambition presumably is to become beloved ex-Presidents. I can't see what other motives prompt either one of them.

There is a blandness there. Congress is bland. A Congress in which a fighting man like Hubert Humphrey hasn't got much to say is a Congress that is bland. It certainly has affected our media. Radio has Ed Morgan left, and I would say that's the end of it. That's all there is. There used to be twenty or thirty—an hour on either side of seven o'clock. Now there's one. And television? Well . . . there's very little on television.

Q. How powerful are the lower echelon desk men?

A. Not very. I think that's one of the frustrating things, the death rate among those men, the news managers, for example. The death rate is tremendous. They're dying all of the time. They're being brought in, miracles are expected of them, and they die. I think it goes right up to the top. I don't think they have much power.

Q. You had scripts yanked out from under you.

A. Well, I had some that were so manicured by editors that they were unreadable; I had to stay off programs simply because I couldn't physically read them.

I did one on Nixon [for CBS] which I must say was harmless, a short commentary on Nixon's problem when he went into the campaign in 1960. My only point was he has a problem. He has to offer something new, and yet offer something new without seeming to criticize his own boss who is President. And when the editors got through with that, the sentences didn't add up, there weren't predicates. Panic seized them.

Q. That's what I meant: they are anonymous but wield tremendous power.

A. They do it because of fear up above. In fact, one of them came up to me once when a particularly sensitive topic was up, and said, "Our wives and children are counting on you. So please go easy on this subject."

Q. Is there any way in which your switch to ABC hasn't worked out?

A. I think ABC was a little too frightened by the results of the Nixon broadcast [1962]. That fright still shows itself, but I still have far more freedom at ABC than I had at CBS. However, the program is going to die.

Q. Still, are you satisfied that your program accomplished all that you set out to do?

A. No. I wanted it to last, and I wanted to improve it . . . . The first program began with the words, "This is an experiment in television journalism." I wanted to try to transfer to television what was really quite successful on radio. I believe the radio commentators were the single main factor—there were lots of others—that educated America in the great revolution of attitude we've had. We were a convinced isolationist nation. We are now convinced internationalists and I think those radio commentaries were the main thing. I wanted to transfer that to television. I hoped it would induce imitation and bring a wider range of views from other commentators—middle-road, left-wing, right-wing. It has not succeeded. It was not imitated. And it is not going to last.

Q. Do you think at any time soon television will be big enough to take in critical expression, the way the BBC has with That Was the Week That Was?

A. That would save television. Some day the television networks will not say, "Oh, my God, this program about Mr. Nixon has caused an uproar; we can't have that." They run as soon as they're shot at. If they stood their ground, people would stop shooting at them. Some day, some simple genius at one of our networks will say, "That caused a lot of attention. Can we plan ten more like it?"

Q. Isn't it true that almost all the major stories were done first in print —even Murrow's great program on the migrant workers?

A. No, I don't think so. The first very good interpretation of the population explosion was done on television, and to my knowledge the best story done on the migrant workers was that one of Murrow's. In fact, I don't think CBS has equaled that before or since.

Q. One final question—what is your assessment of the President to date?

A. I was never greatly impressed with him as a Senator. A highly intelligent and personable man, but I never felt for him the high esteem that I have for men like Clark, Douglas, McGee, and many others. His name is not attached to any important legislation, though he was in Congress for fourteen years. But I do admire a man who can make a good speech, and he speaks darned well. I think he probably has the best brain we've had in the White House since Woodrow Wilson. But he hasn't got whatever it takes to go out and fight for his program today. Basically he is a conservative man who likes to talk in a liberal way. He came into power as a minority President, a factor . . . typical of many Presidents, I must say, who have done better.

I think to a great extent the problems he has in Congress are his own problems. If he were being defeated by 100 votes in the House and thirty in the Senate, I would say he can't do much. But he's being defeated by two, three, and five votes in the Senate and a handful in the House. He could swing that much. He could do what Eisenhower did. Eisenhower went to the people when the Landrum-Griffin labor bill was up and said, you've got to get in touch with your representatives, we have to pass this bill. They did pass it by a landslide. The only effort Kennedy made to educate the American people on the need for a Department of Urban Affairs was on my own program. I really felt how silly it was—I get four million people, a President can get twenty to forty million any time he speaks. He could have put it across and he didn't. Medicare, same history. His supporters say, why get into a fight with Congress, he'll have six miserable years in which he and Congress will hate one another.

Progressivism Reconsidered

by KARL E. MEYER

THERE WAS predictable hilarity in liberal circles when the Daughters of the American Revolution recently demanded a careful recount of the gold bars at Fort Knox. The DAR's concern with buried bullion seemed the perfect symbolic expression of the archaic outlook of dear, fossilized old ladies. Yet I would venture that liberals have their own Fort Knox, where the gold bars of the progressive tradition are stacked and regarded with roughly the same veneration that the DAR reserves for J. Edgar Hoover and Martha Washington.

As the glitter wears off the Kennedy Administration, it is increasingly apparent that traditional progressive concepts are inadequate guides to the stormy present. I do not say this out of disrespect, because my own family was deeply involved in the radical movements of the past—indeed, my father, Ernest L. Meyer, was writing for The Progressive when I was barely out of diapers. Nor do I say this out of any wish to minimize the enormous contribution made by the progressives.

Broadly speaking, the progressive movement began with the protests led by the Populists in the 1890's and then became a new national force in the period preceding World War I. Its two greatest proponents were Robert M. LaFollette, Sr., founder of this magazine, and Theodore Roosevelt, the Bull Moose insurgent of 1912. T. R. and "Fighting Bob" were quite different men, and each made a quite different contribution to progressivism. Roosevelt gave the movement glamor and respectability; LaFollette, always more radical, gave it substance.

Around these two luminaries swarmed a bright crowd of diverse and memorable supporting figures—everyone from Senator George Norris, the gentle knight of liberalism, and William Allen White, editor of the Emporia Gazette, to Governor (and later Senator) Hiram Johnson, tamer of the railroads in California. Within the movement, there were sharp differences on many specific issues, but there were certain unifying tendencies that are forever associated with progressivism.

There was general agreement that the private power of great trusts and monopolies threatened our democratic institutions. "Industrial and commercial tyranny destroys individual freedom," LaFollette warned in 1912. "We may have the privilege of the ballot. We may have the form and semblance of democracy, but in the end industrial servitude means political servitude." The diagnosis was surely accurate, and the progressives favored varying methods of regulation and trust-busting as the cure.

There was a pervasive suspicion of bosses, machine government, and patronage. And for every ill of democracy the progressives had a single cure—more democracy. They favored primaries instead of conventions, they urged direct election of the President, they supported the steady expansion of civil service, and they looked with abhorrence at party discipline and party leadership. Their ideal in legislatures, as then Representative George Norris put it after he had led the fight to strip Speaker of the House Joseph G. ("Czar") Cannon of his power, was "more individual freedom and less coercion."

Courts of every sort were regarded with special distaste; they were "the strongest bulwark of special privilege," in LaFollette's view. The Wisconsin Senator proposed that all life terms of office should be abolished and that Federal judges should be elected by the people. In 1924, when he ran as a third-party candidate for the Presidency, LaFollette favored a Constitutional amendment that would take the power of judicial review from the Supreme Court. Teddy Roosevelt, for his part, shocked his old friend Senator Lodge by ardently championing the subjecting of judicial decisions to the recall process, thereby allowing the voters to override the courts.

These, at least, were essential elements of the progressive credo. In many respects, they represented a valid response to the times. Between the economic oligarchy and political bosses who served as brokers for a true power elite, the theory of democracy was travestied in many states and more than occasionally in the national Congress. The progressives wanted to purify politics, and rid government of the odor of plunder, privilege, and plutocracy.

To anyone who has been raised within this progressive tradition, these political precepts still strike a responsive chord. They have the virtue of republican simplicity and rhetorical boldness. In their day, these precepts served the country well. They sent a breeze of change through a stuffy room and helped open the door for Franklin D. Roosevelt's New Deal.

Yet today this legacy is a bit mildewed, often highly misleading, and sometimes—surely it needs to be said—downright mischievous.

The progressives are often accused of being too pragmatic, but I think Richard Hofstadter is nearer the mark when he suggests (in his superb Age of Reform) that the real trouble with the insurgents is that they set their standards impossibly high. Possessed of admirable civic virtue themselves, they tended to see American democracy as a kind of vast town meeting in which every citizen would soberly weigh the facts and come to a cogent conclusion. This faith is summed up by the motto that appears over the spirited letters-to-the-editor column of the Madison, Wisconsin, Capital Times, a progressive organ if ever one existed: "Let The People Have The Truth And Freedom To Discuss It And All Will Go Well."

This is a noble sentiment, but not quite true. In the first place, the statement assumes the people are interested in hearing the truth. Some are, and some couldn't care less—such as those who complain bitterly if a Presidential speech dislodges "The Beverly Hillbillies" from their television receivers. Secondly, the assertion is a trifle sanguine in sweepingly concluding that "All Will Go Well." Sometimes yes, and sometimes no. It is not lack of hearing The Truth (or what all right-thinking progressives regard as The Truth) that accounts for the white Southerners' stubborn refusal to concede that all men, including Negroes, are created equal. Suppose Federal judges in the South were elected, as Bob LaFollette proposed. Is there any doubt what the result would be? Governors Ross Barnett and George C. Wallace would be wearing judicial robes.

Tradition, no matter how mistaken, and ignorance, no matter how regrettable, shape popular attitudes as much, or often even more, than dispassionate appeals to ethical principle. In the summer of 1954, the Fund for the Republic financed a revealing study of popular attitudes on civil liberties. It was an exhaustive project, in the most elaborate foundation tradition, involving 5,000 average citizens and 1,500 local community leaders, and two national polling agencies. The results showed a shocking indifference and ignorance about the meaning of the Bill of Rights, and every similar study has shown results consistent with the Fund's findings.

One example will suffice. The interviewers asked, "If a person wanted to make a speech in your community against churches and religions, should he be allowed to speak or not?" Of the overall sample, sixty per cent said he should not be allowed to speak. The analysts found, to their surprise, that supposedly the most conservative community leaders (DAR regents, American Legion commanders, Chamber of Commerce presidents, and Republican County Central Committee chairmen) were markedly more "liberal" on this and other questions than the average citizen. The reason, it was safely surmised, is the level of education.

The point I am leading to is that in one important respect the progressive tradition is mistaken: Democracy, in so far as that concept embraces respect for civil liberties, is more respected by a minority than the majority. Generally speaking, the stoutest defenders of civil liberties are found among those persons who have a vested interest in using them—teachers, lawyers, editors, and the like. Therefore it is better that the courts have final powers in this field, even though it seems somehow "undemocratic."

Democracy assumes a set of common restraints that bind all participants—the "rules of the game." In Britain, the sturdy tradition of a centuries' old, tightly-knit people imposes these restraints and there is no need for a supreme court to validate or void parliamentary acts. In our country, a still-young nation of diverse peoples, the courts are the curators and defenders of the "rules of liberty"—or so they have become in the last generation—and until there is broader popular understanding of what the Bill of Rights means, it is better that they remain so.

The irony is that the true carrier of the progressive legal tradition was Justice Felix Frankfurter, who believed in self-restraint so long as the people could correct legislative error at the polls. Yet Mr. Frankfurter was emphatically not the hero of the liberals when he sat on the U. S. Supreme Court. The hero was, and is, Justice Hugo L. Black, who is as intolerant of legislative encroachments on civil liberties as his reactionary judicial forebears were intolerant of legislative infringements on property rights.

Related to the progressives' town-meeting vision of American democracy was the intense loathing of political discipline and party leadership. This took an extreme form in California, where state parties were robbed of their virility by a cross-filing system that enabled a Democrat to enter a Republican primary election, or vice versa, without identifying his own affiliation. The result was to confuse and demoralize the electorate as Governors and Senators wound up winning both major party nominations. Finally, a few years ago, this wretched system bequeathed to California by Hiram Johnson was abandoned.

More typical is the tradition that still persists in Wisconsin, where the Democratic Party makes no endorsement in primaries. The theory is that it is "bossism" if the party indicates a choice—a dubious legacy of the LaFollette era. Actually, when Old Bob ran the state, he did it through the dominance of personality rather than through party organization. Before a primary, the Senator would indicate his own choices, and this was tantamount to a progressive endorsement.

Again, the assumption was that individualism was the essence of progressivism; yet individualism today is in some respects the curse of the liberal movement. I think James MacGregor Burns is right in asserting (in his provocative Deadlock of Democracy) that one reason for voter apathy is the lack of party responsibility—and few things, I would wager, have contributed more to weakening party responsibility than the dogmas of the progressive era.

One of the most celebrated progressive triumphs was the David and Goliath contest between young Representative George Norris and Speaker Cannon. Under the so-called Reed reforms adopted in the 1880's, the Speaker was given broad powers to bring order out of the committee anarchy of the House. His authority included control of the vital Rules Committee and the power to appoint standing committee members. There is no doubt that under "Czar" Cannon, an Illinois mossback, the Speaker's power was used to throttle the progressive minority. In 1910, Norris led the floor rebellion in the name of "liberation of the House" and "the establishment of individual representation and responsibility." The young Nebraskan won, and the Speakership has never been the same since.

Interlandi in The Los Angeles Times

"Couldn't you make a special rate for our group? All we want to see is Barry Goldwater"

Today the Speaker of the House enjoys enormous prestige, but his real power depends more on personal ability than on formal authority. Speaker Sam Rayburn ruled the House by virtue of his stature, not by virtue of his appointive powers. His successor is unable to fill those large boots, and committee chairmen are running wild, to the despair of the White House. We are back to the period prior to the reforms instituted by Speaker Reed, the period so memorably described by Woodrow Wilson in Congressional Government. "Power is nowhere concentrated," Wilson wrote, "it is rather deliberately and of set policy scattered amongst many small chiefs... These petty barons, some of them not a little powerful, but none of them within reach of the full power of rule, may at will exercise an almost despotic sway within their own shires, and sometimes threaten to convulse even the realm itself."

This is the fruit of "the liberation of the House," though surely George Norris did not intend it that way. More than that, the cult of personality, which is a progressive legacy, has been the bane of the liberal delegation in Congress. In the old days when the Sons of the Wild Jackass, as the insurgents of the 1920's were styled by their opponents, held the balance of power on Capitol Hill, they were unable to work together except for the most limited aims. Senators like Borah and Johnson and LaFollette were colorful and courageous; they were also notorious prima donnas. Today's liberals are far less colorful and outspoken; but they are still prima donnas.

The telling contrast is with the Southern delegation, which works together and accepts leadership and discipline. Liberals continually complain about the nefarious influence of Dixie—but there is little inclination to accept similar discipline of faction and make the liberals a bloc in fact as well as name. That would be "undemocratic."

But would it really be undemocratic? The nation is not a town meeting and individual citizens cannot be expected to be informed on every issue that agitates Congress. This is precisely what parties are for—to organize sentiment and delegate power to those who will carry out a given program. In a mass society, the key to power is organization, though that fact may be esthetically repellent and ideologically repugnant to some.

Yet much of the progressive tradition is at odds with this reality. Take a further example: the dogma that civil service is "good" and patronage is "bad." By process of accretion since the first Civil Service Act was passed in 1883, virtually the entire Federal establishment has come under its provisions. When President Kennedy was elected, he found that his effective appointment power extended to fewer than a thousand jobs. His Cabinet members discovered, as had their predecessors before them, that subordinates could assume the detached and passive air of officials who knew that their jobs were protected and that they would be around long after the Cabinet members had departed.

Among the President's immediate staff, no complaint is more prevalent than the difficulty of budging a frozen bureaucracy. "They don't actively sabotage our policies," one aide told me. "They just move as slow as glue when the policy doesn't suit them." In order to rule out the spoils system and enshrine the virtues of the competitive examination, we have come close to making effective political change impossible and responsible party leadership infinitely more difficult.

Coupled with dedication to civil service is the progressive doctrine that bipartisan, semi-independent, and quasi-judicial regulatory agencies are the democratic answer to controlling the abuses of capitalism. In practice, we have found that the regulatory agencies can be quite independent of the White House—but hopelessly the captives of the very interests they are supposed to regulate. Recently Howard Morgan resigned as a member of the Federal Power Commission and complained, in effect, that his agency was not able to insulate itself from industry pressures and was unable therefore to protect consumer interests. At various times, the same complaint has been leveled at every one of the twelve major independent regulatory agencies.

Most regulatory agencies, whether state or Federal, follow the same life cycle. They are born in a reforming spurt and initially champion consumer interests. Then, as time passes, various commissioners receive lucrative jobs in the concerns they had been regulating, public interest dwindles, and the agency becomes an appendage of a special interest. Finally, another reform wave engulfs the agency and we have a Newton Minow at the Federal Communications Commission for two years—and then, inexorably, the cycle begins to repeat itself.

It is worth asking now how much longer we can afford these islands of independent power as instruments for regulating an increasingly complex economy. Though President Kennedy backed away from the idea after last year's steel crisis, more direct government intervention into the economy seems a likely prospect. The pricing decisions of steel have as much to do with the overall vitality of the economy as practically any decision the Administration may make—and yet the decision is made by a relative handful of directors in a few companies. These directors are not truly accountable to anyone but themselves because (as Adolf Berle and Gardner Means pointed out a generation ago) control has become divorced from ownership, as any small stockholder can testify.

I am not sure what the proper answer to the problem is, but I am sure that the progressive tradition offers only the feeblest guides. Looking backward, it seems evident that the progressives could be ruthlessly realistic about the weaknesses of economic man, but blind to the weaknesses of political man. They saw the dangers of propertied greed, but not of political ignorance or indifference. They were skeptical about profit statements, but wholly beguiled by the mathematics of democracy—their advocacy of the direct election of the President was an example of the superficiality of their political analysis. In tribute to the dogma "one man, one vote," they would have scrapped one important device, the electoral college, which, as the system works out in practice, gives the otherwise under-represented urban voter a fairer shake in national politics.

The problems of democracy, so it seems to me, will not be solved by "more democracy" but rather by more concern with effective leadership, with responsible parties, and with understanding the infirmities as well as the strengths of popular opinion. "I have always felt," the senior LaFollette said wisely in his autobiography, "that the political reformer, like the engineeer or the architect, must know that his foundations are right."

Clearing the Air

by JAMES A. WECHSLER

In midsummer of the year 1963, President Kennedy submitted to the United States Senate, for its advice and consent, the terms of a treaty agreement reached with the Soviet Union and Great Britain under which nuclear tests would be confined to underground places. With a world-wide sense of relief stirred by this limited accord, prospects for its approval by the Senate appeared favorable. But for some Senators, as well as some editorial writers, the news seemed to be cause for anxiety rather than animation, as if this small breakthrough in the cold war affronted their analysis of history, and threatened their political security.

Senator Arbuthnot was one of the most vocal "reservationists" and his views might have been presented this way on a "Meet the Press" program shortly after the Senate received the treaty:

Q. Senator Arbuthnot, it has been reported that you have been disturbed by the test-ban agreement. Are those reports accurate?

A. Well, perhaps "disturbed" is too strong a word. Certainly I would welcome any genuine agreement that would seem to bring us closer to peace. But I want to be sure that it is genuine.

Q. In other words, you have your doubts?

A. I must confess that I do.

Q. Does that mean that you plan to vote against the treaty?

A. Oh, now, you're moving too fast. You are, if I may say so, leaping to a conclusion. I simply mean to say that I am approaching this debate with an open mouth—that is, mind. And I hope all my colleagues will approach it in the same spirit.

Q. Could you summarize briefly what features of the treaty cause you the deepest concern?

A. Now that would be difficult to do briefly, because there are so many questions that have not been answered. But my basic question is whether we have assurances that this agreement provides absolute security for the United States.

Q. You said absolute security?

A. Absolutely, within, of course, a moderate definition of that word.

Q. How do you feel such assurances could be given?

A. That is not for me to say. The burden of proof is on Mr. Kennedy and his associates. If I may coin a phrase, they have to prove to us that the bear has changed his spots, and that he is prepared to honor any agreement. Now, in view of all the violations that have occurred, beginning at Yalta, you gentlemen will forgive me if I say that this will take a lot of proving. But do not misunderstand me; I am ready to be convinced, and I hope that the evidence will be forthcoming.

Q. There are many people, apparently including Averell Harriman, who believe that Russia's conflict with Red China made Khrushchev eager for a real agreement to support his theory of coexistence. Have you considered that argument?

A. Why, yes, certainly. Any reasonable man would have to consider that point of view. But can we be absolutely sure that there is a conflict between Russia and Red China? Is it not possible that this is all a strategem to take us off our guard?

Q. What would you regard as absolute proof that the conflict between Moscow and Peking is real?

A. Well, I think any reasonable man would have to agree that an all-out war between Russia and the Red Chinese would remove most of the doubts on this point. But that has not occurred.

Q. Senator, to get back to the treaty. Isn't this essentially the agreement that the United States has long been proposing, going back to the Eisenhower era? Haven't the Russians made major concessions, particularly with respect to confining the treaty to a limitation on tests in the atmosphere and outer space?

A. That is true. That is exactly what makes me so suspicious, or at least dubious, about this agreement.

Q. You mean the fact that the Russians have yielded to us on key points increases your fears about the treaty?

A. It has caused me to wonder, yes, as to whether there is some nig—some enigma in the woodpile that is not yet discernible. Perhaps they know something that we don't know. I don't know.

Q. Didn't the U. S. Senate place itself on record as favoring an agreement in this form back in 1959?

A. I believe that is correct. We were aware, however, that the Soviet Union was opposed to such an agreement at the time.

Q. Could you indicate some other grounds for your reservations about the agreement, especially in view of the almost world-wide popular support that it has received?

A. Well, that so-called world-wide support is one of the things that most distresses me. I would be most wary of anything that seemed to create any illusions, any immoderate hopes—

Q. But President Kennedy himself

JAMES A. WECHSLER is editor of the editorial page of The New York Post. He is the author of five books: "Revolt on the Campus," "War Propaganda and the United States," "Labor Baron," "The Age of Suspicion," and "Reflections of an Angry Middle-Aged Editor."

has warned against any excessive expectations, and pointed out that this is only a first step—

A. Ah yes, but my question is: a first step toward what? Are we on the road to appeasement, to more sellouts? I do not charge that we are. I merely raise the questions. There is something strange in the atmosphere.

Q. Some people feel the atmosphere will be clearer once the treaty goes into effect.

A. Oh, but what would it profit us if we reduced pollution in the air but found our minds befogged? As I said on the Senate floor the other day, an overdose of tranquilizers can be as dangerous as radiation. Indeed, I believe Dr. Teller would argue that the tranquilizer could be a greater danger, although I have not consulted him on that point.

Q. Senator, everything you have said would seem to indicate that you will vote against the treaty.

A. It was certainly not my intention to create that impression. I am merely urging caution, that we make haste slowly, and that we make absolutely certain that there is no gimmick, that this is really a foolproof agreement.

Q. But the treaty itself provides that any signatory can withdraw from it on three months notice—

A. That is one of the things that worries me. How can we be sure that the Russians do not have some devious reason for wanting us to halt tests for a while—until, perhaps, they have made some new preparations?

Q. Would you have preferred a treaty from which we could not withdraw?

A. Now, please do not put words in my mouth. I am merely raising possibilities. As one of my colleagues has pointed out, this treaty would not prevent Castro from conducting underground experiments in caves. Can you cite any provision which would prevent him from doing so?

Q. What would prevent him from doing so if there were no treaty?

A. You have not answered my question. It is this type of loose thinking that concerns me most.

Q. Senator Arbuthnot, how do you feel about Red China's attacks on the treaty? They have accused the Russians of surrendering to the West. They charge the Soviets with trying to create the illusion that there can be any kind of peace between capitalist and Communist states. Do you see any similarity between their position and yours?

A. I trust that it is not necessary for me to say on this forum that I am equally opposed to all forms of Communism, whether Russian or Chinese. And I suggest again that we must look behind all these words and find out whether it is possible that the Russians have instructed the Chinese to make such attacks in order to confuse the West.

Q. Senator, you seem to be proposing a sort of mental inspection-system as a condition for all agreements. Are you arguing that there can be no agreements with the Russians until they have allowed us to send over a team of psychiatrists to examine their leaders?

A. Well, now, that thought had not occurred to me in that form. But it is a provocative one. Of course, I would want to know exactly how the psychiatrists were to be selected; I have known some of them who have seemed to me to be, as far as world politics is concerned, a little fuzzy-headed. But it is an interesting suggestion. Very interesting.

Herblock in The Washington Post

"Courage, Men, Till the Clouds Come Back"

Q. Suppose the Russians then insist on sending over a team of psychiatrists to examine our government, and some members of the Senate. . .

A. Well, now, you are reducing a novel thought to an absurdity and I do not think it would be profitable for us to pursue it much farther.

Q. Senator Arbuthnot, on the question of motivations, some of your critics have asserted that you seem to be delaying an announcement of your position until you see how the political wind is blowing. Would you comment on that charge?

A. I deplore and decry such insinuations. They are unfortunately too common. He who steals my purse steals trash, but he who impugns my motives and tries to read evil intention in my mind, is deserving only of contempt. In this, as in all matters, when the roll is called I shall consult only my conscience.

Q. Senator, you have said that the Administration must offer "proof" that the treaty absolutely protects our security. But you have also warned on many occasions against the disclosure of any vital information about our nuclear program. How do you reconcile those positions?

A. That, as I have frequently said, is the President's problem.

Q. Senator Arbuthnot, our time is nearly up but there is one final question. If Khrushchev, perhaps under the pressure of the Russian military leaders, were to announce tomorrow that he was repudiating the agreement, would that affect your attitude toward it?

A. I can answer that question unequivocally. If that were to happen, I would announce at once and categorically that I was prepared to vote for its ratification by the Senate. I believe that such an announcement from Moscow would clear the air and resolve the doubts felt by myself and many of my colleagues.

Q. Thank you very much, Senator Arbuthnot, for appearing on this program.

Two Years After

The Depressed Areas

by JULIUS DUSCHA

THE Congressman could hardly wait to question the Administrator. Did you not assure me, New York Republican Clarence E. Kilburn asked, that no decision on the depressed areas project in my district would be made until after the election? William L. Batt, Jr., director of the Area Redevelopment Administration, shifted in his chair. He replied that he could not recall the exact details of the conversation. Kilburn, the ranking Republican member of the House Banking Committee, had no apparent difficulty in remembering what was said. Why, he asked Batt, did you then let my opponent announce the day before the election the approval of an $844,000 loan to reopen a pulp and paper mill?

The announcement was "electrifying," the Congressman told Batt angrily. "The people all came out on the streets and had a big celebration." Kilburn estimated that he lost 2,000 to 3,000 votes as a result.

It was on this jarring political note that hearings began last spring on an Administration request to more than double the size of the two-year-old depressed areas program. Kilburn was not the only member of the Banking Committee to pounce on Batt. Republican Representative Oliver P. Bolton, of Ohio, also complained about the way Democrats were apprised by the ARA of the approval of projects so that they could claim all of the credit for what were, in reality, bipartisan endeavors. Another committee member, Republican Representative Florence P. Dwyer of New Jersey, charged that ARA funds had been used to train workers for a Mack truck plant that Maryland had pirated from her New Jersey district.

The Administration tended to brush off the complaints from the Republicans as sour political gripes. But on an afternoon in June, the House defeated by a vote of 209 to 204 the bill to increase by $455 million the amount of loans and grants available to depressed areas. Not only had twenty Republicans who had supported the original program two years ago turned against it; eighteen Southern Democrats had also changed their minds and voted "no" the second time around. The way President Kennedy was handling the racial crisis led to a few of the Southern switches. A Chamber of Commerce campaign against the program was also effective, both North and South. The depressed areas program, which had been vetoed twice by former President Eisenhower and was approved by the House in 1961 only after low-income rural areas were made eligible for grants and loans, was once again in deep trouble in the suspicious House.

Two weeks after the unexpected defeat of the legislation in the House, however, the Senate approved the expansion bill by the comfortable margin of sixty-five to thirty. The same arguments of political finagling and inept administration that had killed the bill in the House were made in the Senate. But the arguments were to no avail. This year the legislation received seven more votes in the Senate than the original bill received in 1961.

The Administration had worked hard to get a decisive vote in the Senate as the first part of its campaign to convince the House to reverse its decision. The failure of Congress to vote additional funds for the ARA this year would not be a fatal blow to the program, however, because the agency still has enough money to continue its activities into the early part of 1964, when Presidential election year pressures undoubtedly would assure the approval by Congress of more money for depressed areas. Still, the agency and its supporters felt the increased needs of such areas required more money this year. Thus, late in July an attempt was made in the House to trade votes with Southern members for ARA funds in exchange for support among Northern Democrats for a new cotton subsidy that Southern textile mills badly want.

But which majority was right—the Senate or the House? Has the depressed areas program been such a success that it deserves the vote of confidence given it by the Senate? Or has it failed and sunk into a morass of politics and poor administration? The answer is that the program has been neither as bad as its House opponents have alleged nor as good as its Senate supporters have claimed.

The depressed areas legislation was the first major Kennedy program approved by Congress. When the President signed the bill into law May 1, 1961, little more than three months after taking office, he had redeemed his principal pledge to West Virginia. During the climactic West Virginia Presidential primary, Mr. Kennedy had pledged that his Administration would support legislation to use government loans and grants to help bring industry to areas like West Virginia where shifting industrial patterns had left stagnant pools of unemployment.

The legislation became Senate Bill No. 1 in 1961. It was introduced by Senator Paul H. Douglas, Illinois

Democrat, who had drafted the first proposals to help depressed areas six years earlier. The 1961 law set up the Area Redevelopment Administration in the Commerce Department to lend and grant a total of $379 million to depressed areas. These ranged from rugged coal-mining counties in West Virginia and Eastern Kentucky to desolate Indian reservations on the Western plains and deserts. In what was considered a master political stroke, rural areas with low incomes were also made eligible for depressed areas aid. This meant that a program originally designed to help not more than 200 chronically depressed counties was expanded to include more than 1,000 counties—one third of all the counties in the United States. With so many counties having a stake in the program it presumably would benefit from continued broad-based support on Capitol Hill.

Under the program, loans are made to help acquire sites and construct buildings for new factories and other business enterprises in depressed areas. Money is also available for loans and grants for building sewer and water lines and other public facilities needed to attract industry. In addition, funds are provided for training men and women for work in new plants, and for surveys to determine the industrial and tourist potential of depressed areas. The entire program depends on the initiative of local communities. They must draw up redevelopment plans, interest industry in their areas, and put up at least ten per cent of the cost of a project before Federal loans and grants are made available. Each project must be reviewed by one or more of a half dozen Federal agencies, ranging from the Small Business Administration to the Agriculture Department, before the money is finally released to a depressed community.

The new agency was established in May, 1961, but it was not until September that Congress approved appropriations for the ARA. To head the agency the President picked William L. Batt, Jr., a Pennsylvanian who had been one of the early advocates of a Federal depressed areas program and had operated a similar program in his own state. Batt, a tall, bald Democrat in his forties, has political ambitions of his own in Pennsylvania.

As administrator of the depressed areas program, Batt has moved cautiously. He has also been hamstrung by the red tape built into the program by Congress. The checking and double-checking required by Congress before approval of a project has slowed up ARA operations. Batt's caution is partly a result of having been burned in hastily arranging the first ARA project. It was a combination loan and grant to provide water for a new shirt factory at Gassville, Arkansas. To get the plant, which moved to Arkansas from Tennessee, the community had to promise to help keep it non-union. Thus, there were anti-union overtones as well as aspects of industrial pirating involved in the initial ARA project.

Moving slowly, the ARA approved financial assistance for 370 projects in its first two years. The Federal loans and grants tied up in these projects totaled $165 million. The ARA estimated that 55,000 jobs would be directly created by its loans and grants, and that 35,000 additional new jobs would be created in ARA-aided communities as a secondary result of the new industry that the ARA helped to establish. In addition, 396 ARA manpower projects trained more than 20,000 men and women for jobs not yet available in depressed areas.

The 90,000 jobs for which the ARA can claim credit amount to less than thirteen per cent of the 700,000 hard-core unemployed who are concentrated in the depressed areas. But, as Senator Douglas pointed out during the Senate debate over the ARA program, a beginning has at last been made toward solving the seemingly intractable problems of these stricken areas. Nearly 250,000 more jobs would be created with the balance of the original ARA authorization of $379 million plus the additional $455 million sought by the agency from Congress.

Although the ARA had definitely committed only a little more than one-third of its available funds by last spring, the agency won White House approval to seek the additional authorization. ARA Administrator Batt and his boss, Secretary of Commerce Luther H. Hodges, argued before the House and Senate Banking Committees that projects already being processed would quickly use up the remaining two-thirds of the original ARA authorization. But even Congressional friends of the depressed areas program thought the request for $455 million more was excessively high. Nevertheless, the House Banking Committee approved the legislation, and the House Rules Committee sent the bill to the floor without appreciable delay.

Confident Democratic leaders in the House were shocked by the defeat of the legislation in June. They thought they had a safe margin of perhaps as many as thirty votes. The program, while providing urgently needed jobs, after all, included some of the familiar ingredients of a pork barrel, and the ARA had carefully distributed projects so that every eligible state got something. Before the debate, Representative Wright Patman, Texas Democrat and chairman of the House Banking Committee, filled fifty-six pages of the Congressional Record with a compilation of loans and grants made by the ARA under the depressed areas program as well as the accelerated public works program, which the agency also administers. Nearly $1 billion in Federal money has been made available during the last year for state and local public works projects that were off the drawing boards and ready to go. Many depressed areas have in fact been helped more by the agency's public works program than by its long-range industrial and public-facility grants and loans.

Politics was certainly an important factor in the ARA defeat in the House. In addition to Republican resentment over the advantage given Democrats in announcing ARA projects, some Republican Congressmen suspected that in the months before the November elections last year favoritism was shown by the agency toward projects in Democratic districts. Republican Representative William B. Widnall of New Jersey observed that seventy-eight of the one hundred ARA projects approved during the four and one-half months before the elections went to Democratic Congressional districts.

"I have heard this program called 'seed corn' money," Widnall, a senior member of the House Banking Committee, told the House. "I am getting pretty worried over who is doing the planting and what is coming up as a crop."

But far more important than the political complaints were the questions raised by Republicans and Democrats about the kinds of projects receiving ARA aid. Nearly a fourth of the money spent on industrial projects in the first nine months of the 1963 fiscal year went for the financing of motels and hotels. Of the $7.9 million loaned for the construction of hotels and motels in that period, $1.8 million was allotted to the Ponchartrain Hotel Company to help build a motor hotel in Detroit where the occupancy rate of existing hotels has been running little better than fifty per cent. Detroit Congressmen who defended the loan maintained that additional hotel space was needed to attract conventions to Detroit, but with the amount of private capital available for hotel construction throughout the country, a luxury hotel hardly seems a community need requiring Federal funds loaned at four per cent interest.

Another project that has been widely criticized is a convention auditorium in Duluth, Minnesota, for which the ARA set aside $6.1 million in loans and grants. While the Detroit hotel would provide jobs for 450 persons, the Duluth project would create only twenty-two permanent jobs. The auditorium would of course attract conventions and thus indirectly provide work for many more than twenty-two persons. But the money for the auditorium, which happens to be located in the state represented by Senate Democratic whip Hubert H. Humphrey, amounted to one-third of all the money loaned and granted by the ARA for public-facility projects in the first nine months of the 1963 fiscal year.

Another public facility loan and grant totaling nearly $9.5 million for a tourist center for Oklahoma Lake has also been questioned. It is more than a coincidence that a project which accounted for fifty-five per cent of all the money provided for public-facility loans and grants in the 1962 fiscal year went to the state represented by the powerful Democrat, Senator Robert S. Kerr, who died in December, 1962.

Neither Oklahoma nor Texas is generally considered to be a depressed state, particularly by its Congressional delegations, and Chambers of Commerce in East Texas vigorously protested the inclusion of counties in their part of the state among the depressed areas. Yet in the first two years of the program both Texas and Oklahoma got more money from the ARA than was received by the severely depressed coal-mining regions of Eastern Kentucky, West Virginia, Pennsylvania, and Southern Illinois. Oklahoma led all the rest, with $16.7 million in grants and loans, followed by Texas with $9.7 million. Pennsylvania received $8 million; West Virginia, $6.1 million; Kentucky, $5 million; and Illinois, $2.3 million.

The depressed areas program, however, has not been a gigantic boondoggle, as some of its Congressional critics would have their constituents believe. The ARA has made mistakes, some of them pretty big, but it has also pumped badly needed funds into worthwhile projects in chronically depressed areas. If Texas and Oklahoma received more money than Pennsylvania and West Virginia, it is partly because the most severely depressed areas in the coal-mining states are so far behind the rest of the country, with such deep rooted economic problems, that it takes them much longer to develop worthwhile projects.

The biggest handicap that has faced the ARA has been the sluggishness of the American economy. Even with all of the advantages that ARA loans and grants offer businesses, it is difficult to find companies willing to locate in depressed areas at a time when the economy is not expanding as rapidly as it should be to create needed jobs.

The fragmentation of the ARA program has also worked against the early achievement of dramatic results. For every $2 the ARA has spent in areas of hard-core unemployment it has allocated $3 to depressed but hardly desperate rural areas. It may have been necessary to make a third of the nation's counties eligible for ARA aid to get the program through the House in 1961, but this shotgun approach to the problems of the depressed areas has merely delayed the solution of many of them. For political reasons the ARA must spread its projects among as many states as possible; as a result, it is far more difficult for the agency to concentrate its efforts in the areas where the need is the greatest.

Since he became Undersecretary of Commerce, Franklin D. Roosevelt, Jr., has spurred ARA efforts to develop a coordinated program for the Appalachian Mountain area, which stretches all the way from northern Alabama to southern New York and includes some of the nation's worst pockets of chronic unemployment. Roosevelt is not the first person to conclude that a government agency patterned after the Tennessee Valley Authority probably could best solve the problems of "Appalachia."

In his excellent study of Eastern Kentucky, Night Comes to the Cumberlands, Harry M. Caudill dismisses the fragmented ARA program as totally inadequate to the problems of depressed areas and argues for the establishment of a Southern Mountain Authority to rebuild the economy of the Southern Appalachians. A native of eastern Kentucky who practices law in his home town of Whitesburg, Caudill believes that a vast resettlement of the area's population into concentrated, viable centers is needed. Then through the construction of large dams, and the systematic renewal of the region's resources, Caudill's Southern Mountain Authority would turn the area into a mecca for tourists.

The depressed areas program has been an experiment, and, like most other experiments, it has not worked perfectly. Not only does the ARA need stronger, more imaginative, and less political leadership; both the agency and the White House also need to review the entire depressed areas effort. The program probably would not have run into so much trouble in the House if it had been carefully appraised within the Administration last winter before the recommendations for more funds were sent to Capitol Hill.

It is still not too late for such an appraisal. A study of this sort undoubtedly would lead to the rather obvious conclusion that the ARA needs to concentrate its efforts on specific depressed areas rather than scatter them across the continent. Without such a concentration of loans and grants the ARA is in danger of becoming merely another pork barrel. The lives of too many communities and people are involved to permit the depressed areas program to be turned into a political handout.

New Ideas From an Old World

by THOMAS W. OTTENAD

WESTERN EUROPE, the old dog that added some impressive new tricks to its economic repertory, provides a startling contrast to the United States. While the American economy moves ahead sluggishly, Western Europe makes brisk progress, with some countries there showing a growth rate double that of the United States.

The more rapid growth of European business and industry has attracted increasing attention in this country. Of even greater significance, if less noticed, however, is another kind of "economic gap" that has opened between these two segments of the West—a gap in economic philosophy and practice. America, with its tradition of change, and Europe, with its unchanging traditions, seem, in the field of economic policy, to have reversed their usual roles. The Old World has become the daring innovator; the New World, the reluctant follower. The United States, with a New Frontier government led by a youthful President, still clings to Victorian economic practices while major European governments, conservative by name or tradition and led by statesmen of a passing generation, have moved ahead to develop and use fresh and fruitful policies.

The economic differences between the United States and Western Europe are manifest in a variety of respects, but essentially they center on the degree of government participation in the economy. The United States still holds tenaciously to a laissez-faire more appropriate to the Nineteenth Century. It still resists the philosophy, adopted long ago by major European nations and constantly adjusted to new circumstances, that governments must play a dominant role in directing and influencing the national economies.

An American traveling through Europe finds broad acceptance of this idea. There is little or none of the American antipathy toward government taking a direct hand in economic matters. In a recent report the Commission of the Common Market stated clearly a view that is widely accepted in Europe: "It must be remembered that an economic order based on freedom can only exist in the world today at the price of constant state intervention in economic life."

National budget balancing is another subject viewed far differently in Europe. In this country there is almost an irrational fixation on balanced budgets. Europeans, however, see deficit spending as a useful tool for stimulating their economy when necessary. Calm and tiny Sweden provides a good example of how far Europeans have outstripped Americans in their endorsement of a flexible budget policy. As long ago as 1937, the Swedish government adopted a formula of trying to balance its budget, not annually but over a period of years covering the business cycle, with planned budget surpluses during booms and planned deficit spending by the government during slumps. It is this very concept that President Kennedy has been trying, for the past year or so, without any great success, to persuade Americans to accept.

As for more contemporary economic thought, the United States views as completely alien and dangerous the concept of national planning, which has captivated so much of Europe. The idea of government planning for future economic needs can scarcely be discussed in this country; it is castigated as "socialistic"—or worse. On the other hand, national planning has long been accepted in France, the Netherlands, and Sweden; it has taken hold recently in Belgium and Great Britain, and has entered the preliminary stage in Italy.

The types of plans vary considerably. "Le plan" in France is the most complex and far-reaching. Carried out by the government with the participation of business and labor, it sets four-year targets for economic growth, investment, production, wages, prices, and a multitude of other factors. It spells out steps needed to reach its objectives and offers incentives and indirect controls for pushing the economy over the goal line. Some of the other planning systems, like that used in Sweden, are far less compulsive in nature than "le plan."

The economic tools used by European governments are much more extensive, varied, and sophisticated than those utilized by the United States. They also are employed more rapidly and flexibly, although not always more adroitly. Perhaps the most impressive arsenal of economic weapons is Sweden's. It includes a wide range of measures that go far beyond the usual fiscal and monetary policies in use in most modern, industrialized nations. Among the most important are: a comprehensive investment reserve system allowing business firms to put money aside, in a government-supervised fund, during periods of prosperity and receive a sizable tax credit if they spend it for plant expansion or other authorized works during slack periods; a new national pension scheme that not only sets one of the world's most ambitious targets for old-age benefits, but also provides the government with a mammoth source of capital for investment; an emergency budget to finance public works that can be started on short notice when the economy needs help; and a comprehensive system of both short and long-range economic forecasting to uncover and try to correct potential difficulties.

There is great variation in the kinds of economic instruments used in other nations, for Europe still is far from economic unity, the hopes of the Common Marketeers notwithstanding. In Great Britain, for example, there is standby authority for making limited cuts in certain taxes, when needed, without taking time to get approval from Parliament. (A somewhat similar proposal by President Kennedy was greeted with loud indignation here as a Presidential invasion of the Congressional taxing power.) A national incomes policy is being sought in an effort to stabilize British prices, although chances for success appear rather dim. Lower taxes, higher public expenditures, and a record budget deficit were urged last spring in a drastic effort to revive England's economy, the most sluggish in Western Europe.

Italy, where the economy has shown a tremendous surge of power in recent years, has used a continuing policy of high public expenditures and investments to bolster growth and meet accumulated public needs.

And what of those reputedly laissez-faire Germans, who have achieved the fastest growth rate in Western Europe and who are generally regarded as economic conservatives? Although the phenomenal West German recovery was, in large part, the product of such favorable circumstances as its large pool of cheap, well-trained refugee labor, the government, too, has played a major role in the "wirtschaftswunder," or economic miracle. Since 1949 it has provided subsidies, generous allowances for depreciation, and tax benefits designed to promote investment, especially in the basic industries. The government has played a major part, also, as a direct investor in economic enterprises.

The broad differences between the United States and Europe extend even into the esoteric realm of national accounting. The United States' Federal bookkeeping system, the so-called "administrative budget," exaggerates deficits by about $3 billion whereas British, French, and German accounting methods result in much less distortion. Furthermore, the United States lumps all kinds of expenditures into one untidy, unidentifiable mess while most European budgets utilize two separate accounts —one for operating and other nonrecoverable outlays, the other for repayable loans, investments, and capital expenditures. If the European system had been in use here, Americans could have seen that about one-third of the Federal deficit of $3.9 billion in fiscal 1961 resulted from expenditures that offered some prospect of being repaid. The effect of these differences in approach is that our administrative budget distorts and magnifies Federal deficits while European systems minimize them.

Justus in The Minneapolis Star

"How Am I Doin', Pop?"

Taken together, all these measures constitute an effort by European nations to direct their economic development instead of letting it drift, rudderless, on an economic sea that is as dangerous as it is free. Their instruments are aimed also at applying the brakes to inflation although, in general, these have not worked very well.

Popular American belief to the contrary, Europeans have lost little freedom through their efforts to guide their economies through national planning. There are some minimal strictures such as the difficulty French businessmen have in obtaining financing for activities that are not in accord with "le plan" and the requirement that Swedish firms use their investment reserves for purposes authorized by the government if they are to obtain full tax concessions. Yet even in these cases, Europeans feel they have not sacrificed freedom of choice. They point out that participation in economic programs usually is a voluntary matter.

Important in the European process is a cooperative effort in which business, labor, and government frequently work together in developing policies acceptable to all. Thus, the French national economic plan is put together by twenty-five committees with about 3,500 members representing industry, trade unions, government bureaucracy, and virtually every other element of French society. Britain's "Neddy," the National Economic Development Council that is charged with preparing a plan for national growth, is much smaller than the French apparatus but shows the same kind of approach. Its twenty members include trade unionists, employers, and public representatives. The trend to cooperative planning is vividly apparent in Sweden, particularly in labor-management relations. Unions and employers have worked together so harmoniously that there has not been a major strike since 1945. There is cooperation between management and labor in Germany, too. Under a policy of "co-determination" established by German law, workers have a voice in shaping business policies.

As these and other practices indicate, Europe places much greater store on the value of inter-group cooperation than does the United States. Europeans seem much more intent on reaching a national consensus, in eliminating differences where possible, than in having complete individual independence of action. At its best this attitude leads to an effort to reach a national policy beneficial to all; at its worst, it leads to restraint of trade, market sharing, and cartels. Americans cherish freedom of action, despite its frequent uncertainty, much more highly than they do cooperation and its more certain calm.

Why has the United States lagged so far behind Europe in accepting changed economic concepts? The answer is a difficult one, shrouded in a haze of traditional attitudes and psychological factors. In part, it reflects a refusal to recognize that the economic facts of life have changed drastically since the days of America's infancy. What was once a simple society, where each man enjoyed a wide range of economic freedom, has now become a complex economic machine with a vast number of interacting parts. It is a delicate, complicated economy that needs constant attention if it is to run smoothly and on the proper course.

Another part of the explanation seems to lie in the popular American penchant for preaching public thrift while practicing private profligacy. The American who is in deep personal debt for his automobile, a houseful of appliances, expensive but largely superfluous gadgets, and even vacations on a "play now, pay later" basis, nonetheless piously condemns "wild spending" by his government.

Former President Eisenhower bears considerable responsibility for strengthening popular myths about national economic policies. His homilies about "fiscal integrity" and his fervent exhortations against "passing our burdens on to our grandchildren" are appealingly sincere but appallingly uninformed. Perhaps his difficulty with economic concepts stems from the fact that, in the worn and weary Republican cliche about non-businessmen, he never had to meet a payroll.

Under the Kennedy Administration a gradual change has been taking place in government, if not public, attitudes toward economic policies. There was little evidence of the shift early in the New Frontier, for Mr. Kennedy was at heart much more a fiscal conservative than many Americans perceived while under the spell of his inspiring campaign speeches. Slowly, however, he has been moving toward a more flexible economic position. He started the process with a number of anti-recession and related measures such as larger depreciation allowances, a seven per cent tax credit for new investment, aid to depressed areas, and expanded public works, welfare, and training programs. A much more extensive move was made this year in the President's controversial proposal designed to cut taxes by $10.2 billion and deliberately put the Federal budget into the red by $11.9 billion in the fiscal year that began July 1.

While this proposal for a planned deficit is a major step, strange in its novelty to many Americans, it still leaves the United States far behind Western Europe in modern economic thought and practice. Even so, there is danger in this breaking of new U.S. economic ground. For if the inadequacies of the Kennedy plan prevent it from speeding up the growth of our sluggish economy and reducing unemployment, any hope of modernizing America's economic attitudes will suffer a serious setback.

Europeans who have studied America's economic situation strongly support the theory of the Kennedy program, almost to a man. But, almost equally unanimously, they fear it will not be big enough and diversified enough to do the job. Stronger measures, they insist, are needed.

It seems clear that a number of policies that have been used by European countries could be employed profitably on a modified scale by the United States. Long-range economic forecasts or projections of the Swedish type could focus attention on America's probable future needs and provide useful guidance to government, private industry, and labor. Standby tax-cutting authority and emergency public works projects would provide a way of dealing quickly with economic downturns without waiting for slow Congressional action. A more flexible, responsive budget policy would help to keep the entire economy in proper balance between deflation and inflation. An investment reserve system of the Swedish type would offer benefits to both the nation and participating business firms.

Programs of this type are needed to bring U.S. economic practice into line with the compelling demands of this latter half of the Twentieth Century. What was good enough for grandfather's economy is not likely to help us meet our urgent needs or match the pace of Western Europe. The New Frontier and the nation might well look across the Atlantic to learn what European economic ideas could be adopted to speed U. S. economic growth on behalf of 190 million Americans.

Tinder Box in the Dominican Republic

by SIDNEY LENS

JUAN BOSCH, a novelist who became president of his country, may well demonstrate that a revolution—even a Caribbean revolution—can be democratic and still succeed, or become simply another victim of Latin American militarism, vacuous anti-Communism, and a U. S. policy characterized by lack of understanding.

The first elected president of the Dominican Republic after thirty-two years of Trujillo tyranny is probably the most humanist head of state in this hemisphere. One of his first acts as president was to reduce his own salary and those of his ministers by half. By Latin standards this would ordinarily be considered a grandiose but empty act, but Bosch, who was penniless when he came to office, is conceded by everyone, even his worst enemies, to be incorruptible. Bosch's dedication to democracy is almost a mania. He refuses to conduct a purge of former Trujillo followers on the grounds that too many of his people have been tainted by association with the dictator, and that blood-letting can lead only to a terrorist regime. Let the past bury the past, he told his followers during the election campaign last year. When the workers of the government-owned Haina sugar mills used company trucks to transport themselves to a meeting of Bosch's Dominican Revolutionary Party (PRD), he publicly criticized them and ordered that in the future no government property should be used in the interests of any political organization, including his own. Firmly non-Communist, he nevertheless refuses to be stampeded into police action against the four existing Communist parties; he insists, rather, that they have the same right to function as other parties so long as they do not violate the law.

Genuine democracy, however, is strong medicine for any underdeveloped nation and particularly for one so retarded by a brutal dictatorship for more than three decades. The public administration Bosch inherited is next to worthless. It is made up of political appointees who were selected not for their talents or abilities but for whom they knew, and this concept of civil service does not die easily. Recently a PRD district leader was turned down when he asked that a party member be placed in a tourist bureau job. The district leader admitted the member knew nothing of office work or tourism, but argued that the prospective appointee had worked hard to win votes. Despite all of Bosch's firm declarations against favoritism and nepotism, the party leader could not understand why his request was refused; this had been the time-honored system, the only one he had ever known during his life-time. Under President Bosch, a new era, which may be long or brief, has begun but not without encumbrances from the past.

The military forces, about 20,000 strong, are no longer headed by Trujillo's closest associates but they are far from purged of either the Trujillo spirit or the secondary Trujillistas. In July, a group of airforce officers expressed their concern to Bosch about the "spread of Communism." On the strength of their action, American newspapers reported the possibility of a coup d'etat. President Bosch told the airforce spokesmen firmly that internal politics was none of their business and followed up by discharging a lieutenant and a military chaplain who had initiated the complaint. Almost no Dominican, other than Bosch and his close followers, could see anything inappropriate in the action of these military men. An intermediary of the President was forced to meet for the better part of two days with the Papal Nuncio to explain the discharge of the chaplain. Even those members of the armed forces who concede that constitutional government must be upheld, argue that it is the military's role to defend the state against the "internal danger of Communism."

Rumors of a coup d'etat are endless. A handsome young anti-Trujillo sergeant who drove me to the northern part of the island stated as a firm principle that the army had the right to seize power whenever it felt that Communism represented a threat. The concept of the subordination of the military to civilian government has few adherents. Dr. Viriato Fiallo, leader of the main opposition party, Union Civica Nacional, refuses to disassociate himself from any possible coup d'etat. Even the pro-American trade union federation, CONATRAL, urges its followers to depend on the "armed forces" as the bastion against Communism.

There has been an unceasing barrage of pseudo anti-Communist propaganda in Santo Domingo in recent months. Every day the Civicas, who represent the property-owning classes, release still another blast. A newspaper that speaks for them, Prensa Libre, is rabid on the subject. One of its columnists, J. Mejia, has accused Bosch of " a conspiracy between the party in power (PRD) and the Communists, long before the President took the oath of office." The same sort of propaganda is carried over radio and television, twice a day. The Communists, say these spokesmen, are penetrating every fiber of the Bosch regime and will soon seize power "unless something is done." When I asked Dr. Fiallo to name a few individuals in government who are Communists, he refused on the grounds that he might be subject to libel suits.

There is much more behind the "Communist issue" than meets the casual eye. Dr. Fiallo admits that the Civicas themselves were deeply infiltrated by Communists during the year they were in power prior to the elections. After Trujillo fell the Union Civica, a patriotic group made up of men who had fought the tyrant, organized a trade union federation. The man they put in charge turned out to be a member of one of the blatantly Communist parties. Subsequently, sixteen of the twenty-four members of the executive committee of the Civicas in Santo Domingo resigned and made a formal declaration in support of the Communists. Five government commissions, set up by the Council of State, which ruled the country for a year and which was Civica-dominated, are said to be Communist-dominated—including the important agricultural reform and planning bodies. Dr. Fiallo concedes most of this, but argues that "We cleared out the reds, the PRD is taking them in."

The more one probes, however, the clearer it becomes that the "Communist issue" is a cover for a reactionary ploy. There is no realistic chance that any of the small Communist parties, or even the larger June 14th Movement, which claims to be neutralist and nationalist but is called Fidelista by many observers, can seize power either through the electoral process or by violence.

At issue, it seems, is what will happen to the $300 million to $800 million in properties left behind by Trujillo himself and the additional hundreds of millions of dollars in wealth that belonged to his family. Of the fifteen sugar mills in the country, twelve were owned by the assassinated dictator. Seventy-five per cent of all industry was concentrated in his hands. Haina, the huge sugar combine now in government hands, is alone estimated to be worth between $125 million and $200 million. Hotels, cement factories, hundreds of thousands of acres of land, and many other properties of the dictator have been nationalized. This is precisely the source of contention. The Civicas want to lay their hands on this booty. Dr. Fiallo proposes that the Trujillo holdings, especially in sugar, be converted to share companies, with private investors holding a majority of the stock and the state a small minority. Only in this way, he claims, can confidence be generated for investment, both foreign and domestic. The Dominican right wing is also strongly opposed to Bosch's legislation designed to confiscate property which is listed in the names of others but which the government claims is still secretly owned by the Trujillo family.

What is purported to be a "Communist problem," therefore, turns out, when analyzed, to be a sharp difference in political and social philosophy. Bosch, a democratic socialist, is determined that the current and future profits from Trujillo's former wealth be used to improve the lot of the hungry mass of people.

In his four-year term of office Bosch hopes to distribute land to 70,000 of 98,000 families who own either no land at all or only one or two acres. The General Electric Company of Great Britain will soon begin work on a $150 million project at Puerto Plata in the north to build dams and hydroelectric installations that will make possible a large industrial program. In this area, one hundred factories will be built, giving work to 40,000 people. Electrical facilities in Santo Domingo are now being expanded by 26,000 kilowatts. Irrigation projects are planned to recover tens of thousands of acres for modern farming.

The current budget for education is double that of last year's. The minister of education hopes to build a thousand schools in four years, at a cost of $35 million. A contingent of 400 young men are being trained in agricultural techniques and will soon be working in the countryside to help the peasants improve on their ancient methods. In the first six months of this year the government made available $15 million in credits to small farmers. This amount was five times that of the year before, and seven or eight times the sum spent in the first several months after the fall of Trujillo. A public works project is creating jobs for 20,000 of the 200,000 men who are unemployed. Six "freedom villages," where homes will be built for sugar workers, are soon to be erected. Bosch is trying to fashion an independent civil service free of political pressures, a modern statistical system, and a realistic economic plan.

In a country which produces only $800 million of goods and services a year and where per capita income is only $200 annually, these steps constitute a formidable program. Bosch is hopeful that before his term expires he can deliver on his promise that every Dominican will eat three meals a day and that the 200,000 unemployed—twenty-five per cent of the working class—will be absorbed into useful occupations. Even under the best of circumstances this would be exceedingly difficult, for the democratic approach in an underdeveloped land can often produce an economic nightmare.

For example: During the last two years, wages in major industries have doubled. Workers who conducted national strikes following Trujillo's assassination, to prevent the reestablishment of dictatorship, are now represented by four federations of labor, each competing with the others. A worker who earned $1.50 a day in the sugar mills during Trujillo's time now receives $3.20. A sugar cane cutter has increased his pay from $1.15 to $2.50 or $3 a day, depending on how much he produces. Strikes have been frequent and the majority of them have been quickly successful. From the point of view of the workers—and from a humanist viewpoint—these raises are long overdue. But economic laws, at least in the short run, are not necessarily consistent with humanism. National production has risen, helped by a significant increase in the price of sugar on the world market, but it has not kept up with the rise in wages. Inflationary pressures are strong and growing. Consumption of meat, rice, and many other staples has pyramided so rapidly that the country is importing many items that it previously exported. From a humanist view this is a grand achievement, but in economic terms it presents severe problems.

Furthermore, workers who slaved under tyranny so long are now exploring their new-found freedom in other ways. The porters who sweep the airport terminal and hustle baggage, forego the sweeping because it brings no tips. In the past they would not have dared to neglect this part of their job, but the feeling of liberation gives them license. Workers in a paper factory employing 150 men insist that management set a quota limiting production. There are numerous other examples of a slackening of discipline which, however understandable in a newly-freed society, nevertheless place a severe burden on a poor and struggling economy.

If Bosch's political position were more secure he could appeal directly to the people to exercise a greater degree of responsibility, to make sacrifices for their revolution. But the Dominican leader sits on a tinderbox. The attack from the right is so strident that curtailment of the left would cause defections, leaving him without a political base. Bosch won the last election because he and the head of PRD, Angel Miolan, were able to organize a large mass movement. They opened headquarters in twenty-seven provinces and formed a peasant organization of 150,000 members, an impressive number in a nation of only 3.1 million people. Their youth group fanned out into the most remote areas. Now, many PRD followers are becoming impatient. A few are drifting away to the June 14th Movement. Bosch knows that if he alienates the masses he organized so well last December, he will become a victim of the rightists and the military. He therefore treads carefully, granting the bread-and-butter unionists more concessions than he would under more stable conditions.

Still another obstacle confronts the new President of a shaky Dominican Republic: While he has nominal power, final authority rests elsewhere—with the army, and, to some extent, the United States. Bosch has made no effort to reduce the military forces or to reorganize them. For public consumption he says that he keeps the army at its present size because there are no jobs for released soldiers, but in reality he is holding the line to neutralize the army, which acts as if it were a sovereign state. Only when Bosch's economic program begins to produce results can he consolidate the support of his people into a more viable force and relieve himself and his government of the present burden of the military. The United States could help Bosch by substituting more economic aid for military support and military training, but this is not likely if current U. S. policies persist.

The U. S. Embassy in Santo Domingo operates on three pivots. The Ambassador, John Bartlow Martin, and most of his staff are fairly solid in support of Bosch. They try to wheedle much-needed economic aid out of Washington, but not always with success.

The U. S. State Department's labor attache, Fred Sommerford, plays a little game of his own, more in keeping with the over-simplified, anti-Communist position of George Meany and Jay Lovestone of the AFL-CIO than with the needs of the Bosch government. CONATRAL, the trade union federation supported by Sommerford, and to some extent his creation, is a wages-and-hours organization that claims no political affiliation. Its only pronouncements on politics are bitter diatribes against Communism. In one of its advertisements it called on the people to put their faith in the armed forces to defend the country against Communism. This kind of negativism does nothing to ease the pressures on Bosch. The Dominican President says categorically that he will not repeat the errors of Betancourt in Venezuela by trying to outlaw the Communists. If they are to be beaten, he says, it must be done by proving to the people that democracy and socialism are superior to Communism.

The third pivot is the military missions. U. S. officers sent to the Dominican Republic are competent and intelligent. They seem to understand the democratic principle that the military must remain subordinate to civilian control. But they also seem to recognize this as an axiom that applies only to their own country. In the Latin nations in which they function, they follow another rule. They are determined that the example of Fidel Castro in Cuba not be followed elsewhere, and this intention meshes with that of the native military, which also believes that it is permissible, even obligatory, to make a coup d'etat to curb a "Communist danger." On the day the United States recognized the military junta in Ecuador, a secondary PRD leader asked: "What can we expect here now?"

What President Juan Bosch must cope with, then, is a delicate and hazardous situation. He must buy time to implement his program of economic reform, but he faces impatience among the people generally and criticism from the Communists on the left, as well as bitter anti-Communism and the threat of a coup on the right. The support he gets from U. S. Ambassador Martin is useful, but, divided as is the U. S. policy, the reed he leans on is thin.

Bosch's disposition is to gain time by proceeding quietly and by compromising. An old anti-Trujillista, he has little love for an American foreign policy which aided Trujillo for so long. He knows, too, that the residue of anti-Americanism in his country is substantial, despite Martin's sincere and commendable efforts to create a more favorable impression of the United States among the Dominicans. Bosch is trying, therefore, to broaden his alliances with other countries. He secured the services of General Electric of Great Britain, not General Electric of the United States, for his Puerto Plata project. He canceled an ESSO (a U. S.-based Standard Oil Company) contract on the grounds that it was not in the best interests of his country. Yet he does not flaunt his doubts about the United States. He works closely with the Alliance for Progress. He does not reopen relations with Castro's Cuba, as he might under other circumstances. He seeks neither total independence nor neutralism, but merely semi-independence within the United States sphere, much as Gomulka does for Poland within the Communist orbit.

Bosch also compromises with former Trujillo followers, not only for humanist but for strategic reasons. In his balanced view, a purge would only deflect national consciousness for positive development toward revenge and chaos. He compromises with the military, and with many other negative forces, but his vision never recedes from the major task of building the necessary structure for economic and political democracy. If Juan Bosch can complete his program, or even get it firmly under way during his four year term, he might—just might—return happily to writing romantic novels.

Education's Industrial Revolution

by RONALD GROSS

AMERICA's schools were bypassed by the industrial revolution. While the world around them was being overrun by machines, our educational institutions remained virtually untouched by technology. Even today the machine seems out of place in the classroom. Recent developments in educational theory and practice, however, provide evidence that the technological world has finally invaded the schoolhouse.

First of all, education itself is coming to be thought of as our greatest industry, a vast enterprise employing more people than any other profession, engaging the full-time activity of at least a quarter of the nation, using a larger "plant" than the steel industry, and requiring a total budget dwarfed only by that for defense. The products of this massive industry are the "human resources" which we now recognize as the backbone of our technological society. "In the conditions of modern life," Alfred North Whitehead prophesied, "the rule is absolute: the race which does not value trained intelligence is doomed." Our appreciation of Whitehead's insight is reflected in the extraordinary title of the only comprehensive aid-to-education measure which has yet been enacted by Congress: the National Defense Education Act.

The new American reverence for education is not directed at learning as an end in itself, but at education as a means to an end—in fact, as the means of avoiding an end we have come to view as repugnant: our being outstripped in technical competition with the Russians. The new and urgent importance of the schools in our national life is thus based on a distinctly utilitarian, even chauvinist, interpretation of the role of education. Progressive education, with its dream of taking the lead in reforming and revitalizing society, is quite dead. The schools now devote themselves to "talent hunting," scouting for bright youngsters and turning them into "trained manpower." Statistics demonstrating how much a degree is worth in lifetime earnings seem to equate a college education with an investment in machinery or other capital goods—as indeed, on the most mundane level, it is.

Economists like Eli Ginzberg at Columbia and Theodore W. Schultz at Chicago have recently argued that America's advances in productivity have been caused just as much by improvements in its people's skills, principally through education, as by investment in labor-saving machines. "Nations invest—not spend—money in education," writes William J. Platt of the Stanford Research Institute. Educators promptly accepted this as an axiom, for once the cost of education is held to be an "investment" rather than a kind of social overhead, then the natural question concerning its cost ceases to be, "Isn't it too much?" and becomes, "Is it enough?"

But the schoolmen are now finding that they have a tiger by the tail. For the concept of education as an industry brings up another new question: Is it efficient enough? To the extent that it is considered an "industry," education is expected to match the efficiency of the nation's other productive enterprises. But the business magazine, Fortune, has reported that educational 'productivity' has been declining since the turn of the century. Arguing that Americans are not getting a big enough return on their invested education dollar, Fortune calculated the efficiency of the schools by analyzing the number of pupils instructed and the time and personnel required to do the job. In their need to achieve efficiency in production, according to Fortune, "the schools are no different from General Motors." Unless reforms are forthcoming, "the financial difficulties of the education industry will be compounded woefully."

Responding to such rebukes, the schools have recently undertaken some unprecedented innovations. The previous great wave of widespread experimentation in American education saw the establishment of progressive institutions in the early decades of this century. These schools and colleges questioned the basic goals of education. But the wave of experimentation which has swept American education during the current decade has been concerned primarily with efficient techniques of instruction. The urgent need for technical "brainpower" has sharply defined the new national purpose of education, but it has raised disturbing questions about the effectiveness and efficiency of our schools in achieving that purpose.

The schools are overcoming their traditional antipathy to machines and embracing all manner of mechanical and electronic aids to learning. Instructional television has swept through American public education as radio and moving pictures never did; teaching machines have had a phenomenal growth in the last five years; "language laboratories," which use magnetic tape recorders to teach foreign languages, have burgeoned from fewer than 400 to more than 4,000 in four years, and are now installed in more than one-fourth of the colleges in the country and in many high schools. This flood of hardware, welcomed by educators with a new attitude toward the use of technology, and backed by a public image of the schools as productive enterprises turning out the technical skills we need to survive as a nation, justifies describing the present situation as the beginning of education's industrial revolution.

James Finn, who is studying the situation for the National Education Association, has predicted that the new instructional technology will "hit education with a million pound thrust." Finn sees two major trends. First, the development of a technology of mass instruction designed to bring the best teachers to the greatest possible number of students. The prime example is the air-borne television project in the Midwest, in which a plane is broadcasting instruction over an area that includes five million students in six states. Many of the classrooms reached are in small rural schools which could not otherwise provide a full instructional program or first-rate teachers. Secondly, Finn sees the growth of a technology for individual instruction. This includes teaching machines and programmed learning, language laboratories, and other recently-developed tools for individual study. The distinguishing characteristic of these devices is that they enable the student to teach himself, and do it more effectively than has previously been possible, because they provide new kinds of motivation, correction, and adjustment to individual pace and learning ability.

Simple as ABC

But just to bring machines into the schools is not enough. As was true in industry, the introduction of machines requires a radical transformation in the ways we use time, space, and people. Another prominent educator, J. Lloyd Trump, director of the NEA's Commission on the Experimental Study of the Utilization of the Staff in the Secondary School, has projected an image of the "school of the future" based on new technology and organization. Under this plan, which is being tested in a number of schools throughout the country, the conventional classroom of twenty-five or so students would give way to a more flexible and variable arrangement of time and resources. The student would spend about forty per cent of his time in individual study with minimum supervision, but with immediate access to a wide variety of such learning devices and materials as teaching machines, tape-recorded lessons and drills, scientific apparatus, and books. Another forty per cent of the school day would be devoted to large-group learning, in which teachers would use the mass media of instruction to present information which must be conveyed to all students. Television, films, various kinds of projectors, and other devices would make this instruction much more potent than the traditional lecture. Finally, the teacher-time saved by these two arrangements would be reinvested to provide intimate small-group or individual instruction in the remaining twenty per cent of the time.

There seems little question that the rationalization and mechanization of the instructional process will proceed rapidly in American education during the coming decade. But the "conventional wisdom" of education, formulated before the days of mass communications and teaching machines, recoils from the prospect of a school system which would be based as much on technology as on the hallowed personal contact between student and teacher.

The extreme defenders of the status quo, including a great many teachers and many of their professional and union organizations, seem to fear that the machines will eventually displace teachers, and in the process cheat students of the values of personal classroom instruction. At the other extreme, zealous enthusiasts, frequently employed by commercial suppliers of new teaching tools, are pushing the production and adoption of teaching machines and other devices before they have been adequately tested. Interestingly enough, the extremists on both sides tend to have a financial interest in the situation. Neither the Luddite-like stand of many in the teaching profession nor the headlong impetuosity of the purveyors of gadgets is likely to prevail. There is too much dissatisfaction with the current effectiveness of American schools for the conservatives to succeed in their attempts to prevent the introduction of promising new teaching techniques, while the education profession's notorious resistance to change will prevent any wholesale acceptance of new techniques simply because they are new. Between these two extremes, however, educators will work out some balanced judgments on the opportunities and hazards of the industrial revolution in education. We may dimly envisage the kind of conclusions they will probably reach.

First, education has been inordinately timid in harnessing technology to its own purposes. It is a scandal that schools are not more efficient, and it is one of the reasons why teachers cannot be paid higher salaries. Any social enterprise which goes to the public purse for support must be prepared to show that the money it gets is being used as efficiently as possible.

Moreover, there is no evidence that the use of technology in education undermines either humanistic or democratic values in the learning process. The use of such devices may well open new opportunities for equalizing educational opportunities by making the best instruction available in every school. The last major technological development to be fully utilized in education was the printed book, which greatly reduced the student's contact with the teacher by providing an additional source of information, and whose net effect on the quality of education has hardly been detrimental. The common response of distaste to the concept of a student learning from a machine stems in part from a failure to consider the total educational process of which the machine is only one element. Just as introducing machines into the production of goods led to radical changes in every aspect of the productive enterprise, so the use of technology in education entails a sweeping transformation of the relationships between student and teacher. But there is good reason to believe that the new patterns now emerging are considerably more effective than the conventional type of classroom instruction. In many respects the machines merely do more effectively what human teachers have been forced to do for centuries: present factual material, drill, and test. By refusing to use machines, teachers have in effect had to become machines themselves. If they now use technology to relieve themselves of this drudgery, they may achieve the stature of true professionals, rather than glorified drillmasters.

On the other hand, mechanization and rationalization can so transform an activity that it loses its unique character and value; farming is an example. "We have not yet learned to enjoy the blessings of automation without sacrificing human values in any area of activity," observes Harry Broudy, professor of education at the University of Illinois. "Is there reason to believe that we can do otherwise in automated instruction? From using television to supplement the classroom teacher, it is only a step to arranging classes so that one can take advantage of the most efficient use of teaching machines. Given enough investment in automated instruction by manufacturers, publishers, and school boards, one can expect strong efforts to protect and exploit that investment."

Despite the dangers, Broudy wisely concludes that "We have no real choice but to try to outwit the machine age, to seek therein the potentialities for human values that it undeniably has." The schools have too long prided themselves on a kind of conspicuous inefficiency. Now the times demand a ruthless substitution of new pedagogical methods for old whenever the new techniques can provide more effective instruction, even if in the process we must eliminate some of the conventional amenities of school and college life.

It is possible to use machines in education without turning schools and colleges into factories. Indeed, at a time when students come in "tidal waves," technology's "labor saving" teaching devices can free the time of the best teachers for more personalized and specialized teaching. It may be the only way to avoid regimentation.

We can approve of the new desire to increase academic efficiency without accepting the narrowly nationalistic educational purposes which have helped bring it about. Nor need we press the idea of education as a productive enterprise to the fatuous lengths suggested by Arthur W. Melton of the University of Michigan, who compares engineering with education in these terms: "one purposefully designing and shaping hardware to the needs of society and the other purposefully designing and shaping human software to the needs of society." What is required is the effort to distinguish between extrinsic values which adhere to any established system, and the deeper purposes which the whole system seeks to accomplish. If the right distinctions are made, the industrialization of the schools need not undermine the values which lie at the heart of the educational enterprise.

For example, small classes and personal contact with a teacher are clearly not basic educational values in themselves. If the teacher is incompetent, a small class merely gives him the opportunity to "communicate his mediocrity in an intimate environment," as the late President Charles Johnson of Fisk University put it. The value to be guarded is personal contact with an able, inspiring teacher, at a time when the student needs him most, and in as small a group as possible. At other times, the student may not need this at all, but could do much better if brought into electronic contact with a specialist via film or television, or with an expertly-produced teaching machine program. By insisting that quality education cannot take place unless the student is in the presence of a warm body, we have frequently sacrificed the genuine values of personal instruction to the formal requirements of a bureaucratic cliche.

In education as everywhere else, technology increases alternatives, opens up new possibilities. It demands of those who would use it fully and well, a firm grasp of their own basic purposes. Without such an understanding of fundamental concerns and priority goals, education's industrial revolution could bog down in a deluge of hardware. But guided by a clear understanding of educational purposes, it can lead to the most stimulating reorganization of the schools since the era of the progressives.

THE RODIN REVIVAL

by ALFRED WERNER

In an introductory note to the catalogue issued by New York's Museum of Modern Art for the comprehensive Rodin show this summer, the veteran sculptor Jacques Lipchitz recalls that, as a young student in Paris, he was completely unable to grasp what he now describes as the "immense chaotic richness" of Rodin's work. He was then startled to learn that the celebrated Rodin had praised one of the pieces Lipchitz had exhibited in a group show, and had predicted a great future for him. Young Lipchitz could have met the world-famous septuagenarian on many occasions, but deliberately avoided doing so. An obvious explanation for the young man's attitude is, of course, the conflict between the generations, for Auguste Rodin was born in 1840, Lipchitz in 1891, and in the realm of art, as elsewhere, the "son" often irrationally rejects all the accomplishments of his "father."

Yet the "grandchildren" are usually less biased, and, as Peter Selz, who staged the New York show, points out, in the Fifties the new generation began to see the work of Rodin with fresh eyes: "There was now a general predisposition in the direction of his freedom of form, his exuberance of content, and even his 'painterly' sculpture, where so much depends on the effect of light." Indeed, we are now in the midst of a Rodin revival. Last year, the Louvre finally, for the first time, honored him with an exhibition. New Yorkers have just had an opportunity to view more than a hundred sculptures (bronze, marble, terra cotta, and plaster) and some forty drawings and water colors in a show which has now moved on to the California Palace of the Legion of Honor in San Francisco.

The young sculptors of today—whose beards are as unruly as those of their confreres in Nineteenth Century France—stand respectfully before Rodin's work that ten or fifteen years ago produced only mild admiration tempered with much scepticism. Our eyes have been "retrained" during that lapse of time—we are now embarrassed about having dismissed him as a creator of gesticulating melodrama, as a victim of his own Impressionist passion for light and shade, as one whose conception was pictorial rather than sculptural. As for myself, when I saw the show, "Rodin and French Sculpture," at the Metropolitan Museum of Art in 1957, I was struck by the amazing kinship between the animated, tension-fraught bronze by Rodin and the free-swinging mobiles of our American contemporary, Alexander Calder.

In calling Rodin "a tempest, an explosion," Lipchitz, of course, did not have in mind the great man's innumerable marble pieces, products of his old age, and none really his own work (these marbles, impeccably, almost insipidly, smooth and "perfect," were executed by artisans after clay models furnished by the master). Nor was this homage based upon the numerous portrait busts of celebrated or wealthy patrons which Rodin, himself a celebrity and a wealthy man, produced in his later years. Obviously some of the work fashioned when he was no longer the experimenter and innovator lacks his fierce vitality and intensity, but the mannerisms of his old age, and those of the numerous would-be-Rodins who aped and multiplied his shortcomings, must not blur our pleasure in the images fashioned by his fingers out of soft, yielding clay.

However, the dynamic creations that came from his studio prior to about 1900 are among the great masterpieces of modern sculpture. With compactness no longer considered an essential quality, and with much of the prejudice against "romantic" sculpture gone, we can enjoy Rodin's own enjoyment of the living forms of nature, particularly the human body, to which he devoted himself with unsurpassed sensuous abandon. Suddenly, all schools claim him for themselves, not only the Expressionists, but also the Abstract groups. He is hailed as the one who helped break up the traditional ideas of continuity of form, as a "baroque" sculptor who paved the way for the post-Cubist Lipchitz, and for Henry Moore who might endorse Rodin's statement that sculpture was the art of the lump and the hole. Some of Rodin's other statements, such as "I am . . . a mathematician, and my sculpture is good because it is geometrical," or "I feel the cubic truth everywhere—planes and volumes appear to me as the laws of all life," are being rediscovered, and applied to his own works; they are immensely more appropriate to his ambitious mature work than was his humble remark that nature was his sole master.

Rodin was basically a modeler—one of the greatest of all times. The arduous, time-consuming method of cutting directly into wood or stone was incompatible with the temperament of a master who preferred to transfer quickly into clay the spontaneous attitudes struck by his sitters, or to give immediate shape to the images born in his fertile mind. He did not pose his models but encouraged them to move freely about his studio so that he could sketch immediately whatever spontaneous attitudes might fascinate him, just as his friends, the Impressionist painters, went into the fields and woods with their sketchbooks to reap the ever-changing moods of nature. The speedy impressions of Rodin's fingertips in wax or clay (whose traces are still noticeable in the final bronzes) bear some resemblance to the swift brushwork of the sculptor's friend, the leading Impressionist painter, Claude Monet.

Yet it is not accurate to pigeonhole Rodin as an Impressionist sculptor. True, he was excited by the play of light over the rippling surfaces of shaped masses, and in an unguarded moment he said to his Boswell, the young literateur, Paul Gsell, that the only principle in art was to copy what one saw. However, his very character would have prevented this searcher and investigator from being a counterfeiter of nature. While it would not have occurred to so deeply religious and basically humble an individual to say, as his favorite poet, Charles Baudelaire, had done, that it was an artist's first business to substitute man for nature, and to protest against her, Rodin made it a point to qualify the notion that to be an artist was to be a copyist. He told Gsell, and we might do well to bear his words in mind, or rather, in our hearts:

"Art is contemplation . . . It is the joy of the intellect which sees clearly into the Universe and which recreates it, with conscientious vision . . . Art is taste . . . It is the reflection of the artist's heart upon all the objects that he creates . . . The resemblance which he [the portraitist] ought to obtain is that of the soul; that alone matters: it is that which the sculptor or painter should seek beneath the mask of features . . . All [the beauty in art] comes from the thought, the intention which their creators believed they could see in the Universe."

Although he exhibited with Monet, Rodin himself would never have been satisfied to be only a retina, registering fleeting impressions, a mere recorder of the effects of light. With his insistence on solidly constructed forms he was closer to the Post-Impressionists than to Monet, who dissolved everything into dazzling atmospheric vibrations. Rodin could never have said, "What I strive most to achieve in art is to make you forget the material," or "Nothing is material in space." These words were uttered by a younger contemporary, Medardo Rosso, the most typical representative of Impressionism in sculpture, the one who substituted the interplay of light and shadow for the interplay of volume and outline.

Rodin is difficult to fit into a category, particularly since his work is spread over a long segment of time, the turbulent years from about 1863 to about 1915. He started out as a Realist, yet in his mature work he anticipated the emotion-fraught Expressionism of a much later date. In his beginnings he was already a revolutionary, for the official art of France under the Second Empire was dedicated to neo-Greek, or rather pseudo-Greek, ideals, to a conventionalized beauty of elegance that was exactly opposite from young Rodin's unconventionally brutal The Man with the Broken Nose. To the bureaucracy of art in France, this head of an aging man whose battered features increased the tortured expression of the face was repellent, as was The Old Courtesan, that decrepit bent nude mourning the ruin of her once fair body. It was unusual to discover beauty in the seemingly ugly, and, going further, even to insist that only that which possessed no character was ugly in art; to remind the public that the emaciated John the Baptist by Donatello, the deformed dwarf by Velasquez, and the old worn-out peasant by Millet were a thousand times more beautiful than the vacant "beauty" manufactured by the Beaux-Arts professors.

Rodin angered his more conservative contemporaries by his John the Baptist: instead of the immobility, the deathlike repose of most Nineteenth Century sculpture, here was shown the art of walking, a majestic movement which, decried as "illegitimate" by French critics, would have delighted an unrestrained genius like Michelangelo. It took the world years to get used to Rodin's unorthodoxy—witness the outcry against the Burghers of Calais, a sculpture commemorating six citizens who had offered their lives to the King of England to save their besieged city from destruction. The initial comments ranged from "too sordid" to "not heroic enough," because Rodin had dared to portray these six in their different states of mind, from defiance to disillusionment, each convincingly performing his part as to character and situation.

A critic selecting the most outstanding of Rodin's works may think of the Burghers—and reject it. For while each figure is superbly conceived, the group itself seems to lack cohesiveness and unity. But it was the aesthetic merits rather than the faults that caused the controversy, and a six-year battle prior to its installation in the Place de la Poste at Calais.

Unfortunately, the sculptor did not live to see the public unveiling of what I believe to be his most original, most powerful work, the Balzac. Rodin, however impetuous, was always careful and patient when planning and executing a work, and he spent seven years on the Balzac before the final version was shown in the Salon. It was greeted with indignation. The Societe des Gens, which had commissioned the work, refused to accept it, and the task of making a new statue was given to another man, a now long forgotten academician. It was not before 1939—forty years later and fully twenty-two years after his death—that Paris was ready for Rodin's masterwork.

But the Parisians of yore might be forgiven for not appreciating what to them appeared as a lumpy heavy mass, topped by an ungainly head. It required a poet to understand the significance of this work, to realize how completely the sculptor had grasped the character of the novelist, as brutally unconventional as the monument itself. The poet was Rainer Maria Rilke, once the master's private secretary, who wrote about it:

> "He [Rodin] saw a mighty, striding figure that lost all its heaviness in the fall of its ample cloak. The hair bristled from the nape of the powerful neck. And backward against the thick locks leaned the face of a visionary in the intoxication of his dream, a face flashing with creative force: the face of an element. This was Balzac in the fullness of his productivity, the founder of generations, the Master of fate. This was the man whose eyes were those of a seer, whose visions would have filled the world had it been empty. This was the Balzac that Creation itself had formed to manifest itself and who was Creation's boastfulness, vanity, ecstasy and intoxication. The thrown-back head crowned the summit of this figure as lightly as a ball is upheld by the spray of a fountain. There was no sense of weight, but a magnificent vitality in the free, strong head."

Rodin was nearly sixty before his years of poverty and struggle ended, and along with the financial rewards came numerous distinctions, including the red ribbon of the Legion of Honor, and the doctorate honoris causa given him by Oxford University. He traveled widely: to Italy (where he discovered for himself the greatness of Donatello and Michelangelo), to Belgium, to England (where he made a portrait of George Bernard Shaw who, he said, had the true head of Christ), and to Prague where he had a one-man show. He read little, yet was fond of Baudelaire. He loved music, especially Gluck. In the field of art, he was unusually perceptive; he owned a work of the still unrecognized Van Gogh, and was one of the first to re-discover El Greco, who had long been forgotten. Rodin, deeply impressed by the grandeur of the French cathedrals, wrote a book about them. But all of these interests, all of his participation in social life, even his numerous love affairs were subsidiary to his chief passion—the fire of creativity that consumed him until the last day of his long, rich life.

Propaganda in the Press

Dear Sirs:

James A. Wechsler's "Propaganda in the Press' and the editorial, "Managing the News," both in your August issue, constitute a powerful indictment of the sordid conduct of much of our press. Facts of this kind lead one to wonder if our so-called free press serves the people much more effectively than does the controlled press of the totalitarian countries.

In the dictator lands the reader knows he is reading government inspired and slanted news items. But most readers in our free country don't realize that propaganda, bought and paid for in the market place, is often presented as objective news. Senator Fulbright is to be congratulated for opening a window on these shabby practices of the press, and The Progressive deserves our thanks for presenting the facts to the attention of its readers.

JOSEPH BRINKMAN
Haverford, Pennsylvania

Dear Sirs:

James Wechsler's piece, "Propaganda in the Press," and the quotation in T. J. Barnum's letter in The People's Forum (both in the August Progressive), prompt me to ask: What is the difference between a captive press doing the bidding of its authoritarian masters, and so-called "free" press willingly licking the boots of the Establishment? The significant point to be made is that, in either case, the aim of the power elite is achieved: a thoroughly brainwashed public.

THOMAS BRODERICK
Schenectady, New York

Dear Sirs:

I have read with considerable interest James Wechsler's article in your August issue entitled "Propaganda in the Press."

I am the editor of a weekly newspaper, perhaps one of that breed Mr. Wechsler refers to as "harassed . . . on some remote prairie." But let me assure you that there are many editors of weekly newspapers within my circle of acquaintanceship who resent this charge of "rubeism" leveled by Mr. Wechsler.

Believe me when I say that even west of the Hudson River there are editors who read and think and arrive at independent conclusions. We read The Progressive, The New Yorker, The New York Times, The Bulletin of the Freedom of Information Center of the University of Missouri, and even The National Review.

We do not accept, from the hundreds of news releases we must winnow through every week, such information as Mr. Taylor's that Mr. Wechsler accuses us of ingesting "to exhibit . . . erudition and . . . lack of provincialism."

We agree with Mr. Wechsler that the role played by International News Service in playing flack for Trujillo was a dastardly performance and a blot on the record of honest newspapering. But to single out an isolated instance of such a departure from ethical conduct and castigate the entire press in one blast from Mr. Wechsler's scattergun is equally sordid.

The weekly press generally has accepted its responsibility in reporting the local news accurately and in commenting candidly on affairs of the day. The few editors who do not are held in as great scorn by other weekly editors as by Mr. Wechsler.

We do not believe that we are unique in taking issue with Mr. Wechsler's snide comments in regard to "the American Iron and Steel Institute, or Barry Goldwater, and to the cause of the private utilities and other cornerstones of the American Way," and only ask if they are not entitled to the same treatment by the weekly press as that afforded COPE, or Hubert Humphrey, and the numerous committees (Migratory Workers, Free Angola, among others) that obviously have full access to the mailing list of The Progressive.

May I say that I have enjoyed the provocative stimulus provided by your publication. It was sent to me as a gift subscription by one of our subscribers last year. To reciprocate, I sent him a year's subscription to Nation's Business.

Such on Birth Control

Dear Sirs:

In all my many years of reading The Progressive, I have never read a more useless, snobbish, unnecessary article than "The Explosion Kick" by Theophrastus Such in the August issue.

Theo assumes snobbishly that only the rich are interested in the control of population because too many of the "wrong kind" of people are being born. There is an increasing number of persons and organizations vitally concerned with the population explosion.

Many of us do not feel that the problem merely centers about how to feed an increasing number of persons. We are concerned with the quality of life, its livability, and its purpose. Life deserves to be lived in more than a Chinese sampan.

We are not "terrified at sharing our glut" with others. We are concerned with our crowded cities, our growing slums, our suburbs which are destroying open spaces; the increasing numbers at our overcrowded parks; the pollution of our rivers and our decreasing water supply. Experts tell us that an increasing population is causing the alarming decline of some of the great African wildlife. Transportation and schools are all suffering from the population explosion. It is not a matter of "glut," it is a matter of space and philosophy.

Theo mentions the article on the Women's Strike for Peace in the Reader's Digest. He could have mentioned, in a less snobbish way, that the article first appeared in Harper's—or is he "trying to manage the news"? I thought it one of the best articles I have ever read anywhere, anytime.

Theo should be made aware that those of us concerned with the population bomb are also concerned with the nuclear bomb, with civil rights, with civil liberties, with conservation, with separation of church and state, with better schools, and with the freedom from hunger campaign.

Theophrastus Such should have used his space to concern himself with the attitude of the Roman Catholic Church and its attempt to sabotage birth control in Illinois and discussion of it in the United Nations. I would even urge him to read the first paragraph in Gabriel Gersh's article on "Italy's Haunted South" in the same issue of The Progressive. He might learn something. We could also send him some books on the issue.

Dear Sirs:

Theophrastus Such certainly struck a sour note in the August issue with his "The Explosion Kick." To tie poor struggling women in with Vassar girls is a form of lower-class whining, and Theophrastus Such does himself harm by relegating himself to that mental level.

JOSEPH S. THOMPSON

Dear Sirs:

I don't know who Theophrastus Such is, and for the purpose of this letter, it really doesn't make much difference. What is really significant is the amount of information and concrete facts he manages to convey in such a limited space. I refer particularly to his article entitled "The Explosion Kick" in the August issue. It answers stacks of mail many of us are receiving about the population explosion and does so eloquently.

There are many exceptionally good articles in the August Progressive. Once I started reading it, I could not put it down.

Praise for Margaret Long

Dear Sirs:

Your good magazine has done it again, this time the useful and superb writing in Margaret Long's article, "All God's Chillun" (August issue)—one more way to say that it's not the skin but what's inside: the mind, the heart, the backbone, the steering gear that counts in all of us.

An accolade to you and to Margaret Long.

Dear Sirs:

Margaret Long's "All God's Chillun" is just about the finest essay on race relations I have seen in my wide reading on the subject.

Give us more of Margaret Long. Her "All God's Chillun" was a minor masterpiece—and not very minor at that.

'Birch Putsch Plans'

Dear Sirs:

Perhaps you have already discovered, perhaps not.

We've been "had."

On Page 47 of the June issue of The Progressive is an advertisement that boldly states:

> "From the inner councils of the John Birch Society comes this exclusive story, revealing secret and public plans for Birch Putsch Plans for 1964 . . . Only $1.00 . . . from one of Robert Welch's former associates . . ."

I bought a copy and I can assure you that it isn't so. The book is simply a rehash of what others have already written on the radical Right plus some irrelevant conclusions. As I read this overpriced document, I was reminded of the "scholarly" reports of the House Committee on Un-American Activities, and of a silly little Rightist pamphlet called "Keynes at Harvard." The same waste of time—only the names have been changed to hook the reader.

J. TED DAVIS
Los Angeles, California

Dear Sirs:

Erich Fromm in May Man Prevail? has raised a warning about the possibility of mass paranoia in both the Soviet and Western societies as a result of cold war pressures. I am also concerned with indications of this "paranoia" emanating from the so-called Right-wing political groups in our country, and agree with your editorial statement in the June issue that we need to "counterattack with constant and extensive exposure of their preposterous tales and demands." However, perhaps before we launch the counterattack it may be wise to remove the beam from our own eyes.

I note with dismay an advertisement, on Page 47, of the same issue, offering for sale an expose of "Birch Putsch Plans for 1964." This to me is a serious charge and one that should be carefully investigated before publication. Certainly the publisher is in part responsible for the advertising content of his journal. If this "expose" is a responsible one, it warrants editorial comment; if it is irresponsible, there should be no room in your journal for it.

Favors Testing

Dear Sirs:

While I cannot speak with authority concerning the dangers of "fallout" from the testing of nuclear bombs, yet philosophically and pragmatically I cannot help feeling that these experiments will prove, in the long run, of inestimable value to the human race. The more knowledge we have of the universe in which we live, and its complex chemical composition, the better qualified will man be to solve the problem of his existence.

When dynamite was discovered, it was feared that man would "blow himself off the earth." When Benjamin Franklin invented the lightning rod, many religious people refused to make use of it; they said it was "defying the Prince of power of the air"—the devil. When the Wright brothers invented the airplane it was denounced as a wicked contraption; many said, "it was flying into the face of God."

As these discoveries and inventions, though menacing at times, proved a boon to mankind, so I believe the testing of the atom, to determine its vast potentiality and uses, will eventually prove of benefit to the human race far beyond our present day comprehension.

There should be no restrictions, no matter how dire the consequences. There should be no fear, no matter how dangerous the task, to hamper man in his search for knowledge that will help him discover the secret of life, help him solve the conditions under which he lives, and help him unravel the mystery of the existence of the universe.

The ILGWU Struggle

Dear Sirs:

It seems strange to me that a magazine like yours which has written often on legal and civil rights cases, and the democratic struggles within the labor movement, has given no space to the important struggle now taking place within the International Ladies Garment Workers Union. This is clearly a struggle on the part of the ILGWU staff workers for their legal and civil rights and just as clearly a struggle to bring democracy into David Dubinsky's workshop.

Dave Sanders, in his "Labor Finds Its Place" (Contemporary Issues, June-July, 1963) correctly comments that Dubinsky's campaign against the Federation of Union Representatives (FOUR) has been disgraceful. Sanders writes, "It is not for economic but for organizational reasons that such leaderships as that of the ILGWU and the Textile Workers have fought unionization of the staffs. Dubinsky, whose campaign of firings and intimidation against the Federation of Union Representatives has been so disgraceful as to bring a finding of unfair labor practices by the NLRB, has had the chutzpah [gall] to advance, as an argument against staff organization, that the Garment Workers Union is not a business but a " 'mission'—headed by a $28,000-a-year missionary."

The union leadership is continuously talking about organizing the unorganized (a part of which involves organizing other non-profit "missionary" workers, such as teachers, doctors, nurses, social service workers, etc.). Just how the labor movement intends to organize these workers and face the spectacle of the leadership of a reputed union (ILGWU) developing the legal and philosophical arguments necessary in the attempt to defeat FOUR in a court battle is more than one can fathom. To date, the ILGWU leadership has filed a petition in the Court of Appeals asking for a review of the NLRB order to bargain collectively with FOUR, and a cross-petition has been filed by the Board for enforcement of its order.

Indian-American Library

Dear Sirs:

I am a young man who is the founder and operator of an American library here designed to promote goodwill and mutual understanding between the United States and India. Americans are sending their used magazines and books to us but the receipt of periodicals is less than the increasing demand.

I am employed in one of the government offices at this station and give eight hours to my office daily and four hours to my library work. My office mates and family members assist me. I have 400 readers.

An unknown American gave us a subscription to The Progressive. What I hope is to make our library more popular. We want to expand our program to the whole of India, with the help of Americans. We want to establish reading rooms. I want to make this work my life career. I hope that readers of The Progressive will find it possible to send us their used books and magazines so that we can continue to expand our program.

The Progressive in Japan

Dear Sirs:

For nearly two years and a half, we graduate students of the American Studies Department, Tokyo University, have been using The Progressive for our class reading and discussion. Your magazine has always been a great help to our study of contemporary America. Indeed, we feel doubly indebted to you, for through reading various articles we have been able to know not only what is going on in the United States, but also how American liberals or progressives view current national as well as international issues.

In my opinion, the most distinguished feature of American democratic tradition is that the United States has had once, and now again, a group of conscientious dissenters who protested courageously against social, political, and economic injustices tacitly accepted by most of their fellow countrymen.

While I know "conformity" has been a general tendency of the postwar American society, reading The Progressive has assured me that the spirit of dissent has not yet died away among you and many of the contributors to your magazine. Your efforts to call public attention to today's vital questions, and to present them in a proper light, have been really great, even through a foreigner's eyes.

Since the end of World War II, the role to be played by American progressives has become more important than in any preceding era. Unlike the progressives before the war, who were allowed to devote their energies mainly to domestic reform, they are required, first of all, to lead a world-wide movement—for now the United States shares, with the Soviet Union, most of the responsibility for keeping the world safe from an all-destructive nuclear war. In this connection, I thank Sidney Lens' brilliant essay in the February, 1962, issue for dispelling the widely-cherished illusion that by building shelters the American people can hope to survive a nuclear war.

Because of its far-reaching effect, any war between big powers with nuclear weapons would endanger the lives of hundreds of millions in other countries quite unwilling to be involved in the quarrel. So it is rather shocking for me to find that despite all their responsibility for world peace, most Americans seem to think of the recent Cuban blockade simply as "a major diplomatic success" of the Kennedy Administration.

I wish that The Progressive were read by more and more Americans.

Comment from India

Dear Sirs:

I am deeply obligated to you for the copies of your great and bold magazine, which I have received for a number of years. I and my friends on the staff of Ambala Tribune believe there is no other publication like it—so fearless and so forthright.

It has taught us many lessons in liberalism and made us shed our fears. It has given us a new angle on the United States—that of the New Frontier (long before John Kennedy assumed office). We are grateful to you.

BOOKS

Intellectuals and American Life

by WILLIAM R. TAYLOR

THIS big, important book, although it has already attained an unusual critical notoriety for an historical work of such analytic density, seems destined to move with regrettable speed from a brief moment of public attention to the obscurity of library shelves and college reading lists, a profoundly ironic turn in view of the author's intention. It has been widely reviewed, mostly by professional historians and mostly unfavorably, yet it has kicked up no lively controversy and aroused few defenders. So far at least, it has been the occasion for more jeux d'esprit than serious critical examinations.

In addressing himself, in the way that he does here, to the enlightened self-consciousness of his contemporaries on such an emotionally loaded topic, Richard Hofstadter has risked the hazards that lurk wherever stock responses are invited. It is a risk he has taken before. He has never felt himself bound as an historian by the conventions which characterize most of the American history being written today. He has consistently resisted the role of the expert who steeps himself in the primary sources of a particular subject or period and then speaks to his professional colleagues in documented articles and monographs, nor has he attempted to write a general history of any particular phase of American development.

All of his books—his study of social Darwinism, his well-known American Political Tradition and his Age of Reform—have ranged widely across contentional subject and period barriers, and have been cast in the form of historical essays, freely interpretive, and almost personal in their point of view. All of these books, furthermore, have made extensive use of the work of other historians, upon whom he has drawn for factual data, interpretive insights, and critical comments on his own writing. Finally, all of his books have been either explicitly or implicitly topical, and have taken their departure from some present social or political concern. In this sense, his historical writing has been instrumental in character, and he has been consistently preoccupied with excavating a "usable past."

It would have been surprising if Anti-Intellectualism in American Life were an exception. It is not. On the contrary, most of these characteristics of his quite personal historical "style" have here been carried to the limit. In his quest to provide historical roots for his assessment of American attitudes toward the life of the mind he has ranged back and forth over the course of American history from the period of settlement to the very recent past, and the scope of his investigation has touched on every major aspect of American culture: religious life, politics and reform, business, science and technology and education.

Similarly, Hofstadter has turned his glass on all phases of the social spectrum, from the gentleman to the farmer, labor leader, and radical intellectual. Anti-intellectualism as a theme is much broader and much more explicitly topical than any other subject he has previously tackled. The book, we are told at the outset, "was conceived in response to the political and intellectual conditions of the 1950's." More specifically, it was the virulent anti-intellectualism of the late Senator Joseph R. McCarthy and the low intellectual tone of the Eisenhower-Nixon campaign in 1952 which induced him to undertake the present study.

The result of this long and arduous process is a courageous and honest book, the effort of an historian to come to terms with the pressures playing over the intellectual life of his own generation and to cast them into historical perspective. In the course of doing so he raises almost inadvertently a number of interesting questions, questions about our contemporary culture, the present dilemma of liberalism and, by implication at least, the state of historical studies in America. What on the surface appear to be palpable faults—and Hofstadter anticipates us in the recognition of them—turn out to be rather singular virtues. This is a "personal book" rather than a "formal history," and in its organization it often seems "impulsive" and it is certainly "fragmentary." Nonetheless, the note of candor and tentativeness with which the book opens is sustained more or less throughout, and there is very little of the glib self-assurance and sophisticated smugness which has sometimes marred his work in the past.

Early in the book Hofstadter comments that "American intellectuals have a lamentably thin sense of the past," and it has been his purpose, one gathers, to show the complicated set of circumstances that prepared the way for the outburst of McCarthyism in the early Fifties. He conceives of anti-intellectualism, furthermore, in terms sufficiently broad to include far more than the highly publicized attacks on professors, radicals, and esthetes.

For him anti-intellectualism is the more general malaise which produces "a resentment and suspicion of the life of the mind and of those who are considered to represent it; and a disposition to minimize the value of that life." At the root of this resentment is a growing estrangement between those men whose pursuits are predominantly intellectual and the population at large, a process which can be traced, he feels, from at least the early Nineteenth Century. The disappearance of an educated ministry, of the cultivated gentleman from politics, and of the cultivated merchant from business life, and their replacement by the fundamentalist, the democratic politician, and the Babbitts had the effect of removing men of intellect from places of power and influence to the periphery of society and to quiet backwaters where their criticism of society was both ineffective and irresponsible.

From the end of the century to the present, Hofstadter sees two strains of intellectuality assuming increasing prominence in American life. The first of these strains was made up of men of more and more highly specialized training, lawyers, technicians, experts of all kinds, men of intellect rather than intellectuals but nonetheless the objects of considerable suspicion and discomfort on the part of those older, rurally-oriented Americans who saw them as aliens, felt their growing influence, and more or less grudgingly made use of their services or sought their advice.

The second strain is represented by a fairly coherent intellectual class which Hofstadter sees developing after the 1890's, artists, free-lance social critics, professors, and others—"ideologues" is the name he gives them—uncontaminated with the responsibilities of power. These intellectuals, through their association with areas of speculation with little practical bearing, their seemingly unpatriotic criticism of American institutions, and their long affiliation with the political left, contributed generously to the composite popular image of the intellectual life: fear of the expert for his power and influence and fear of the "ideologue" for his flaunting of conventional pieties, for his devotion, in other words, to Bohemia and to revolution, have produced the cyclical recurrence of anti-intellectual pogroms since the Progressive era.

The intention behind this line of reasoning has been to make the events associated with McCarthyism appear less flukish and hence less alarming by showing that they had a history and were prompted by popular revulsion to the intellectual Marxism of the Thirties and the "Brain Trust" of the New Deal. It would be a mistake, however, to assume that Hofstadter set out to write a message of reassurance for American intellectuals. His principal objective, which is most apparent in his concluding pages, has been to alert them to the perils of living in an intellectual world divided between alienated intellectual critics and mental technicians or servants of power, a polarization of intellectual functions which he sees as deeply unhealthy, and, he seems to suggest, dangerous as well.

It is at this point that Hofstadter's argument touches a sensitive nerve in the contemporary debate over the obligations of American liberals, and it is characteristic of him that he has refused to align himself with either of the opposing camps: the so-called "new realists" like Arthur Schlesinger, Jr., who insist that liberalism can flourish only amid the sobering responsibilities of power and decision-making, and the "utopians," as their opponents have taken to calling them, who believe that the vital function of the liberal is to subject the establishment to a steady barrage of criticism and that this critical posture can be preserved only by keeping the intellectual uncommitted. For Hofstadter the solution to this dilemma lies in a sense of intellectual community sufficiently open and pluralistic to allow for a variety of intellectual styles and a continuous exchange of experience and points of view.

It seems to me possible, and I would guess probable, that a great many readers may find Hofstadter's analysis of America's contemporary cultural predicament unexceptionable (though they may, as I do, find his prescription somewhat quixotic), while finding certain parts of his history neither convincing nor even particularly relevant. In the first place, it seems impossible during large parts of our history to distinguish between a resentment of intellectuality, high culture, and rationality and a resentment of those classes that appeared to have monopolized them. Social antagonisms and aspirations, rather than a hostility to learning as such, seem to underlie much of the abuse visited upon the kind of education represented by the upper classes, and it is interesting to note that many of these critics of learning, as soon as they were able, duplicated insofar as they could the kind of learning they had repudiated a few years before. Also, there is a continual temptation in intellectual analyses of this kind to overlook concrete political circumstances, as when the Presidential race between Andrew Jackson and John Quincy Adams is viewed as a popularity contest between democracy and intuition on one side and aristocracy and sterile intellect on the other.

Furthermore, there seems to be some confusion between those agencies of culture which actually produced anti-intellectualism and those which simply appealed to and exploited already existing sentiments. It is difficult to believe that either Billy Sunday or Norman Vincent Peale actually instilled the sentiments which subsequently enriched them, and it therefore seems odd that their utterances should be considered on a par with the theories of common school education which presumably conditioned their clientele.

Finally, in a book that concerns itself to the extent that this one does with the heritage of anti-intellectualism for our own time, it might have been useful to explore a little further the pressures exerted on our intellectual yeomen by their employers and benefactors, the universities for which they work, the foundations that contract to free them for their most creative labors, and the publishers for whom they write. The quality of our intellectual life tomorrow, and more specifically the quality of our history, is to be powerfully influenced, one would suppose, by these relatively new and, so far, elusive forces in our culture.

Myth and Reality

How the Far East Was Lost, by Anthony Kubek. Henry Regnery. 480 pp. $8.75.

America's Failure in China, 1941-50, by Tang Tsou. University of Chicago Press. 614 pp. $12.50.

A Man Must Choose, by Eric Chou. Alfred Knopf. 302 pp. $5.

Reviewed by
William L. Neumann

To cry for the moon, to want to eat only candy and ice cream, and to persist in major shopping expeditions despite an empty purse are obvious signs of immaturity. What diagnosis can be offered for similar attitudes expressed in American viewpoints about Asia? Are the reversals in Asia which these aspirations finally faced the creation of a Communist conspiracy, hatched in the offices of the State Department, Johns Hopkins University, and the Institute of Pacific Relations? Or must these attitudes be understood in terms of the American past and the realities they encountered seen as part of Chinese history?

Anthony Kubek, described as having had the scholarly training for a doctorate in history, has written (How the Far East Was Lost) what will be the classic example of the child's view of Asian-American relations. He assumes that any and all goals were achievable by the United States. Kubek begins his fantasy with the charge that as a result of Lend-Lease, "Roosevelt, not Stalin, shaped the growth of modern Russia." The rest of the book is primarily devoted to the thesis that Stalin, not Roosevelt nor Truman, shaped modern American foreign policy. The final chapter, devoted to proving that there can be no real break between Moscow and Peking, reads like a Sixteenth Century denial of a Protestant-Catholic division, impossible because both groups draw for doctrine on the same Biblical writings.

Tang Tsou's volume (America's Failure in China, 1941-50), despite the similarity in subject matter, has almost nothing in common with the Kubek book except agreement that American Far Eastern policy ended in a fiasco. The implication of Kubek's title is explicitly rejected; "no one can lose something which he has never possessed." The question which Tang Tsou explores in great detail is why Americans persisted in believing otherwise and in trying to achieve the unachievable.

Beginning with the issuance of the Open Door notes in 1899 and 1900, the United States aspired to control the course of Chinese foreign relations. But the implementation of these aspirations was to be purely verbal. Even when American protest notes went unheeded, "a nestful of tenacious myths" was built to encourage the belief that words were enough. As early as the 1920's a foolish Senator could claim without contradiction that Secretary of State John Hay had only waved his hand and thereby stopped European plans for the partition of China.

Prior to 1941 most Americans believed that China was not worth the sacrifice of one American life. After a costly war Americans believed that even if their interests in China were worth a great deal, they could be secured without military sacrifice on their part. Not even the most extreme of the pro-Chiang Americans, such as former Representative Walter Judd, one of the heroes of Kubek's account, were willing to advocate the use of American troops to keep Chiang in power on the mainland. It was only the denial of "proper aid" and "moral support," in Kubek's words, which helped to bring about Chiang's fall.

In a lengthy and thorough analysis of American statements and writing about China in the postwar period, Tang Tsou finds this traditional optimism pervading the writings of such naive individuals as the late Ambassador Patrick Hurley as well as the more sophisticated and sometimes suspect writings of the Institute of Pacific Relations specialists. He does not devote himself to the difficult task of differentiating the fellow travelers and crypto-Communists from those who saw the strength of Chinese Communism without the help of ideologically tinted glasses. He does argue, however, that the relative unimportance of ideology in American politics made it easy to dismiss, from an American viewpoint, the role which a few feared ideology would play in shaping Chinese Communist foreign policy. (Since the 1950's Americans seem to have overcompensated in this respect, so that every Communist move must now be explained by directives from Marx or Lenin.)

Finally, Tang Tsou insists that more than any other single person, Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek was responsible for what happened in China, "for responsibility goes with power." Although it is this thesis which has enabled the defenders of Truman and Acheson to avoid examining more critically the shortcomings of American thought, so well analyzed by Tsou, it may well be the soundest judgment when Chinese history is viewed in a longer perspective.

If there are those who believe that the People's Republic of China has escaped the characteristic marks of totalitarianism, Eric Chou's book, A Man Must Choose, offers devastating proof to the contrary. Readers familiar with Arthur Koestler's Darkness at Noon will find some interesting parallels between Stalinist Russia and Mao's China in this account of the "re-education" of a pleasure-loving, bourgeois Chinese newspaperman. Missing, however, is the Stalinist assumption that political heretics are lost forever and must therefore be liquidated. Chou's captors had such faith in their ideology and its power to redeem that they returned him, after lengthy brain-washing, to his old post in Hong Kong from which he fled to Britain. He tells us little about life inside China, but a good deal about the mentality of the brain-washers.

WILLARD UPHAUS' book, Commitment, is a work of the spirit. It is warm, sensitive, penetrating, and inspiring. It is not only an engaging account of an unusual trail which led from an Indiana farm to a New Hampshire jail, but a stirring autobiography (written for the most part in jail) of an unusual human being who chose imprisonment rather than violate his conscience. It involves not only a telling reminder of the horrors of war and other human indignities, but a passionate testimony in behalf of peace and the dignity of man. It represents not only a frightening recounting of the hysterical witch-hunting of the McCarthy era but an earnest call for a rededication to civil liberties and human freedom. It depicts the author's quest for and commitment to authentic existence. It is a witness for human integrity.

A simple but devout Christian background, together with early liberal influences, had much to do with shaping Uphaus' humanitarian concerns. His Christian family tradition imparted to him a faith which flowed into a sense of "moral uprightness," a regard for human brotherhood, and a view of men as "living souls." At Earlham College this faith was nourished and cultivated by his acquaintance with the Quaker notion of the Inner Light—the view that there is a little part of God in every man.

Uphaus' encounter with the writings of Emerson and Thoreau had a lasting impression on him: from these men he gained increasing respect for individuality and learned "the great lesson of the Declaration of Independence," that authorities must be resisted when their demands require the violation of individual conscience. As a delegate to the World Student Christian Movement in 1912, he came under the influence of a group of "towering international-minded Christians." This broadening experience put an end to his native provincialism and marked the beginning of an involved concern for the whole world. "Above all nations —humanity" (the theme of his first international conference) became for him the pervasive theme of his existence.

Resolute commitments grew out of Uphaus' expanding sensitivities. At Yale, he helped to effect a change in the administration's policy of racial segregation in dormitories. Months later he taught religious education at Hampton Institute, a college for Negroes in Hampton, Virginia, and soon after at the YMCA graduate school in Nashville, Tennessee. After an abortive attempt to establish a new department of religion at Hastings College, where his theological liberalism and "social action" conception of religion raised eyebrows and forced his resignation, he became executive secretary of the newly-formed Religion and Labor Foundation, to which he gave seventeen dedicated years of his life.

The Foundation had as its primary purpose the task of bringing together representatives of religion and labor and coordinating their attempts to alleviate the suffering and needs of the unemployed during the Depression. As Willard Uphaus worked strenuously in this common effort to further social justice, he increasingly saw the need for "a new order based on Christian social ideals" and realized that the necessary starting-point for significant progress was peace. This realization induced him to assume a leading role in the 1950 Mid-Century Peace Conference in Chicago and to accept an invitation to the Second World Peace Congress scheduled in Sheffield, England. Scotland Yard's on-the-spot denial of entry into Britain of one-half of his fellow delegates forced a transfer of the Congress to Warsaw, Poland, where Uphaus was invited to make one of the two American addresses and to take a ten-day tour of the Soviet Union. His participation in these events, premised on the conviction that peace and other problems of men transcend political ideological alignments, led to his dismissal from the Religion and Labor Foundation.

The end of Uphaus' association with the Foundation was soon followed by the opportunity to take over the leadership of World Fellowship Center in New Hampshire. Uphaus saw World Fellowship as an answer to our age's fundamental need for world unity and world consciousness.

The rest, and most frustrating part, of the Uphaus story is scarcely credible to anyone not acquainted with the McCarthy era. The state of New Hampshire took to Red-hunting and surmised that World Fellowship would be happy hunting grounds. Uphaus was asked to produce guest lists of those who had attended his Fellowship. He refused on legal, moral, religious, and human grounds. A six-year conflict ensued between an ambitious state attorney-general and a fervent humanitarian, between "the conscience of a human being and what was felt to be an unjust demand of a state authority." For Willard Uphaus, the contest culminated in a one-year's confinement to the Boscawen jail, but not in a loss of individual authenticity or altruistic concern.

For all who, with Thoreau, believe that "we should be men first and subjects afterward," let the Uphaus imprisonment serve as a reminder that the struggle for human liberties is not just a platitude but a reality. Willard Uphaus' commitment to his convictions is a tribute to human decency.

NIGHT AND SILENCE. WHO IS HERE?, by Pamela Hansford Johnson. Scribner's. 247 pp. $4.50.

Reviewed by

Steve Marinakis

IN Night and Silence. Who Is Here? Pamela Hansford Johnson successfully invades the territory left vacant by the death of Rose Macauley. The hero of her new novel is an English bachelor, Matthew Pryar, in the United States on a visiting fellowship at a New Hampshire college. Fifty-one, looking thirty-eight, with nothing to show for his years but a few monographs in British literary quarterlies and an essay in "Botteghe Oscure," he has decided to leave his mark on the world by writing the definitive work on the poet, Dorothy Merlin, entitled "Dorothy Merlin: Tentative Steps Towards a Synthesis of Imagery."

His next door neighbor at the Center for Advanced Studies is a Dickinsonian scholar, insanely trying to prove that the New England poetess was a hopeless alcoholic ("Thunder in the room" obviously describes poor Emily's bursting head when suffering from a hangover). Other characters are Carlo Tiepolo, the sociologist, who knows in just which filing cabinet the Slavonic expert, Miss Groby, conceals her six half-empty, but always replenished, bottles of Scotch; the zoologist, Hefflinger, the reincarnation of Bela Lugosi, whose pets, long-legged hairy araneae, find their way into grand pianos, and provide a hell for the mediaevalist, Miss Corall; the mathematician, Wohlgemutt, stolid, humorless, who approves of the dismal situation at Cobb College, "the third richest college per capita in the United States," with its puritanical thoroughness in ensuring that everybody has a dull time in the richest country in the world.

The plot centers on this very lack of the social amenities, and of how Pryar, lost among the redskins, becomes filled with ambition and a sudden lust for power; he begins to see himself as the worthy successor of old Dr. Parke, age fifty-seven, the chairman of the Center for Advanced Studies, who is about to retire. The first step, Pryar decides, will be the construction of an inn that will remain open past 7 p.m. and on weekends, so that strangers arriving on Friday evening will not have to wait forty-eight hours, as he had done, for a bite of food. Naturally, he fails, having little understanding of New England masochism when comfort is involved, but is consoled by an American heiress, a Lady Bountiful, whose cool, expert handling of every trying situation provides a trusty bulwark against the innocent bungling of the American academic world.

Miss Johnson presents this gallery of American portraits with good humor and the painter's critical eye for human frailties; her wit is sharp and astringent, but never cruel. She is a craftsman of the first order, possessing that prime attribute of the novelist without which all others are worthless: She makes one want to turn the page. Her clear satiric eye, her relish for character, her understanding of the complexities of human relationships, her clever dialogue (though occasionally an American character lapses into the English idiom), her style, all work to make this novel an excellent comedy of present day America.

Dear Mr. Via:

Enjoyed chatting with you yesterday when you called to discuss recent trends and developments in the area of bigotry. I hope that you were able to gain some helpful perspectives.

Attached are copies of the ADL Bulletin for all of 1963 and selected issues of the "Facts" on Schwarz, Hargis, the John Birch Society, the Ku Klux Klans and the 1960 election campaign. These may well fill you in further.

I am sending copies of this to Alex Miller to let him know about your kind remarks about past cooperation, and to Saul Sorrin in our Wisconsin Office. I trust that you will be in touch with Sorrin for future liaison which may be mutually helpful.

With kindest regards, I am

Emory, Do we know what that is? Jim

November 14, 1963

Dear Fellow Unionist:

Labor appears quite preoccupied in fighting the radical Right. Mountains of literature have appeared, some rallies have been held, an excellent service, Group Research, has been formed, and the Right Wing menace creeps into just about every labor speech given these days.

There are a number of good reasons for labor's concern. Certainly, hate groups are out to destroy unions and they have destroyed both existing unions and organizing drives. Too, we don't like being put into the same bed with the Communists by the Rightists and we are enraged by their questioning of our loyalty to America. They can block progressive social legislation; they can pass restrictive labor laws; and if they become more powerful, they could push us into a world war.

But what are we doing about all this? With Group Research, COPE, and the labor press we certainly are equipped with facts about the Right, but what have we done to perfect techniques in combatting the Rightists?

This has been brought home to me by thoughtfully critical persons attending education sessions on the subject. What are we for? What are our goals? What can concerned people do? What are others doing? Can we spell out specific ways of launching education and action programs?

Unless we give unionists some plan of concrete action, it seems to me we are only wasting words.

This explains the enclosed "Speak Up for Democracy" leaflet and the coupon. The URW Education Department hopes to begin an information exchange on what labor and other groups are doing to fight for our democratic liberties.

I want to ask you to do two things: (1) Fill out the enclosed coupon to be put on our mailing list; and (2) Send us information on techniques you have employed to fight extremism and/or to fight for the extension of human rights and liberties.

Yours in the battle for extending American liberties!

An Arsenal Of Facts

DANGER ON THE RIGHT. By Arnold Forster and Benjamin R. Epstein. 280 pp. New York: Random House. $4.95.

By ALAN F. WESTIN

ONE evening during the late spring of 1962, as part of my research for an article on corporate connections with the radical right, I attended a public meeting in New Jersey at which Dr. Fred Schwarz of the Christian Anti-Communism Crusade was the featured speaker. The hall was filled with a predominantly enthusiastic crowd. As I entered, I noticed someone who looked quite familiar methodically picking up the literature that was being distributed at a table outside the auditorium.

Later, I found myself sitting only one row away from this same man, who was carefully taking notes during Schwarz's main presentation and the lively question period that followed. It bothered me that I knew the man but couldn't bring his name and identity to mind. Then the light flashed, and I felt doubly foolish for not having realized at once who it was—a staff member of the Anti-Defamation League, obviously on "evening assignment" at the Schwarz rally.

"Danger on the Right," as its co-authors acknowledge in their preface, is the product of just such first-hand research by dozens of A.D.L. staff members throughout the country. More than that, it represents the collective wisdom of one of the most useful private organizations in the United States. With the publication of this book (timed so perfectly on the eve of an election in which the future influence of the radical right in America is a central issue), the A.D.L. places all of us deeply in its debt.

THIS is the most detailed, accurate and factually complete popular description of the radical right that has yet appeared—its groups, leaders, doctrines and especially its financial supporters. Because it does not rely on hard-breathing rhetoric to supply missing bricks of fact, it is not just another exposé, but an indispensable book for every American citizen who wants to know the "who, what, and how much" of the radical right.

Benjamin Epstein, the A.D.L.'s National Director, and Arnold Forster, its General Counsel, divide their portrait of the ultra-right into two sections, with a chapter for each organization and leader that they treat. The first section, "The Radical Right," has chapters on the John Birch Society of Robert Welch; the Christian Anti-Communism Crusade of Dr. Schwarz; the Christian Crusade of Rev. Billy James Hargis; the National Education Program of Dr. George Benson; the 20th-Century Reformation Hour of Rev. Carl McIntire; the Manion Forum of Dean Clarence Manion; Life Line Foundation and Dan Smoot; the Church League of America under Edgar Bundy; the Conservative Society of America under Kent and Phoebe Courtney; and the Liberty Amendment Committee of the U.S.A., led by Willis Stone. Out of an estimated 500 right-wing organizations, the book concludes that some 26-27 represent "major groups." The 10 discussed above, in the authors' view, are the most influential and lively of the radical-right component among the 26-27.

The second section, titled "The Extreme Conservatives," dissects five leading groups among the organizations that do not adopt the pure, full-strength doctrines of the radical right—but do espouse many of the same ideas, join in common rallies and causes, have overlapping directorships, and often enjoy the financial support of the same rightist "angels." This section focuses on Americans for Constitutional Action, led by Admiral (Ret.) Ben Moreell; Human Events, under James Wick; the Intercollegiate Society of Individualists; Young Americans for Freedom; and The National Review of William F. Buckley, Jr.

Methods

RADICAL Right groups do not essentially seek to create new political parties. Rather, they seek by concerted propaganda drives to change the political climate in the United States, to turn the winds slowly their way. They do so by penetrating and influencing both major political parties. And in this effort, the John Birch Society has emerged as the strongest of such organizations.—"Danger on the Right."

In each chapter, "Danger on the Right" does four things. It traces the history of the organization's formation and growth; presents representative quotations of the group's positions; describes who controls the group, and who makes up its leading directorate; and reveals the major financial support behind each group—which the authors state adds up to more than $14,000,000 being pumped yearly into the pipeline of the radical right, primarily by wealthy individuals and large corporations. All of this material is presented with literary verve and succulent quotations. It succeeds perfectly in pinning each wildly fluttering ultra-right butterfly to its proper page in the specimen book.

Already, press accounts of the facts presented in "Danger on the Right" have evoked angry denials by some of the people and groups mentioned, and threats of suits for libel. There have also been furious denunciations of the A.D.L. as a "Jewish secret service" agency, long a favorite charge of the anti-Semitic organizations that were the subjects of earlier books by Forster and Epstein.

Despite the inferences of "planted" agents and hidden tape recorders, the clear truth is that the A.D.L. presentation is based on the public record: the public speeches and published writings of the rightists themselves, newspaper reports of their meetings and memberships and financial reports required by Federal or state tax and administrative agencies and open to public inspection. The A.D.L. has been systematically collecting and filing such clippings, publications and financial records for at least three decades. When the radical right expanded in the late 1950's and early 1960's, the A.D.L. simply expanded its coverage accordingly.

THE result of this fact-finding operation is the material with which to expose the radical right through its own words, deeds and associations. The last element—associations—is perhaps the most distinctive contribution of this book. Many other writers and organizations have discussed the ideology, publications and meetings of radical-right groups. But the A.D.L. surpasses everyone else in two respects—documenting the fact that many leading radical-right figures have also been associates or supporters of well-known anti-Semitic or hate groups, or have given them financial support, and showing the connections between the radical right and the extreme conservatives.

The decision of the authors to focus almost exclusively on the speeches, writings and interconnections of the ultra-rightists, and to devote only a handful of pages to larger socio-political analysis, is in one important sense the great strength of their presentation. It lets the public judge. It shows a confidence that the civic consensus in America will recoil from the positions of these groups, that exposure represents the best policy of counter-action, the only approach consistent with the A.D.L.'s own commitment to democratic ideals.

One could still wish that the authors had not carried this policy through quite so rigorously. There has been a wealth of excellent analysis done by social scientists on who joins radical-right groups and why; there have been others on the social dynamics of ultra-right organizations. With the exception of casual references to one social-science report of this kind—and far from the best one at that—"Danger on the Right" does not use these analytical resources, or even popularize them in the authors' own words.

Warnings

RADICAL Rightists urge people to watch out lest coddling of labor unions brings the welfare state one step closer. . . . They shout to beware of social security as a large step forward to socializing the Republic. They signal an alarm that the income tax is simply a means of pauperizing the rich in favor of the poor in order to communize the United States. They admonish in urgent voice for all to believe that the United Nations is a weapon the enemy is using to destroy American sovereignty. — "Danger on the Right."

In addition, there is not as careful and complete an analysis as one would like of the borderline between radical right and extreme conservative. In describing the fact of interconnections, the book does superbly. It is completely sound in saying that when "hard" conservatives do not police their own border against infiltration, they deserve to be judged harshly for any blending of causes that results. But some of the statements on extreme conservatives being "soft on the radical right" have a troubling ring to them, one that could have been avoided with more attention to systematic analysis.

The vacuum is all the more evident when one considers the excellent studies the A.D.L has itself produced—or drawn on from special articles in their publications on discrimination and prejudice. Presented in the same lively fashion, such analyses are both valuable and necessary for the general reader. However, the basic value of the book remains, despite this lack.

Here is an arsenal of facts for harassed civic leaders in communities throughout the nation. Next time the Birch Society begins to bully a school board, or Americans for Constitutional Action condemn a congressional incumbent for his "pro-Communist" voting record, or a major national corporation begins to saturate the communities around its plants with National Education Program films on "Americanism," "Danger on the Right" will provide community leaders with the ammunition to fight back, through exposure of what these groups really believe, say, and do.

A copy of the book belongs on the shelf of every person who is active in the civic life of the nation, just as a manual on poisons belongs in the medicine chest.

Squeakers Prove One Vote Counts

It's been proved as often as it's been said: One vote counts!

While everyone's eyes were on President Johnson's landslide election as results poured in November 3, scores of races—for the U.S. House, U.S. Senate and governor's seats—were being decided by a relative handful of votes.

In 63 contests, the winner emerged with 52 percent or less of the total vote. In all, 495 contests were held, so it works out to a ratio of one in eight where a razor-thin margin decided the outcome.

Seven of these were Senate races, and they were real squeakers. In Nevada, liberal Sen. Howard Cannon (D.) held his post with a bare 50.1 percent of the vote. The outcome is subject to recount. In Ohio, pro-labor Sen. Steve Young (D.) withstood the challenge of Robert Taft Jr., capturing 50.2 percent of the total vote. And in Oklahoma, Fred Harris (D.) scored against former Oklahoma University football coach Bud Wilkinson to win with 51.1 percent.

In Pennsylvania, incumbent Sen. Hugh Scott (R.) regained his seat with 50.6 percent of the vote, defeating liberal Genevieve Blatt.

In three other Senate races, extreme conservatives won out over liberals. Delaware Sen. John J. Williams (R.) was returned for a fourth term, notching 51.7 percent of the vote. In California, President Kennedy's former press secretary Pierre Salinger, was defeated by ex-movie star George Murphy who won 51.3 percent of the vote. The same margin put Goldwater friend and supporter Paul Fannin into the Senate from Arizona.

In governor's races, six contests were decided by less than 52 percent of the total vote. In the closest of them, John Volpe (R.) won in Massachusetts with 50.5 percent. Volpe knows how much one vote counts. He was governor of the Bay State from 1960 to 1962. He lost two years ago to Endicott Peabody by 50.1 percent of the vote.

Liberal Gov. John Reynolds (D.) of Wisconsin was nosed out by 50.7, but in neighboring Illinois Gov. Otto Kerner (D.), with 51.9 percent, defeated Charles Percy's bid for national recognition as a possible GOP presidential nominee in 1968.

In Montana, extreme conservative Gov. Tim Babcock (R.) retained his job with 51.3 percent, and in South Dakota another incumbent conservative, Gov. Nils Boe, held on by the fingernails with 51.5 percent. In Delaware Charles Terry won with 51.4 percent.

Fifty House contests fell into the 52 percent or less category.

The closest of them came in New York's 30th District, where incumbent reactionary Carleton King (R.) was reelected with only 50.03 percent of the vote. He won by just 148 votes out of nearly 200,000 votes cast.

He Knows

Julius R. Lippman of New Hyde Park, N. Y., strode into the voting booth November 3 and pulled a lever to vote.

His one vote counted.

It helped elect Julius R. Lippman of New Hyde Park, N. Y. judge of the Third District Court.

That's right. Lippman won by just one vote out of 106,641 votes cast for the office, 53,371 to 53,370.

Turn-Out Disappointing

One disappointing aspect of the November 3 elections was the failure of voter turn-out to measure up to expectations.

Totals of 71-73 million votes had been predicted. The final total was only slightly over 69 million, 60.6 percent of the 113.9 million voting-age citizens.

In 1960, 63.8 percent of voting-age Americans went to the polls.

Major Washington newsletter for businessmen confesses hospital care program for the elderly may do just what labor and liberals contend it would do: Create demand and opportunity for private health plans just as social security in the 1930s stimulated pensions. . . . "Richard Nixon calls for party unity, but it's going to come hard. The unity part is OK, but where's the party?"—Jack Wilson in Washington Star. . . . Election notes: Goldwater got the smallest number of votes cast for a GOP candidate since 1948, and smallest GOP percentage of total vote since Landon in 1936. Vermont voted for the Democratic presidential candidate for the first time in its history. Veep candidate William Miller's home county turned against him 66,004 to 27,998, more than 2-1. Democrats scored a net gain of 38 seats in U.S. House of Representatives, two in the Senate, making margins 295-140 and 68-32 respectively. . . . Post election note: A recent Gallup Poll reports the proportion of voters who identify themselves as Republicans has skidded steadily since 1940 from 38 to 25 percent, while the proportion who identify themselves as Democrats has climbed from 42 to 53 percent in the same period. . . . Right-wingers during the campaign peddled some 17 million copies of three books aimed at discrediting LBJ, the Democrats and moderate Republicans.

State Bodies Flip In LBJ Landslide

The landslide victory of President Johnson reached down heavily into state legislatures, a survey by Congressional Quarterly shows. More than 500 seats in state bodies around the land switched from Republican to Democratic. The handful that went the other way were mostly in the South.

Democrats in six states took away control of both houses of the legislature from the GOP: Indiana, Iowa, Maine, Michigan, New York and Utah.

In another seven states, Democrats wrested control of the House only from the GOP: Colorado, Illinois, Montana, North Dakota, Pennsylvania, Wisconsin, Wyoming.

Only one state body switched from Democratic to Republican control, the House in Oregon.

Activity Increases . . .

Right Wing Hopes Soar

"26 Million Americans Can't Be Wrong."

That's the newest slogan to emerge from the right wing propaganda mill as extremist leaders view November 3 election results as a launching pad for stepped up activity.

They feel the vote for Barry Goldwater shows there are huge untapped reserves for new members, new money, new militancy, according to a New York Times article.

The John Birch Society already claims sharp gains as a result of the recent presidential campaign. Former Rep. John Rousselot, JBS national public relations director, contends interest in the society was whetted and membership has jumped to new highs in each of the past four months.

Poised to reap any potential membership harvest are 55 full-time JBS field coordinators. Two years ago, there were only 25.

New JBS regional offices are sprouting like crabgrass in suburbs of Los Angeles, Chicago, Houston, Washington and New York.

The number of Birch Society book stores almost has doubled in a year—228 of them around the U.S., selling, according to Rousselot, more than 40,000 books and pamphlets a week.

JBS Chief Robert Welch

...Membership spurt claimed as result of campaign

Billy James Hargis

. . . Sees money tree in bloom

Not only the Birch Society was buoyed by Goldwater's 26 million vote showing. Billy James Hargis, leader of the so-called Christian Crusade, sees the money tree blossoming as rich rightists, encouraged by that 26 million figure, turn loose more hard cash.

Like Rousselot of the Birch Society, Hargis anticipates swelling his membership.

Increased membership is expected, too, by Americans for Constitutional Action, according to executive director Charles McManus. ACA is one of the most politically active of the rightist groups.

California Rightists Zero In On Libraries

Rightists in California are stepping up pressures on public libraries to remove what they consider liberal literature from the shelves.

The right wingers want to put there, instead, their own brand of 150 percent American reading. One they want to cram down the public's throat is "None Dare Call It Treason," a favorite tract of some Goldwater supporters in the recent campaign.

Further, the old game of name-calling has erupted in the library battle. One spokesman for a rightist group attacked the author of best-selling "The American Way of Death" as a communist and charged the book "promotes socialistic" funeral practices.

According to the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, most of the pressure on California libraries stems from the John Birch Society, hiding behind front groups.

That Noise You Hear . . .

It's Voice of Rightists, Still Filling the Air

If you turn on your radio these days, chances are you'll either hear some rock-and-roller mangling a melody or some right-wing extremist torturing the truth.

Nearly every disc jockey runs his weekly poll of the Top 10, based on how often songs are heard, but the right-wing discord tops them all with more than 7,000 programs each week, costing an estimated $10 million a year.

Right-wing broadcasts are heard in each of the 50 states, and more than 500 separate communities. Following is the most recent count on the nine leading extremist programs:

Twentieth Century Reformation Hour—A 30-minute daily program on 546 radio stations in 45 states. Conducted by Rev. Carl McIntire.

Life Lines—A 15-minute program broadcast daily over 325 radio and 69 television stations. Underwritten by billionaire Texas oilman H. L. Hunt.

America's Future—A 15-minute weekly commentary carried on 365 radio stations in 48 states. Sponsored by extremist organization, America's Future, whose board of directors includes top leaders of John Birch Society.

Manion Forum—A weekly 30-minute program broadcast over 240 radio and 30 TV stations. Presided over by Clarence Manion, national council member of the John Birch Society. Program often features pitch for so-called "right to work" laws and other anti-labor positions.

Howard Kershner—A 15-minute program carried on 148 radio stations in 41 states. Financed by the Christian Freedom Foundation, one of major rightist groups, which in turn gets much of its money from J. Howard Pew, a big spender for extremist causes. Pew is prominent in the Birch Society.

Birchers Urged To Aid RTW

Members of the extremist John Birch Society have been told to wade into the reactionary fight to retain Taft-Hartley Section 14(b) which authorizes state "right to work" laws.

In the February issue of the JBS "Bulletin," an action sheet that goes only to Birchers, members were urged to offer their assistance to the National Right to Work Committee, nationwide coordinating group pushing open shop laws. The "Bulletin" said: "This is definitely their (NRTWC) ball, but we ought to help them carry it in any way that we can."

Repeal of 14(b) is the AFL-CIO's Number One legislative goal.

Reprint of Church Article Exposing Rightists Available

COPE will have a limited supply of reprints of Sen. Frank Church's article in Look Magazine exposing the tactics and goals of right wing extremists. The article by the Idaho Democrat was excerpted in the Political Memo of Jan. 25, 1965. For copies, write to COPE, 815 16th St., N.W., Washington, D. C. 20006. There is no charge.

Rightists Fill the Air

Dan Smoot Report—A 15-minute weekly commentary by Smoot who once broadcast under sponsorship of H. L. Hunt. Now sponsored by Birch Society endorser D. B. Lewis, Smoot is heard on 70 radio and 40 TV stations.

Billy James Hargis—A 30-minute daily broadcast on 55 radio and seven television outlets. Sponsored by Hargis' own Christian Crusade.

Independent American Radio Edition—A 15-minute weekly program on 39 radio stations in 18 states. Put together by Kent and Phoebe Courtney, major right-wing leaders whose operation overlaps heavily with the John Birch Society.

Each of these nine leading right-wing programs spouts all or most of the extremist line to millions of Americans. That line includes smears of government officials, attacks on progressive social legislation, on the public schools, the UN, labor unions, etc. Following are samples from some of these broadcasts:

Howard Kershner—"We are driven to the conclusion that evil men in strategic positions, with the aid of their dupes, stooges, and fellow-travelers, have been able to mold public opinion in our country and shape governmental policy along lines that are hurrying us onward to destruction."

Dan Smoot—". . . Earl Warren is a socialist . . . He has the same attitude toward the Constitution that communists and all other socialists have . . . There are ample grounds for impeachment, not only of Warren, but of all nine Supreme Court Justices."

Manion Forum—"That amendment (16th Amendment to the Constitution providing for federal income tax) is the very prescription given by Karl Marx in his Communist Manifesto for income taxation to destroy private property and establish socialism throughout the world . . . The tax law will go . . . It cannot be enforced. The communists want it. Our political liberty is endangered by it."

Life Lines—"The . . . United Nations has through the years been used as a forum to advance communism . . . . the UN has become a monster violating its own charter in a manner so dangerous that every American should be deeply concerned about its actions and about the actions of the Mistaken who are promoting these UN excesses." (The "Mistaken" is a word used by H. L. Hunt in other Life Lines material to describe anyone who disagrees with him.)

Each State to Have Its Businessmen's Political Committee

BIPAC, the Business - Industry Political Action Committee, has developed far-reaching plans to make the organization an increasingly effective force in national politics and is now actively at work putting these plans into operation.

The blueprint calls for the creation of Businessmen's Political Committees in each of the 50 states — in some of the larger states, two or more as needed. Working through and with these committees,' and in cooperation with national and local business associations BIPAC's Political Education Division will conduct a continuing program of educational and missionary work in the periods between elections, concentrating on the marginal House districts and the states where key Senate seats will be at stake.

Meany Urges Halt Alabama Arrests of Vote Applicants

The following telegram was sent recently by AFL-CIO President George Meany to President Johnson:

We in the AFL-CIO are deeply concerned by the mass arrests in Selma, Alabama, of more than a thousand American citizens whose sole crime is a desire to vote. It seems to us that the right of every adult American to participate fully in our elections, subject only to reasonable and uniformly applied tests, is the very keystone of our nation. When any American is denied his voting rights, all Americans are denied a portion of their rights. We urge you to do everything in the power of the Federal Government to halt this disgraceful harassment of potential voters.

Robert Welch Engrossed in Far-Right Calling

By Robert E. Dallos

BELMONT, Mass.—When Robert Welch, founder and leader of the ultra right-wing John Birch Society, took time off recently from fighting communism for a 10-day golfing holiday in Hawaii, rain prevented his going on the links more than twice. While most people similarly inconvenienced would blame the weatherman, Mr. Welch tells a visitor to his office in this sleepy Boston suburb the rain was "probably a Communist conspiracy against me."

He was being facetious, of course, but usually the 65-year-old former candy salesman is deadly serious about the Communist threat. He believes Communists have plotted to subvert the U.S. ever since the Russian Revolution and unless thwarted will have full control of this country by 1975, through the help of alleged Communists or "Comsymps" (a coined word suggesting communist sympathizers) such as former President Eisenhower, his brother Milton and Supreme Court Chief Justice Earl Warren.

Mr. Welch is out to stop such a takeover, and has been not unsuccessful in selling his brand of anti-communism. His society is still far from the proclaimed goal of one million members but enrollment has risen fast since the November elections. It's now estimated at about 100,000—double the number of a year ago. Thus a closer look at the man's aims, methods and the way he lives is particularly timely.

After retiring from the family candy business in 1957, Mr. Welch started to spend full time selling his doctrine. Today he spends 18 to 20 hours a day on Society chores, and often feels it necessary to spend alternate nights in his office though he lives only a ten-minute walk from the Society's two-story red brick headquarters. On these nights he usually grabs catnaps on the tan leather couch in one end of his office. His staff stocks a portable refrigerator with fruit juices and sandwiches for nocturnal snacks.

On one recent morning after an all-night session, Mr. Welch greeted a visitor in bedroom slippers, rolled-up sleeves and sporting a short stubble. His five-foot-10-inch frame seems slight, but with enough heaviness about the mid-section to boost his weight to 167 pounds. He talks softly with a lingering trace of Southern accent, despite 28 years as a resident at the same house here. He sometimes seems quick to anger, and his hands gesture wildly to emphasize some point about Communist infiltrations.

The Birch Society's founder reports he spends his days personally answering letters from members in all 50 states, reading confidential reports from his 70 or so full-time coordinators in the field, chatting with visiting Birchers and reading Communist literature. "I read all the Communist books and literature," he says. "It's the best way I know to find out what they're doing or planning."

Visitors and phone calls leave little uninterrupted time during the day, and Mr. Welch relies on night hours for writing. He uses a dictating machine for letters, but a typewriter to write and rewrite speeches and the Society's bulletin, which runs between 8,000 and 15,000 words a month. The Bulletin lists accomplishments of the past month and makes "assignments" to members for the coming month.

Scholarly Youth

Such a heavy load of reading and writing may reflect Mr. Welch's early background more than his long career in the candy business. He was born on a farm at Edenton, N.C., in 1899. By the age of seven he had waded through nine volumes of Ridpath's "History of the World." He enrolled at the University of North Carolina at the age of 12 and graduated at 17. He also briefly attended the U.S. Naval Academy and Harvard Law School before joining the James O. Welch Candy Co. which was then owned by his brother and is now a wholly owned subsidiary of National Biscuit Co.

Mr. Welch's copious current writings concern such Birch Society positions as opposition to the civil rights movement, which the Society labels part of a Communist plot to drive a wedge between Americans and to establish "a Negro Soviet Republic in the Southeastern United States." It also opposes: U.S. membership in the United Nations, reciprocal trade agreements, the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, defense spending, foreign aid, diplomatic relations with Communist nations, Social Security, the Federal Reserve System, fluoridation of water and the graduated income tax. It favors impeachment of Justice Warren for failing to uphold the Constitution.

The popularity of such a creed among some Americans is evident not only in swelling Birch Society membership, but in Mr. Welch's ability to collect lecture fees of $1,000 per appearance. He says the fee is high enough "to make it worthwhile and to discourage groups from inviting me." He says he plans to make about five paid lectures this year, and that he turns down many requests. He is a nervous speaker who has been known to stop in the middle of his text when someone coughs or moves about in the audience.

If he speaks at a meeting the Birch Society sponsors, the Society itself receives the proceeds. He also collects no salary for his long hours. His income, besides lecture fees, comes from royalties on his four books and modest wealth accumulated during his business career.

His attractive gray-haired wife, Marian, is a paid member of the Society's office staff. The rest of Mr. Welch's immediate family comprises two adult sons, Robert and Hillard, who have no connection with the Society.

The Society was officially started after Mr. Welch sold its concept to 11 prominent businessmen during a two-day meeting in Indianapolis in 1958. He had made many acquaintances in the business world during seven years as a director of the National Association of Manufacturers. He was less successful in his only direct bid in politics, a losing campaign for Republican nomination for Lieutenant Governor of Massachussetts in 1950.

Mr. Welch's strident positions and his accusations against prominent persons have led many to call him an "extremist," but his associates not surprisingly feel quite differently. One of them comments, "He has embarked on a course few men would have dared attempt and that some feel hopeless. He wants to restore a sense of personal responsibility in men. His methods take courage—he has dared to strike out at the tallest and the strongest, believing that even those who lead must act responsibly."

The 103 headquarters employes, who often visit and chat with Mr. Welch as he walks through various departments of his headquarters, seem to regard him with fondness and respect. "He is a warm and exceptionally friendly man," says one employe, adding that Mr. Welch has a tremendous sense of humor. "These qualities are seldom seen by the public, but continually by those who know him well and see him frequently."

Mr. Welch's personal contact with his immediate office staff of eight is also on a somewhat informal basis. On most days at about noon, an assistant fetches containerized soup and sandwiches from a nearby luncheonette. A table in Mr. Welch's outer office is "set" with paper napkins, and Mr. Welch sits at the head of the table and says grace. The conversation consists, not of Communist conspiracies, but mostly of small talk and some of the somewhat corny jokes Mr. Welch likes to tell. He betrays his nervous nature with his constant wadding of a paper napkin while he eats.

Proud of Naming Reds

Mr. Welch is proud of his record of spotting Communist threats. He brags that he branded Fidel Castro a Communist as early as 1958. Commenting on the assassination of President Kennedy, he says, "There was never any question in my mind that this was the work of the Communists."

After the assassination, he relates, he had to close Society headquarters for a few days because someone fired three rifle shots and threw bricks through a window. "The early reports blamed the killing on a right-winger or Bircher, but I didn't believe all that horseradish," he says, "I knew damn well it wasn't a Birch Society member unless someone faked something. Our people don't work that way. They avoid that kind of stuff."

JOB APPLICANT 'BLACKLIST' LINKED TO RIGHT-WING CHURCH LEAGUE

WASHINGTON — The right-wing Church League of America has been charged with operating a "blacklisting business" that gives employers a secret check into the background of job applicants.

The charge was made by the Institute for American Democracy (IAD), a nonprofit organization which exposes extremists on both the left and the right. Its board includes leaders in labor, religion, business and government.

Details of the blacklisting service were explained by Charles R. Baker, IAD's executive secretary, in an article in the March issue of the organization's newsletter, Homefront.

This is how the setup works, based on letters and a flyer being sent to businessmen in the Chicago, Philadelphia and New York area, Baker said.

For as little as $5 a head, prospective employers can get a check into what the Church League terms the "philosophy of life" of job-seekers.

The individual job applicant has no way of knowing about the check and there is no defense against wrong identification.

Employers are told that for a $1,000 "donation," they can get checks on 50 names, with additional checks at $5 each. Even if they don't' use the service, employers can write off the "donation" as a tax deductible contribution, CLA says.

Name checks are made against the Church League's files, which the organization claims "are the most reliable, comprehensive and complete and second only to those of the FBI."

According to Baker, the Church League has boasted that it has file cards on nearly 3 million persons, groups and publications "which serve the Communist cause," and has claimed to have a working relationship with law enforcement groups.

Prospective clients are sent a promotional letter warning that "our working forces include more than a few radicals, socialists, revolutionaries, Communists and troublemakers of all sorts."

"Colleges and schools are educating thousands more who will soon be seeking employment," the letter adds.

The Church League then points out that while employers can easily check the "education and professional background" of job seekers, but little is being done to learn their "philosophy of life" which is "of paramount importance."

Baker identified the Church League of America as a right-wing group that provides a "library function" for a variety of other right-wing outfits. It lists Major Edgar Bundy as its executive secretary.

The Church League's catalog, Baker noted, features materials from the John Birch Society and the Carl McIntyre complex. Last winter, Bundy was a guest on Birch member Dean Manion's Radio and TV Forum.

In 1967, the last year for which reports are available, the tax exempt Church League reported an income of $280,195, largely from contributions, Baker said.

THE AMERICAN GENTILE ARMY

An Organization For Independant Political Action

NATIONAL HEADQUARTERS — CONYERS, GEORGIA

Announcement

A Gallup poll based on the 1944 presidential election disclosed that 21,000,000 voters classified themselves as democrats, 17,500,000 as republicans, 9,000,000 as independents and 500,000 to other parties. Evidently the 9,000,000 independent voters cast their ballots for President Roosevelt which threw the election in his favor.

President Roosevelt built a New Deal party around the core of the old Democratic party and by his dynamic political astuteness held his organization together for four successive national elections. But with his passing the New Deal party is scattering to the winds. No man could have stepped in and kept his personal party together. In the chaotic "bust-up" the number of independent voters will likely more than double by 1948.

If these independent voters can be brought together in an organization for independent political action they can easily dominate the 1948 presidential election. Such an organization is being proposed in this preliminary prospectus. Read it through carefully and then if your conscience and your political judgment approve, join the movement and help put it over.

There are a dozen or more limited efforts being made in various areas, each centered around some vital political issue that merits political action. In due time this organization for independent political action should adopt for the guidance of the "Committee on Political Strategy" a full program of political issues. The American Gentile Army must have objectives and must outline methods for procedure if it is to become effective. It seems feasible that such a program can be made broad enough to satisfy all local organizations and independent thinkers and unite them into one great patriotic movement for the protection and preservation of this Democracy.

Communism, a new form of government, is stemming out of Russia and sweeping across both Europe and Asia. Communism is a challenge to Capitalism and makes its appeal to the proletariat or common people. The American Gentile is at heart a "rugged individualist" and maintains a basic belief in competition and free enterprise. This great nation has been erected upon that economic foundation and no change will be made until the independent spirit of American Gentiles has been crushed.

This movement should appeal to every patriotic American Gentile who can see what is going on under cover through false fronts and subversive propaganda that can have no other ending except to destroy Constitutional Government and the "American Way of Life." Independent Patriots, this is the great opportunity. May we count on you?

The Case Against The Jew Race

In briefing a case against the Jew race no accusation is intended for individuals or their religion. International Jewry is an institution that operates throughout the world on definite racial lines. Many nations have sought to eject them and some succeeded for a time. It is claimed that Benjamin Franklin, one of the leading builders of the Constitution, appealed to his compatriots to insert a clause in the Constitution that would exclude Jews from citizenship in the new government. This much is certain; they have segregated themselves and have refused to be assimilated; they have erected a Jewish financial state within our nation and are dominating vital channels of trade. They are Palestinian Asiatics with a record centuries long for accumulating profits from Gentile nations by means of their International Racial Communism. Naturally they are friendly to any Free Enterprise nation that will permit them to operate their system. When a foreign race of people enters a Free Enterprise nation for the purpose of gaining profits, segregate themselves and refuse to be assimilated, then acquire commercial and political controls such as the Jews have been able to do in this Gentile nation, there should be no lingering doubts in the minds of real Americans that it is time to wake up and start something.

A. G. A. Organization Plan

Every great movement had a beginning somewhere. This initial effort to organize an independent political action army comes out of the great State of Georgia with headquarters at Conyers, a modest county seat city just outside Atlanta. Arrangements have been made to handle the temporary organization until such time when a permanent national organization can be consummated. At the earliest possible date a weekly newspaper will be issued to direct organizational plans. The membership fee has been fixed at $3.00, to be sent to the American Gentile Army, Conyers, Georgia, for a Membership Certificate. Members who desire to enter the field as organizers may write headquarters for terms and official printed materials. An Army Company may be formed when ten or more members apply for a Charter. A Company shall be limited to 100 members. When ten Companies have been formed in any state they will be entitled to a State Charter which carries the right to handle their own independent organizational work. It is to be hoped that organizational fees sent into headquarters will be sufficient to meet legitimate and necessary expenses of this preliminary presentation.

COMMITTEE ON HUMAN RIGHTS FOR WHITE PEOPLE

-OVER-

Ways to Combat Undemocratic Pressures on PTA's, Schools, and Libraries

In the PTA Appoint a committee to become informed on extremist groups, their "front organizations," and their tactics.

★ Devote a meeting to a factual report by the committee on extremist groups; their efforts to infiltrate PTA's and influence them to withdraw from the state and national organizations; and their undemocratic pressures on schools and libraries.

★ Establish the policy that resolutions and motions on controversial issues will not be voted on until the meeting following their introduction. This assures that the membership can be alerted and all views on an issue can be fairly represented and heard.

★ If someone comes up with a loaded, unanswerable question, ask him to rephrase it. Usually he can't, because it's a "canned" question.

★ Never mislay your sense of humor. A humorous remark has more than once pricked an inflated balloon.

★ Set a definite, reasonable time for adjournment. This assures that decisions will not be made by an extremist minority that outstays the moderate majority.

★ Look gift speakers in the mouth. Find out why they want to speak and whom they represent.

★ Keep the community and the press supplied with facts about PTA purposes and projects.

Schools Urge school boards to do the following:

★ Have written statements of policy placing responsibility for curriculum decisions and selection of textbooks, films, pamphlets, and other teaching materials with teachers and educational administrative officials.

★ Have an information program to sustain community understanding of these policies.

★ Have clearly defined procedures for dealing with complaints on curriculum, books, and teachers. For example, require that charges and complaints be made in writing and signed by the complainant, referred to a special committee, and so on.

Libraries Urge library boards also to have written policies on book selection; a public education program; and definite procedures for handling complaints.

Prepare in advance

★ Invite representatives from schools, churches, libraries, labor, industry, press, radio, and TV to a meeting to consider sound, democratic ways of dealing with extremist pressures.

★ Establish a joint committee for a continuing exchange of information and ideas.

★ Conduct a joint, vigorous education campaign to make the community aware of the importance of freedom of speech and freedom to read, to teach, and to learn.

If an attack comes

★ Bring it out in the open.

★ Insist that charges and complaints be specific, written, documented, and signed.

★ Ask the school board or library board to hold public hearings.

★ Get full press, radio, and TV coverage.

★ Seek advice and help from the National Congress of Parents and Teachers, your state congress, and from such groups as the state education association, the National Education Association, the American Library Association, the National Council for Civic Responsibility, the National Council of Teachers of English, the National Council of Teachers of Social Studies, and local and state colleges and universities.

Extremist Groups

A Clear and Present Danger to Freedom and Democracy

WHAT IS GROUP RESEARCH, INC?

Group Research, Inc. began operations Feb. 1, 1962, to fill a long-felt gap in continuing research on propaganda and pressure groups. It is incorporated in the District of Columbia as a nonprofit enterprise and staffed by professional research experts.

GRI was organized on the assumption that the perpetuation of the democratic process requires, in addition to other things, research and honest reporting of the relevant facts surrounding issues of the day.

What more relevant facts are there than who is behind various propaganda drives to pass, kill or emasculate this or that legislation or to blunt, change or inaugurate new policies?

GRI makes no pretense at encyclopedic coverage either in terms of all individuals or organizations engaged in pressure and propaganda or in the coverage of a specific organization, but there is no service in the nation which can be compared with that available from Group Research.

It is a vital tool for political groups, membership organizations, college and university libraries and other places where a serious effort is being made to retain freedom without sacrificing flexibility and progress, to strengthen and perpetuate the democratic process by turning the light of factual knowledge on the groups attempting to influence national life.

"He who molds public sentiment goes deeper than he who enacts statutes or pronounces decisions. He makes statutes or decisions possible or impossible to execute."

Lincoln-Douglas debates.

PROTECT AMERICAN DEMOCRACY

Today democracy is under attack not only from Communists and Rightist dictators abroad but from Americans boring from within.

The attack on the U. S. Supreme Court because of its decisions in favor of racial equality (school desegregation) and majority rule in the states (reapportionment) is dividing our nation into those who believe in democracy and those who have never really accepted it. The proliferation of anti-democratic Right Wing organizations in this country necessitate a strong counterattack by those who cherish our national ideals.

Here are some of the things you can do to speak up for democracy:

- Promote the study of the U. S. Constitution conceived "to promote the general welfare," particularly the Bill of Rights guaranteeing freedom of speech, assembly, religion, trial by jury, etc.

- Promote the study of man's struggle to free himself from what Thomas Jefferson called "every form of tyranny over the mind of man" — superstitution, ignorance, fear, autocracy, prejudice, exploitation, hate — by emphasizing inspired social movements and their spokesmen which have battled for freedom, equality and human brotherhood.

American democracy rests upon these pillars:

1. Fundamental freedoms to vote, speak, assemble and choose one's own beliefs.
2. Equality of opportunity regardless of race, creed or sex.
3. One man, one vote. Rule of the majority with protection of minority rights.
4. The right to redress grievances — social justice.
5. The right to live a dignified, secure, and useful life.
6. The right to trial by jury and freedom from the police state.

SPEAK UP FOR DEMOCRACY — THE FREEDOM YOU SAVE MAY BE YOUR OWN

Published for educational purposes by the URW Education Department, 87 South High Street, Akron, Ohio 44308

Things you can do to . . .

SPEAK UP FOR DEMOCRACY

. . . in your community

1. Be a fighter. Our forefathers had the spunk to stand up to the Tories in 1776. We must have the courage to resist present-day Tories.

   When a letter to the editor attacks any of democracy's tenets, write a defense of your country's ideals.

   Release statements your group makes against anti-democratic moves. Remember, a meeting is action and the results of your meeting are legitimate news.

   Some radio stations give free time to Right Wing groups who denounce the Supreme Court, unions or the U. N. Insist upon and get equal time to reply.

2. Spread the word. Form a speaker's bureau to spread the word to other community groups. Explain that democracy is a fabric; destroy several threads and the entire weave is likely to fall apart.

   We are threatened by enemies. Robert Welch of the John Birch Society says he does not favor democracy. A number of state legislatures have already gone on record to radically alter the U. S. Constitution and to leave the states forever with minority rule. It is our duty to spread the alarm about such threats to American democracy.

3. Organize a SPEAK UP FOR DEMOCRACY group in your community. Get a broad base of housewives, workers, professional people, businessmen, students, and senior citizens. Hold meetings and seminars on the meaning of democracy right in your own home town.

A LIST OF PUBLICATIONS

Attached hereto is a list of publications (by no means complete) which represents a variety of viewpoints on social, economic and political issues. The names, addresses and subscription rates are given, so that persons interested in subscribing to one or more of these publications will have the pertinent information readily available. Where the editorial policy or general point of view was easy to determine or generally known, we have used the following code for identifying publications. In other cases when the publication covered quite a range of viewpoints or when it was difficult to clarify we have merely listed the publication under one of several headings, depending upon the type of issues it deals with.

UL - Ultra Left
LM - Liberal, Moderate or Center
C - Conservative
UR - Ultra-Right

We are aware of the fact that classifying publications is not an easy matter. We also realize that what one person considers "liberal" might be considered "ultra-right" by some other person, depending upon his own philosophy of outlook. Of course, "The final proof of the pudding is in the eating". In the final analysis everyone must judge for himself how to classify publications or the ideas they espouse.

We have prepared this list because we believe people must be informed in order to make intelligent decisions, and where possible they should have access to the points of view of a variety of organizations. We expect to add additional names of publications to this list from time to time and we will appreciate suggestions from you.

UNDERSTANDING THE LEFT, RIGHT AND CENTER

By Walter H. Uphoff

* What makes people active or inactive in politics?

* What makes some people extremists and others moderates?

SOME BASIC FACTS ABOUT HUMAN BEHAVIOR - whether African, American, Chinese, Cuban, English, French, German, Japanese, Russian, Spanish, Swedish, or what-have-you.

- Most people desire to live, and live decently. They are inclined to support those political leaders and spokesmen, and those economic and political systems which they think will give them what they seek in life. They seldom have unlimited choices and they seldom know and understand all the alternatives to what they have now. No country permits or tolerates the complete span of ideologies from one extreme to the other. Examples: Russia would not tolerate the establishment of a Republican, Democratic or Socialist party. The United States has outlawed the Communist party. West Germany has outlawed both the Communist and the Nazi parties.

- The human being strives for security as a condition of life. How he views security for himself depends upon his experiences and his sense of values.

  A person from a broken or unhappy home may feel unloved and insecure.

  A person who has physical or mental handicaps may have difficulty getting and holding a job and may feel "left out" or resentful.

  A person who is out of work, or who, for some other reason does not feel secure, will not have the same feeling of loyalty to the society, generally, as the person who has "done well" or has been successful under the system. (This is true whether the system is "free enterprise," "communism," or the "mixed economies" of England and the Scandinavian countries.)

  Being out of work may be due to: 1) lack of training or skills, 2) automation, 3) physical or mental handicaps, 4) industrial changes, such as: a) from glass bottles to tin cans to aluminum cans, b) from railroads to trucks, c) moving a plant from New England to Alabama, and 5) discrimination because of race, nationality, religion, or sex.

- Economic and political systems are not overthrown or drastically changed as long as they meet the needs of the majority of their people. When they fail to meet the basic needs of a large proportion of their people, changes take place. Adjustments can be made gradually and democratically when people have access to the electoral process and make use of it, as in the case of the New Deal during the depression. Or more drastic changes take place when the democratic process is absent or not fully developed or is not adequately used, as in the case of Communism in Russia (1917) and China (1949), and Fascism in Germany (1933), Italy (1922) and Japan (1936).

HOW TO COPE WITH ATTACKS FROM

THE FANATIC FRINGE

Nothing can disrupt a good school district so quickly as an irresponsible attack. But, if your teachers, parents, board members and administrators are prepared in advance, extremist actions can be blunted before they start. In this article, three men who have been under fire tell how to cope with the "fanatic fringe."

■ ■ ■ Your district is under attack.

Right now—at this very moment—there are groups and individuals at work in your community preparing to challenge the very way your schools are being operated.

There is nothing wrong with this. As a matter of fact, it's quite normal and healthy. Schools should be subject to criticism.

There are, however, three distinct types of criticism to which a district may be subjected.

First, there is valid criticism about which something can be done. For example, a group of lay or professional people may feel that the district's physical education program has fallen behind the times. Changes—if warranted—can be made.

The second type of criticism may be equally valid, but the schools are not in a position to correct the situation. There are extraneous forces over which the schools have no control. Most often, this type of criticism will concern the budget. A group proposes a program that the schools might like to institute, but the funds are not available.

The third type of criticism is that which is invalid. Often this criticism is originated by uninformed or poorly informed people who, once given the facts, will modify their view. These people can be reached through a proper school-community relations program.

The fanatic fringe

But in almost every district there is a small, loud group of persons to whom facts are of little impor-

things are threatened by a force far greater than has been brought home to us in Wisconsin.

It should be a force that every union man could sympathize with and join in working for the same goals. Many of our members feel they cannot, they feel this way simply because they are human. It is true that only human beings belong to unions; we may have learned to collect money from machines, but we have never yet seen one a union card yet. But this resistance to change, no matter how human, must give way to a greater force. The force is greater because of the depression of world events, our own Constitutional democracy, and because of our own home grown Negro Movement. Unions can no longer be used as the refuge place for discrimination. Our law has gone too far already in declaring unions to be affected with a public interest, that it is a matter of a very short time before all discriminatory practices will be rooted out.

Our challenge is: will we undertake to do the job ourselves, speedily and forthrightly, in good faith, good conscience, and in good spirit, Or will we wait until we are forced.

I would plea for our own action. I think all parties will learn more about working harmoniously together in a democracy that way. I think we can better protect the accuracy and good strength of the labor movement by doing the job ourselves. We can find happiness out of doing the right thing & "Negroes" can learn perhaps for the first time that those of us called whites are worth trusting and are people --

Now, I'm not saying that there should be no legislation. There should be and soon. It should be far-reaching legislation which the labor movement supports. Our obligation is to move beyond legislation and move rapidly. That is if we wish to build a good society in which all of us can be proud — here at home and proud before the world —

A part of our working together and our good faith voluntary action can be the active seeking of legislation that guarantees fairness.

SOME SIMPLE FACTS
ABOUT THE FAIR LABOR STANDARDS ACT
(MINIMUM WAGE LAW)

Although the federal minimum wage law, like many laws, is somewhat complex, there are a few simple facts about it that everyone can and should understand. This leaflet explains these facts, the background of the law, its regulations in general, how it is enforced.

You can get additional information about the law, how it applies to a particular industry or a particular job, by sending for the free publications of the United States Department of Labor's Wage and Hour Division. Or you can visit the Division's nearest field office or ask questions by telephone or letter. A list of addresses and phone numbers of field offices is included in this kit. Also included is a list of publications.

HOW FEDERAL MINIMUM WAGES BEGAN

The first Fair Labor Standards Act, sometimes called the Minimum Wage Law or the Wage and Hour Law, was passed in 1938, during the New Deal period. It put a "floor" under wages of 25¢ an hour for the first year, rising gradually to 40¢ an hour seven years later. Only 12 to 13 million of the nation's then 55 million workers were covered by this very low minimum. Among the other 40-odd million, employers could legally pay less than 25¢ an hour.

Over the years the minimum wage has been revised upward several times. Also the Act has been amended to include new classes of enterprises and employees, so that many kinds of employment which were not at first covered by the law are covered now.

The latest revision, passed in 1966, took effect in February, 1967. On that date the minimum hourly rate for about 32 million already covered employees was raised from $1.25 to $1.40. Also, over 9 million employees who had not previously been covered had a floor put under their wages of $1.00 per hour. Among these 9 million newly covered employees are many who have been among the lowest paid employees in the nation, and probably also in your community. The floor for both groups will continue to rise. Previously covered employees will be entitled to at least $1.60 in 1968. By 1971 newly covered employees will reach the $1.60 per hour level. Agricultural workers now covered are scheduled to go to a legal minimum of $1.30 per hour in 1969.

Minimum Wage Campaign Kit, Labor Program, Southern Regional Council, Inc.
5 Forsyth Street, N.W., Atlanta, Georgia, 30303. February, 1967.

COVERAGE AND MINIMUM HOURLY RATES AS OF FEBRUARY 1967

Every job falls into one of three categories: (1) it was already covered by the Wage and Hour Law before February, 1967; (2) it was not covered by the Act before February, 1967, but it is covered by the Act after February, 1967; (3) it was not covered by the Act before, and it is still not covered.

Industries and Enterprises Covered before February 1967. Many industries and enterprises have been covered for some time. But since February there is a higher minimum wage for these enterprises.

Beginning in February, 1967, the minimum wage for previously covered jobs is $1.40 an hour. Beginning February, 1968, it will be $1.60 an hour. Also, one and a half times the hourly rate must be paid for all hours over 40 in one week; the time-and-a half provision applies even if the employee is earning more than the minimum. (There are some exceptions to the time-and-a-half provision; consult the closest Wage and Hour Division field office if you need to know them.)

If an enterprise is covered, that means that supporting personnel like porters, watchmen, maids, elevator operators, and so on are all covered. Here are some examples of previously covered enterprises. (This is not the full list of all enterprises covered; there are many more.)

Most companies in communications industries: telephone, telegraph, radio, television

Most companies in these transportation industries: highway building and repair; railroads; airlines; interstate bus; interstate trucking

Almost all factories

Almost all wholesale enterprises

Almost all mining enterprises

Large lumbering enterprises

Large retail stores or smaller stores (doing over $250,000 of business annually) in a chain

Large construction companies

Large gasoline service stations

Most city bus companies

Banks, insurance companies, and most advertising companies.

Industries and Enterprises Covered beginning February, 1967. Beginning in February, 1967, many industries that were never covered before will be covered, and in some industries where previously only large enterprises were covered, now many smaller enterprises will be covered also. But the newly covered jobs will begin by having a lower minimum wage and a longer basic work week than the previously covered jobs.

The minimum wage for newly covered jobs is $1.00 an hour beginning February, 1967. It will go up to $1.15 an hour beginning February, 1968. One and a half times the hourly rate must be paid beginning February, 1967 for all hours over 44 in a week, and beginning February, 1968, for all hours over 42 in a week. The time-and-a-half provision applies even if the employee is earning more than the minimum. But it does not apply to certain exempted jobs and industries, of which farming is one.

Here are some examples of newly covered industries and enterprises. Again if an enterprise is covered, unskilled maintenance employees are included. This is not a full list of all newly covered jobs; there are others.

Industries That Were Never Covered Before

Hospitals and nursing homes
All schools and colleges, public and private
Laundries and dry-cleaning establishments
Farms that employed more than 500 man-days of hired labor in a calendar quarter (about seven full time employees) last year
Large motels, hotels, restaurants
Large automobile, trailer, and farm-implement dealers.

Smaller Enterprises in Previously Covered Industries

Some smaller retail stores (doing more than $250,000 business annually)
All smaller construction companies (that is, all construction companies not previously covered)
Many smaller city bus companies
Many large taxicab companies (drivers are exempt from overtime).

Industries and Jobs Not Previously Covered and Still Not Covered. The Fair Labor Standards Act does not cover employment of the following.

Professional, administrative, and executive employees
Outside Salesmen
Domestic workers
Members of an employer's immediate family
Employees of motion-picture theaters
Fishermen

There are others that are not covered.

SOME SPECIAL PROVISIONS

Equal Pay. All employers covered by the Act, whether before or since February, 1967, must pay women workers the same rate as men workers for the same job, and they may not reduce the men's pay to make it equal to the women's. This applies even if the employees are receiving more than the minimum rate.

Child Labor. All employers covered by the Act are prohibited from employing children under certain conditions. No children under 14 years of age may be employed at all, except in agriculture and then only outside of school hours. Children between 14 and 16 may be employed only outside of school hours, except in agriculture. And children under 18 may not work in certain dangerous occupations. (In addition, many states have special state regulations regarding child labor which occasionally may be stricter than the federal regulations. You also should consult your state department of labor if you believe children are being employed illegally.)

Students and Handicapped Persons. There are special, lower minimums for learners, students and handicapped persons if the employer has a certificate from the Wage and Hour Division.

Contract Services to the Federal Government. Employers who provide goods or services to any branch or agency of the federal government must pay at least the higher minimum for previously covered employees in nearly all cases.

Determining the Hourly Rate. Some workers are paid by the day, the week, the month, or by a piece rate. The hourly rate can be determined by dividing a week's wages before any overtime is added by the number of hours worked. This gives the basic or regular rate. The employee is then entitled to half again as much for each hour worked over 40, or over 44 if he is newly covered. Remember to make this calculation using the employee's gross pay before deductions, not his take-home pay. The employee has a right to know from his employer what his gross pay is.

WARNING: The regulations have been explained in a very general way here. There are many refinements and exceptions. You can find out more specifically whether a particular job in a particular firm is covered by the law by consulting the various publications listed in the booklet or by inquiring at your nearest field office of the Wage and Hour Division of the U.S. Department of Labor.

ENFORCEMENT

The Wage and Hour Division of the United States Department of Labor is responsible for enforcing the law. It acts on its own in uncovering intentional or unintentional violations. It also responds to requests for investigation and complaints.

Who May Lodge a Complaint. Anyone may inform the Division that he believes a particular employee is not being paid in accordance with the law. Complaints are sometimes made by a firm's competitors, by labor unions or by individual employees. The Division never reveals to the employer the name of the individual or group making the complaint. It will also make an investigation on the basis of an anonymous complaint. But, of course, an individual who makes a complaint without revealing his name can't receive an answer from the Division. Besides the fact that the Division will not reveal the name of the person making the complaint, any employer who fires an employee for going to the Wage and Hour Division with an inquiry or complaint can be punished under the law.

Where and How to File a Complaint. If you think an employee is being underpaid according to the law's minimum or is not being paid overtime, or if you think a woman is being paid less than a man for doing the same work you should report the case to the nearest field office of the Wage and Hour Division. If you are not certain whether an employer or an employee is covered by the law, you can still ask the field office to investigate.

You can telephone, visit in person, or write. You should have as much information about the employer's business and about the employee's job as you can get. The white sample information sheet shows some of the kinds of information the Division needs in order to investigate. But do not fail to file just because you can't get all the information, the Division investigator will get it himself.

You may want to mail the postcard in your kit to your nearest office asking for the "Employment Information Form" on which to file a request for an investigation.

What Happens after You File A Complaint. Your complaint should be acknowledged within a few days. After that, it may take several weeks to a few months, depending on how busy the office is, for an investigation to be made.

If the complaint is justified, that is, if the employee or employees are being underpaid according to the law, the Division will order the employer to make up the whole amount the employee lost during the entire time he was underpaid and to pay him in accordance with the law from that time on. In the rare case where the employer does not obey such an order, the Division may take him to court. The burden of enforcing the law is on the government, not on the employee. If the complaint is unjustified, that is if there is no violation of the law, the Division will make a report to the person who filed the complaint explaining why it holds that there is no violation.

If there is no response after a reasonable time or if the response seems unsatisfactory, you may ask the regional office of the Division to review the case.

Detailed reports are not given to organizations or outsiders. If your group wants to act on behalf of one or several employees and you want the Division's responses to come to your organization's address, file in the name of an individual employee, with his consent, with an address in care of your organization.

Problem Areas. The industries and firms that are being covered for the first time are those where there are most likely to be violations or misunderstandings. Therefore, you would do well to be especially sensitive to conditions in the following fields:

Agriculture--If last year a farmer employed six or seven employees more or less regularly, or regularly during the season, he may be covered this year. Many large farmers who have never been covered before will now have to pay at least $1 an hour, and the same piece rate to children as to adults.

Laundries, dry-cleaning establishments, hospitals, nursing homes, schools--These kinds of enterprises have traditionally paid their maintenance and kitchen personnel very low wages for very long hours. Almost all of them will now be covered by the law. The lowest-paid workers will now have to be paid at least $1.00 an hour for hours up to 44 and $1.50 for hours over 44. Most workers will have to be paid time-and-a-half for hours over 44.

Restaurants, motels, hotels--Many large hotels, motels, restaurants will be covered for the first time. Tips may be counted toward earnings, but only up to 50 percent; at least 50 percent must be paid in wages by the employer.

It would also be worthwhile to investigate the situation of any workers who were receiving $1.25 an hour before February, 1967. If they were covered by the law then, they should now receive $1.40 an hour.

A MINIMUM WAGE CAMPAIGN

FOR LOCAL GROUPS

A new weapon in the war on poverty was introduced into your community in February, 1967, and your local organization can play a big role in using the weapon. It is the newly amended federal Fair Labor Standards Act which is frequently called the Minimum Wage Law.

Some 32 million American wage earners are entitled to new, higher minimum wages; over 9 million are being covered by minimum wage regulations for the first time. This means that some of the poorest, most underpaid workers in your community are now entitled to a federally established minimum wage with, for many of them, time-and-a-half for overtime.

While most employers will obey the law, others, through ignorance or evasion, will probably not at first pay their employees the federally required minimum or time-and-one-half for overtime. And many of these underpaid employees, through ignorance or timidity, will not take the very simple steps needed to make the employer pay legal wages.

Your local organization can very easily do an important educational job that will (1) protect employers from the consequences of breaking the law, (2) put more dollars in circulation in your community, and (3) help the people in your community--Negro and white--who most need help, by making sure that they receive the wages that they are entitled to by law.

In putting on a minimum wage campaign you will be cooperating with the United States Department of Labor, which wants help from the community in enforcing the law. And at the same time you will be extending your influence among many groups in the community, most especially among low-paid wage earners. A group that energetically extends itself to wage earners in the community will undoubtedly increase its prestige and membership.

Some Suggestions on How to Proceed

First read the leaflet "Some Simple Facts About The Fair Labor Standards Act," which explains the background of the Act, the minimum wage regulations in general, and the way to report possible violations. This leaflet is written for laymen, not lawyers or economists, and can be understood by everyone in your organization.

Then go through the rest of the material in the kit, using the table of contents as a guide. Some of the material offers further explanations and information for you, some can be used in your campaign.

Then at a meeting of your group have two or three people who have studied the kit explain the law and a possible campaign to the entire membership.

Here are some things individuals can do to help publicize the law.

Be certain that everybody in your family or among your friends who is an employer understands how the law affects him. Look in the list of publications and send for leaflets explaining the law in relation to specific industries.

Look for the brown-and-white poster, of which there is a sample in this kit, in all places of employment that you enter as a customer. Covered establishments are supposed to display it. If it is not displayed and you think it ought to be, speak to the employer.

Carry copies of the poster to your church, club, union or fraternal organization to publicize the law. Additional copies are available from your nearest office of the Wage and Hour Division of the U. S. Department of Labor.

Ask individual wage earners whom you know about wages and hours in their places of employment, and tell them about the law's new regulations.

Here are some things your organization can do to help publicize the law and inform people about how they can secure enforcement.

Become familiar with the kit and with the basic provisions of the minimum wage law.

Form a committee--it need not be large --of people especially interested in wage-hour enforcement.

Look at your community with new eyes. Where are low wage earners working? Is there some chance that they are covered by the law? What other groups or individuals can give assistance in reaching low wage earners?

Issue a news release to announce your committee's interest in minimum wage enforcement and your willingness to help all workers.

Co-sponsor with such organizations as unions, civil rights groups, human relations councils, neighborhood centers a general meeting of wage earners or of wage earners in a particular industry. You may call upon the nearest field office of the Wage and Hour Division for a speaker if your meeting is large enough. Even if you have an expert at a meeting, make sure you have a general understanding of the law so that you can explain it to the people in your community in a way that they will understand.

Arrange for distribution of the leaflet "You Should Know About Minimum Wages" through schools. The booklet can be read by any schoolchild from about the fourth grade. The leaflet would make a good basis for an elementary school civics or history lesson. It should be sent home to parents. The longer leaflet, "Some Simple Facts About the Fair Labor Standards Act," is suitable for high school classroom use.

Ask for time to explain about the law at church meetings, club meetings, etc. Concentrate on those organizations which tend to have contact with low income persons. Even if you can get only five or ten minutes to talk at the meeting you can do a lot.

Distribute appropriate leaflets or posters to all members of the meeting. Make sure to tell them where they can go for more information or more material.

Interview complainants or workers with whom you have made contact where it is convenient for them. Get as much of the information suggested in the sample information form as possible--in some cases this will not be much. If you have reason to believe or if the worker feels he has a legal complaint report the information to the nearest Wage and Hour Division. The workers, any individual, or a group may make the report.

Keep records. Names, addresses, phone numbers, places of employment, to whom did you talk in the Wage and Hour office, what action did Wage and Hour take.

Follow up with the Wage and Hour office if you filed the complaint--with the worker if he filed it. Be understanding, but request as speedy action as possible.

Where back wages are involved, urge the Wage and Hour Division to get a full settlement.

Remember, throughout, not to mislead workers or give them false hope. Offer information, assistance and follow-through--not promises. Remember that technicalities will have to be ironed out by the Wage and Hour Division.

The work you do in publicizing minimum wages will help your organization in other activities by earning you the trust of people you may not have been in contact with before. If you are successful in helping the employees of even one establishment to get the wages they are entitled to, you can go back to them and talk with greater effect about problems of interest to you such as school desegregation, community relations, or organizing a union.

Here is a chance to cooperate with the federal government, with employers, and with white and Negro wage earners in an enterprise from which everyone will benefit. Success in such an undertaking can be a source of pride to the individuals and organizations that brought it about.

The Extent of Wage-Hour Violations

Enforcement of the Fair Labor Standards Act is the key to its effectiveness and the fulfillment of the promise it holds for low-paid workers.

Actual minimum wage investigations by the Wage and Hour Division found more than 400,000 American workers underpaid nearly $90 million in minimum wage, overtime and equal pay violations in the fiscal year ending June 30, 1966. It is estimated that actual investigations discover only half the violators. However, even where violations were found, nearly two-thirds of the money or $60 million in underpayments may never be recovered.

In the last year, employers caught by wage-hour inspectors in violations have agreed or have been ordered by federal judges to pay $27 million to underpaid workers. But the Wage and Hour Division has no power to compel payments to cover past violations where the employer refuses to pay. As a result, some $60 million in illegal underpayments remain uncollected for fiscal 1966 alone.

In these cases, the cheated workers must sue for reimbursement or ask the Secretary of Labor to do so on their behalf. Too often the collection suits are never brought, especially where the workers involved have no union representation and fear employer reprisals.

The Act provides these methods of recovering unpaid minimum and/or overtime wages:

1. The Administrator of the Wage and Hour Division may supervise payment of back wages.
2. In certain circumstances, the Secretary of Labor may bring suit for back pay upon the written request of the employe.
3. An employe may sue for back wages and an additional sum, up to the amount of back pay, as liquidated damages plus attorney's fees and court costs. (An employe may not bring suit if he has been paid back wages under supervision of the Administrator or if the Secretary has filed suit to enjoin the employer from retaining the wages due him.)
4. The Secretary of Labor may also obtain a court injunction to restrain any person from violating the law, including the unlawful withholding of proper minimum wage and overtime compensation.

According to a 1965 survey by the Labor Department on the extent of compliance with the Fair Labor Standards Act, it is estimated that 1,770,000 employes were underpaid at one time or another during the two-year period, 1964-5. Underpayments amounted to $310 million or an average of $172 per worker. Over 343,000 establishments were involved in violations of one or more of the monetary provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act.

The compliance survey of the Labor Department gives a fairly good picture of where the violations are and the enormity of the underpayments. During the two-year investigatory period, an estimated 700,000 workers failed to receive the proper minimum wage. Over $72 million was due workers not paid the statutory minimum.

Of the 700,000 employes paid less than the minimum, it is estimated that 38 percent were employed in manufacturing firms, with the worst violators in food processing and tobacco. Retail trade accounted for the largest single group of these underpaid workers. Over a quarter of the employes were in large establishments employing 100 or more workers. A majority of the workers were employed in firms or plants located in metropolitan areas. Nearly half the workers were in firms with more than one store.

The Labor Department survey also estimates that nearly a million and a half (1,463,000) employes were not paid in accordance with the overtime provisions of FLSA. Estimated back wages owed for overtime violations during the two-year period amounted to $236 million. Over two-thirds of the employes were engaged in non-manufacturing firms, with a large concentration of violations in construction and wholesale trade. Over one-fourth worked in establishments employing less than 10 people. Two-thirds of the employes worked in metropolitan areas and 41 percent worked for multi-plant firms.

The government survey estimates that over 8,000 employes were not paid in accordance with the equal pay provisions and nearly $2 million was owed for equal pay violations during the previous six to twelve-month investigatory period. Extensive violations were found in the chemical, petroleum, rubber, textile, apparel and leather industries.

The study of child labor violations showed that an estimated 72,400 minors were illegally employed by 48,000 establishments during the two-year period. The worst child labor violators were: lumber, furniture, paper, printing and publishing, construction and retail trade.

The South showed a significantly higher concentration of violating establishments than any other region of the country, according to the Labor Department's survey estimates.

THE CONDITION OF FARM WORKERS AND SMALL FARMERS IN 1968

REPORT TO THE BOARD OF DIRECTORS OF NATIONAL SHARECROPPERS FUND

by Fay Bennett, Executive Director

"I suggest that we take a searching look at our present national priorities. We have the biggest bomber, the fastest fighter, the only nuclear aircraft carrier. But among developed nations, we have the fastest decline in family farms, the most hungry people per thousand of our population, the dirtiest rivers and lakes, and the most congested cities."

Senator George McGovern, in a speech before the Western States Water and Power Consumers Conference, September 19, 1968

"Food and nutrition for the American people and maximum contribution to the world's hungry and starving are inextricably connected. A nation that refuses to grow food when food is needed, and refuses to give of its abundance to those who are starving, wherever they are, becomes a nation insensitive to the needs of its own people."

Margaret Mead in testimony before the Senate Select Committee on Nutrition and Human needs, December 19, 1968

The Year in Brief

1968 was the year in which American society proved it could identify its deepest flaws, yet ignore its own self-prescribed remedies. A steady stream of Presidential reports laid bare the institutional causes of poverty, racism, urban chaos, and rural decay. Television penetrated the sanctity of living rooms throughout the nation with visual evidence that the lives of many Americans are warped and destroyed by hunger, while farmers are paid not to grow crops. But those who looked to the political system for a commitment to basic change were largely disappointed. Farm subsidy and quota programs, restricting production and benefiting primarily big producers at the expense of small farmers, were extended at a time when millions were in need. Officials noted the passing of the biggest wave of rural outmigration, but the flow of young people persisted, adding to the social frustration and discontent of the urban slums.

Meanwhile, striking farm workers won international support for their boycott of California table grapes, but the outcome of their effort to gain union recognition remained uncertain as the government increased greatly its purchases of grapes and the big growers held firm. Whether the struggling efforts of the poor themselves would match their desperate need depended on a radical transformation of national priorities and policies. 1968 did not produce a national will commensurate with needed change.

The Decline of the Small Farmer

The condition of the small and the poor farmer is today more precarious than it has been since the depression years; more often than not, he is the victim rather than the beneficiary of government agricultural policy. More than a million farms have disappeared since 1959. The 3 million that remain have an average size of 377 acres, 30 per cent larger than the average farm in 1959. The average American farm worker in 1967* supplied the food and fiber needs of 42 people, compared with 23 in 1959. Just 200,000 farms produced half of the food and fiber grown in the United States. Since 1960, the total number of farm residents has dropped from 15.6 million to 10.5 million people, or only about 20 per cent of the total rural population. While the average number of persons leaving farms annually has decreased from 1 million during the 1950's to 3/4 million in the 1960's, the present figure still represents a high rate of loss, given the reduced size of the farm population. The average annual decline is now 4.5 per cent for white and 10 per cent for black farm people. Little more than a million Negroes are now estimated to be living on farms, a decline of nearly three-fifths in just eight years.

The near extinction of the black farmer is a direct consequence of the demise of the cotton tenant system in the South and the failure of government programs to provide meaningful aid to small farmers, both black and white. Of the approximately 1 million small farms that remain in the United States, the overwhelming majority are owned by farmers in late middle age or older. Unless there is a drastic change in farm policy these farms will cease to operate when their owners retire or die.

*NOTE: All Figures are for 1968 unless otherwise noted. Where 1967 figures are used, these are latest available.

THE CONDITION OF FARM WORKERS AND SMALL FARMERS IN 1969

REPORT TO THE NATIONAL BOARD OF NATIONAL SHARECROPPERS FUND

by Fay Bennett, Executive Director

"Meanwhile, our society continues to overlook . . . the injustices afflicting the migrant farm worker and his family. The problems result not only from society's inattention and collective neglect, but in many cases from the deliberate and express exclusion of farm workers from almost all conventional citizen and worker benefits enacted by state and federal law."

1969 Report of the Senate
Subcommittee on Migratory Labor

"After three and a half decades and costs of billions of dollars, the Department of Agriculture's farm programs continue to widen the gap between the rich and the poor. They have helped create a class of wealthy landowners while bypassing the rural poor — and that means 40 percent of the rural people in this country."

Dr. C. E. Bishop, Agricultural Economist and Vice-President of the University of North Carolina

The Year in Brief

In 1969, as the Nixon Administration took office, new promises were being made, but at year's end millions of Americans still suffered from hunger and malnutrition. Poverty still forced people to leave farms and rural communities and move to urban slums. Large corporations still received a disproportionate share of farm subsidy payments. Agricultural research, often paid for by American taxpayers, primarily benefited large farmers. Thus it was apparent that the nation's priorities had not changed.

Meanwhile, large numbers of poor people in rural America, not wanting to uproot for an uncertain future in overcrowded cities, were struggling to remain at home. Cooperatives were being formed; crops were being diversified; farmers with little formal education were participating in farm management training programs. Farm workers continued their fight for union representation, adequate wages, and decent working conditions. On the whole, America's rural poor — whether Southern black or white farmers, Southwestern Mexican-American or Filipino farm workers, or American Indians — were discovering a new pride in themselves and were seeking to gain a measure of security for their families and a chance for a better life. Their success, in large part, depends on how this nation sets its priorities.

Hunger in America

In 1969 there was more talk of hunger. President Nixon said in a Congressional address: "The moment is at hand to put an end to hunger in America itself for all time." The Senate Select Committee on Nutrition and Human Needs continued its hearings and turned up new evidence of hunger and the inadequacy of government food programs. Finally, in December, 3,200 people converged on Washington for the White House Conference on Food, Nutrition, and Health to chart a national nutrition policy.

In spite of all this, two years after hunger became a national issue, millions of Americans were still not getting enough to eat. According to the Select Committee, the food stamp and commodity distribution programs were serving a maximum of only 44 percent of the 14.4 million Americans who are so poor that they must have assistance if they are to escape malnutrition. Furthermore, roadblocks set up at the local level prevented the food programs from reaching millions of needy Americans.

Congress increased appropriations for the food stamp program to $610 million for fiscal year 1970, an increase of $270 million over the previous year. Legislation increasing appropriations to $1.25 billion passed in the Senate but was held up in the House Agriculture Committee. In December, the Administration liberalized the food stamp and school lunch programs. By the end of the year, almost 800,000 more people were participating in government food programs than in the previous year, and one million more children were receiving free or token-priced lunches. Moreover, 5,000 poor people had been hired as nutritional aides. But, although progress has been made, the government food programs were still inadequate. A report by the Bureau of the Budget showed that it would take a bare minimum of between $5 billion and $7 billion to close the hunger gap.

Land Grant College System Criticized: Legal Action Comtemplated The Agribusiness Accountability Project in Washington, D.C., has released a preliminary report, Hard Tomatoes Hard Times, which charges America's land grant college system with failure to respond adequately to the critical needs of rural America. Based on the material contained in that report, MLAP is coordinating law suits at both the federal and state levels against the system. Plaintiffs will be farmers, farmworkers, small rural businessmen, consumers, alumna or graduates of land grant institutions, taxpayers, environmentalists, and other rural persons and organizations that have been injured directly or indirectly by the system. The purpose of the suits will be to divert the $750 million a year that now goes to the land grant colleges into research and other work that will benefit all those Congress intended when it set up the system.

The following are exerpts from remarks made by Jim Hightower at a recent press conference held to announce the publication of AAP's report:

The report charges that the greatest failing of this agricultural complex—including colleges of agriculture, agricultural experiment stations, and state extension services—is its total abdication of leadership. At a time when rural America desperately needs scientific and intellectual attention to meet real problems, the land grant community has ducked behind corporate skirts, mumbling apologetic words like progress, efficiency, and inevitability. Reaching into all 50 states, the complex is huge, intricate and expensive—the total complex is approaching an expenditure of three-quarters of a billion tax dollars each year from federal, state and county governments. The public pays for everything from test tubes to experimental farms, from chalk to carpeting in the dean's office, and is hailed as the greatest beneficiary of the land grant college effort. But in fact consumer interests are con-

EPA Withholds Pesticide Studies as Bill Goes to Commerce Committee MLAP testified before the Senate Agricultural Research and General Legislation Subcommittee in March when the Subcommittee was considering H.R. 10729, the amendments to the Pesticide Act, as did other farmworker representatives having firsthand knowledge of the dangers of pesticides to field workers. At that time we included in the record some of the most recent studies that had been done by private doctors on pesticides and their harm to farm labor families.

Not included in the hearing record of the Agriculture Committee were the public studies that were subsequently discovered in the possession of the Environmental Protection Agency, which would have further documented the problem and revealed the need for very carefully considered legislation on this subject. Perhaps if the Agriculture Committee had had the benefit of EPA's knowledge from these studies, more serious consideration would have been given to the amendments proposed regarding farmers, farmworkers and others who come into direct contact with economic poisons or their residues.

We called all this to the attention of the Senate Committee on Commerce, Subcommittee on the Environment, on June 15. We noted that the EPA was silent on the issue of dangers to man, and complained that the Committee on Agriculture had dismissed recommendations by Senator Adlai Stevenson (D-Ill.) and others, without even a mention of farmworkers or field workers at any point in the bill as reported out of that Committee or in the report accompanying that bill.

The Committee report cavalierly states: "The bill provides complete safeguards to protect farmers and others coming into contact with pesticides or residues." The various amendments offered were rejected by the Committee's rationale that "by specifically mentioning particular areas protected by the general provisions, there might be some suggestion that the general provisions should be construed to cover less than actually intended," citing the definition of "environment" as including all men, whether or not they come into contact with pesticides or pesticide residues.

However, it is obvious to anyone who has dealt in farmworker problems that farmworkers are usually not included within a definition of "all men" any more than they were considered by the Committee on Agriculture or any more than the chemical companies consider farmworkers as human guinea pigs when they conduct experimental tests on them in California and elsewhere.

CD will not be published next month because the entire staff will be on vacation. Publication will be resumed when she returns.

EEOC Delay in Serving Notice

EEOC's heavy workload and overburdened staff excuse its failure to serve a company with a copy of the charge an employee filed against it for more than a year. That's the holding of the U.S. Court of Appeals at New Orleans, which reverses a lower court. The appeals court notes, however, that under the 1972 amendments to the Civil Rights Act of 1964, notice of a charge must be served within ten days.

At the time a charge of racial discrimination was filed in 1969, the regional office of EEOC had a backlog of 333 cases, and new cases were coming in at the rate of 75 per month. Under these circumstances, the appeals court thinks EEOC did its best to minimize the possibility of employer reprisal during the hiatus before an investigation could begin. One technique it used was not to serve charges until an investigation was imminent. The court sees nothing wrong with that. (Chromcraft v. EEOC, 4 FEP Cases 1085)

Racial Earnings Gap Study

The economic gap between blacks and whites narrowed between 1965 and 1970, but remained large, according to a study released by the Conference Board, an independent business research organization. In that five-year period, the board finds average income for whites grew 40 percent to reach $10,236, while average black family income grew 60 percent to reach $6,279. As a result, the average black family in 1970 earned 61 percent as much money as its white counterpart. In 1965, the figure was 54 percent.

Most of the gain for blacks came in 1966, when the percentage jumped from 54 percent to 58 percent, the Conference Board says. It notes that 1966 was the first full year of operation of the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission.

In another indicator of progress, the board reports that the number of black families earning more than $10,000 doubled between 1965 and 1970. The number of white families above this level in the same period was up one third. As of 1970, 28 percent of black families in the U.S. had incomes of $10,000 or more, compared with 52 percent of white families.

Poverty figures continue to show a huge difference between the two groups, the board notes. Using a $3,968 base for the non-farm family of four as the poverty line, the board found that 29 percent of black families were living in poverty in 1970, compared to only 8 percent of white families.

Schlitz Shares Gusto

Jos. Schlitz Brewing Co. and Operation PUSH, a national civil rights organization headed by the Rev. Jesse Jackson, reach an agreement aimed at a significant increase in minority hiring and use of minority-owned services and businesses by Schlitz. The agreement, reached after three months of negotiations, provides for 15 percent minority employment in all job levels from unskilled laborers to management.

Other features of the agreement call for Schlitz to:

▶Allocate 15 percent of its advertising budget to minority media, and allocate 15 percent of its construction expenditures to minority contractors.

▶Increase the use of minority doctors, law firms, public relations firms, and insurance companies.

▶Increase the use of minority distributors in cities with large minority populations whenever territories can be made available, consistent with franchise agreements.

Jackson says the Schlitz agreement is the first of many that PUSH hopes to reach. He says that PUSH is looking at other companies in the food and beverage industries also, because these are areas "where the black consumer is most prominent and thus where our threat of a black boycott is most effective."

Camden Plan

A Camden Plan to provide for minority hiring in construction in the three-county Camden, N.J., area would be added to such imposed plans as the Philadelphia and Washington Plans, under a proposal published by the Office of Federal Contract Compliance in the August 26 Federal Register.

Although the overall nonwhite minority population of the Camden area is approximately 22 percent, data reveals that current minority representation among journeymen in unions does not exceed 9 percent in any of the major construction trades.

The Camden Plan would require contractors bidding on federally-involved construction to submit with bids their goals for minority manpower utilization in specified trades in terms of percentages of manhours to be worked by each trade. Escalating ranges for each trade are established for the years through 1975.

Banking Profile

The commercial banking industry has been commended by the Treasury Department for its minority hiring and utilization policies.

Citing early returns of a 1972 Treasury study, the director of Treasury's office of equal opportunity says that statistics show employment of blacks in banking has risen to 65,000, up from 55,542 in 1970. Employment of Spanish-surnamed Americans has increased to 30,000, up from 23,858 in 1970.

The EEO director also details an earlier Treasury study (1966-1970) which showed:

▶A 90 percent increase for Spanish-surnamed Americans, from 12,587 to 23,858; a 64 percent increase for American Indians, from 433 to 712; and a 63 percent increase for orientals, from 4,892 to 7,973.

While these statistics are impressive, the EEO director says, a remaining challenge to the banking industry is "acknowledging that, although the industry employs approximately 65 percent females, most banks have not utilized women to their fullest, and now is the time to assure that women are the beneficiaries of affirmative action in management and training opportunities."

In a new development, Treasury officials at the American Bankers Association's national personnel conference indicate that they no longer will be interested in numbers of minority group members employed, but rather in the positions they hold.

No Forced Leave

A teacher can't be forced to take a leave of absence simply because she is pregnant, the U.S. Court of Appeals at Richmond holds. By its decision, the appeals court upholds a district court's order that the Chesterfield County School Board pay the aggrieved teacher three months back wages.

The complainant, a high school teacher, filed suit when the county board put her on leave of absence in December 1970. She maintained that it was up to her and her doctor to decide when she should stop teaching for medical reasons.

The district court had ruled that the school board's policy of requiring teachers to take leaves of absence after the fifth month of pregnancy was discriminatory in that the policy violated the constitutional right of equal protection of the law in treating pregnancy in a different manner than other medical conditions. (Cohen v. Chesterfield County School Board—CA5, 4 FEP Cases 1237)

Women in Unions

A coalition of women's rights organizations asks AFL-CIO President George Meany to help broaden the role of women

The court decides that the company's refusal to promote the employee wasn't based primarily on sex, and that she was not pressured into resigning.

Although the woman was not discriminated against, the court thinks, pointing to the sharp increase in the number of female promotions to the CCI category in the years 1970-72, that the woman's suit probably prodded the company into affirmative action.

CEP Falls Short

The operation of three Concentrated Employment Programs in New York City that were started in June 1967 to develop model programs before expanding into other New York Metropolitan areas having critical unemployment problems are termed "unsatisfactory" by the General Accounting Office. The program centers are South Bronx, and East and Central Harlem. The GAO report says that the Labor Department spent $15.7 million on the three programs through fiscal 1971, but they never met job placement goals, and only in the initial phase of the first of the three plans was an enrollment goal met.

The GAO says one of the discouraging aspects of the performance of the three programs was the low proportion of enrollees who were hard-core unemployed males and the primary family wage earners. A major CEP objective is to overcome long-standing poverty and unemployment, GAO points out, and the major target group would be persons who furnish the primary or major share of their families' income.

In its recommendations, the GAO report calls for "an intensive, concerted, on-the-street and door-to-door outreach activity." This method is generally accepted as the major method of enrolling adult minority group males because this segment of the population is the hardest to reach, the report says.

Back Wages Due

G. C. Murphy has agreed to pick up the tab for $548,000 in back wages due to 246 current and former female warehouse employees at its facilities in McKeesport, Pa. The settlement is a result of a class action suit filed three years ago by 18 women charging sex discrimination under the Civil Rights Act.

The women alleged that the job classification system at the McKeesport warehouse opened only three types of jobs for females compared with eight for males, and that disparities in wages were discriminatory.

The company puts the blame on its contracts with the Retail Clerks and the Teamsters, which, the company maintains, forced it into discriminatory practices. The company says it has sued the unions to recover the amounts to be paid the women.

FEP #198 - 9/21/72

Tests Overestimate Blacks

Employment tests generally are not biased against blacks, according to William W. Ruch, vice president of Psychological Services, Inc., Los Angeles, in a speech before the American Psychological Association.

Ruch says that after analyzing 20 studies of employment testing and racial bias which include separate statistics for blacks and whites, he finds that black job performance, if anything, is slightly overestimated. "If tests are to be construed as being unfair, we would have to say that they are unfair to whites," he says.

Following EEOC and OFCC guidelines in this situation, Ruch points out, passing scores would have to be set higher for blacks than whites to compensate for the tendency of tests to overestimate black job performance. Ironically, Ruch concludes, the effect would reduce, not increase employment opportunities for blacks.

Contractor Debarred

Russell Associates, Inc., a Philadelphia plumbing contractor, has been debarred from receiving further federal or federally-assisted construction contracts because the firm has not complied with the Philadelphia Plan. The debarment is in connection with a contract on an HUD-assisted turnkey housing construction project sponsored by the Montgomery County, Pa. Housing Authority.

A prime contractor on the project, Backman Construction Co., submitted manpower utilization reports to HUD indicating that Russell Associates, a subcontractor on the project, had failed to use minorities sufficiently to achieve the goals and timetables to which it was committed.

After conciliation efforts to bring the company into compliance failed, HUD ordered Russell Associates debarred from further federal contract work.

Bias on Wall Street

A petition has been filed with the Securities and Exchange Commission and private organizations to force all brokerage firms to adopt nondiscriminatory hiring and promotion practices. The petition, filed by the Office of Communication of the United Church of Christ and other interested groups, alleges that the securities industry has had a poor record in hiring or promoting minorities.

For example, blacks, it alleges, hold only 0.4 percent of the selling jobs in the securities industry, and all minorities combined represented only 1.7 percent. In the area of female employment practices, the petition charges that almost 90 percent of those employed in the industry are in deadend jobs and that they are "virtually excluded" from sales positions which traditionally have led to higher-level jobs.

The petitioners argue it is up to SEC to regulate the industry by issuing rules that would require the adoption by their members of affirmative action plans.

Boost for WIN Credit

The National Alliance of Businessmen (NAB) plans to focus one third of its 1973 efforts on "educating businessmen to the economic justification" of hiring welfare recipients using the 20 percent Work Incentive (WIN) tax credit.

NAB officials say they hope to achieve 30 percent of their total 1973 placement goals through the WIN effort. This would amount to over 50,000 new hires.

"We're stressing the simplicity of this program to businessmen who may view it as another complex federal program requiring volumes of paperwork and recordkeeping," a NAB spokesman says. The employer need only maintain the usual payroll data and will submit a simple form—soon to be made available by the Internal Revenue Service—to claim his tax credit. Initial promotion of the program is underway.

For their administrative expenses, employers may receive an amount up to 10 percent of the invoiced costs of their JOB components (not including transportation, medical/dental and child care.)

The contract revisions reduce the entrance schedule for JOBS hires to 90 days. Employers will be permitted to replace dropouts with new trainees for up to 20 percent of the slots until the hiring schedule is completed. After 90 days no further replacement will be allowed. Funds for unfilled slots will automatically be deobligated from the contract at the end of the hiring period.

AT&PN

AT&T Plan

An agreement with the American Telephone and Telegraph Company for an affirmative action plan for equal employment opportunity is announced by the General Services Administration. The plan will affect 21 major Bell System companies in 700 establishments throughout the country that employ almost 800,000 persons. The agreement will provide for more than 50,000 higher-paying jobs for women and 6,600 better-paying jobs for minority men.

Although GSA Administrator Arthur F. Sampson considers the agreement a milestone in the history of equal employment opportunity, and says there is no doubt that it will produce similar agreements in other industries, the National Organization for Women (NOW), and the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People find it lacking in several respects.

NOW says that A T & T's program has significant deficiencies, among which are:

▶ Failure to provide special relief, such as back pay to women and minorities who have been subjected to discrimination in the past.

▶ Failure to adopt meaningful goals and timetables for the employment of females in outside craft jobs.

▶ Failure to adopt the maternity leave guidelines issued by EEOC.

▶ Failure to change testing practices that have an unfair impact on minorities.

NAACP says the agreement's major weakness is that it fails to identify and provide relief for any persons who have been aggrieved by Bell's discriminatory practices.

Amid the controversy, the Office of Federal Contract compliance, which has responsibility under Revised Order No. 4 (401:221) of reviewing agreements on equal employment opportunity entered into by government compliance agencies, has assumed direct jurisdiction over the plan from GSA, and will review the plan to insure that it is in compliance with Executive Order 11246 (401:75).

Blacks in Retailing

An analysis of black employment in department stores, drug stores, supermarket chains directed by the Wharton School of Finance and Commerce shows a limited but increasing utilization of black employees in wholesale and retail trade.

The study, entitled "Negro Employment in Retail Trade," notes that black employment in the three categories of 1970 was less than for the economy at large, 8.1 percent as opposed to 10.3 percent. This is attributed in part to the concentration of black employment in blue collar fields, and the preponderance of white collar retail employment.

The occupational distribution of black jobs within the three retail groups was generally disproportionately light in the managerial and professional classes, although supermarkets tended to have the most even distribution of blacks.

The study is published by the University Pennsylvania Press, Inc., and can be ordered from 240 Canal St., Lawrence, Mass. 01840 at $12 per copy.

EEOC's State

One fourth of the way into fiscal 1973, the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission has a backlog of 56,000 cases, compared to 33,000 at the end of fiscal 1971. However, it still is operating at the same rate it has in the past because the increased budget it requested for its expanded work load has not been approved by Congress. The Commission has filed only 11 court cases, utilizing the enforcement authority given it in the 1972 amendments to Title VII.

The foregoing information comes from a letter from EEOC Chairman William H. Brown III to Senators Harrison A. Williams (D-NJ) and Jacob K. Javits (R-NY), and from interviews with EEOC staff members.

Brown said in a recent speech that when EEOC is fully staffed, he expects 10 to 15 court cases to be filed every two weeks, which would result in a minimum of 260 and a maximum of 390 suits a year. These numbers alone show that there will be little time to spend on the charges of individual complainants.

The first court suits filed by EEOC demonstrate the point. All of the 10 cases filed since March 24 seeking an order against employment discrimination allege a "pattern or practice" of discrimination and make no reference to individuals. However, each of the "pattern or practice" suits filed would affect many individuals beyond those who have filed charges.

EEOC now has 45 lawyers in its General Counsel's office and expects to add 150 if Congress finally approves the budget approved by the Senate. It amounted to $42.9 million, in contrast to the House appropriation of $25.1 million, which would mean no increase. No date has been set for a conference to reconcile the Senate and House differences.

In anticipation of the time when it will have a larger legal staff, EEOC has planned what is called a "four track" system for using its attorneys. The plan calls for using 15 percent of its litigation staff on cases of national impact, 30 percent on cases with regional impact, 45 percent on larger local employers, and 10 percent on cases calling temporary restraining orders which have novel points of law or some other distinction. The cases selected to be filed will be judged by their impact, number of employees involved, complexity of issues, numbers of charges, and employer's compliance history.

The commission has some plans for speeding up its work besides adding more employees. It is working on new investigative procedures that will make more extensive use of interrogatories, thereby cutting down on investigators' travel time. Decentralization of the writing of decisions to the field offices also is pointed to as a timesaving move.

EEOC has no way of telling whether employers are settling more individual cases voluntarily as a result of the amendments, which hold threat of a court suit. It believes that the strengthening of the agency's hand was responsible for two voluntary settlements involving groups of people. One settlement was with United Parcel Service, which agreed to use one female driver for every three male drivers in its western region. The other was with Columbia University, which was going to fire 27 maids, but agreed to let them bid on other jobs after charges had been filed with EEOC.

For those thousands of individuals who, it would appear from the statistics, will be left out in the cold with their charges of discrimination under EEOC's 260-390-cases-a-year program, a Commission spokeswoman says that they are the ones that "the private bar could handle very adequately."

LITIGATION

Indiana Judge Rules "Divine Right of Kings" Passe'

In the most far-reaching access case won to date, Judge S. Hugh Dillon, in the U.S. District Court for Southern Indiana, ruled recently that Union representatives and government-funded organizations have the right to enter migrant labor camps to distribute information about rights to organize and about other services available to migrant workers. The plaintiffs in the case were members of Associated Migrant Opportunity Services (AMOS), an OEO-funded program set up to aid migrants, and representatives of the Farm Labor Aid Committee (FLAC) which represents the United Farm Workers in Indiana.

Defendants in the case were Ivan Morgan, his packing company, and several of his employees. Morgan is one of the largest growers in Indiana and owns at least six labor camps—some employing 1,400-1,500 migrant workers at peak season.

Suit was brought after Morgan and his land agent tried to prevent AMOS and FLAC from disseminating information on labor organization and other farmworker rights in his camps. The Judge granted a permanent injunction permitting AMOS, FLAC and other similar organizations to enter the camps for legitimate purposes. The decision was based on the opinion of the court that the owner of the land had no right to restrict visitors to the camp nor to censor information received by camp residents. As Judge Dillon remarked:

"The only truly amazing thing about this case to me is that in this day and age there is anyone who still feels that he has such a right. The divine right of kings has been dead, I think—or I thought until [this case]—for several centuries." He went on to say that he had no difficulty in agreeing with plaintiffs that "the right of people to talk to other people is the most fundamental right protected by the Constitution of the United States. You just can't get any more fundamental than that. And to say that these people—who don't speak English at all, or very well—can be put out here and isolated from the community, and isolated from anyone who would try to give them some helpful hints on how to better their condition, just absolutely is shocking to me."

He concluded his remarks by telling Morgan that: "These people—in fact, I know and I am telling you that they are entitled to free speech and free association, because they are the people in control of these houses: you are not. You can go in there and inspect them and see if the showers work and police up the grounds. I hope all that happens—keep them sanitary. But you have no right to control whoever comes in there for any purpose. They are people; they are citizens; they live there, and you can't control who comes in or what they say. You just can't do that. Your own right of entry during the period of their tenancy is limited for purposes of inspection of the physical property and housekeeping: that's it."

The suit, Munguia v. Morgan, was brought on behalf of plaintiffs by the Indiana Civil Liberties Union and MLAP.

Arizona Labor Bill: The Union Fights Back.

We reported in some detail in our last issue on Arizona farm labor legislation which the Farmworkers' Union feels would be highly detrimental to the farmworkers' cause. Among many other things the bill, signed into law on May 11, and which became effective on August 13, would prohibit the secondary boycott and strikes by farmworkers.

On August 14, the Union and others retaliated by filing a complaint for injunctive and declatory relief against Governor Jack Williams, the State Attorney General, its Treasurer, and Finance Commissioner.

The basis of the complaint is the classification established by the Act, both in its intent and effect, to single out the class of plaintiff farmworkers as the only group subject to the restrictive and burdensome provisions of the law and invidiously discriminates against this class which is overwhelmingly made up of persons who are of racial and ethnic minorities and who are of an extremely low income group.

The complaint goes on to allege that the classification between the agricultural employees who are covered by the Act and other employees who the law does not cover is arbitrary and unreasonable. There exists no legitimate state interest for including the plaintiffs within the coverage of this law while excluding other employees, many of whom are also employed in the agricultural industry, from coverage under the Act.

According to the complaint: "The provisions of this law unduly restrict the plaintiffs' rights to picket, strike, boycott and gain recognition as the lawful bargaining agent, thereby infringing on the plaintiffs' fundamental rights of association and communication guaranteed by the First and Fourteenth Amendments of the U.S. Constitution. The application of these restrictive provisions and regulations upon First Amendment activities of the plaintiffs without also applying them to other employees similarly situated denies to the plaintiffs the equal protection of the laws as guaranteed by the Fourteenth Amendment of the Constitution."

LITIGATION

Florida Farmworkers Go to Court Over Housing Site

The City of Delray Beach, Florida, doesn't seem to like migrants or seasonal farmworkers—or possibly they just have a thing about blacks and Chicanos. At least that was the impression that the United Farmworkers of Florida (UFWOF) were laboring under when they filed suit in United States District Court for the Southern District of Florida when the city refused to provide their corporation with sewage and water rights for a proposed multiple-dwelling community to be located near the city's outskirts. The purpose of the community is to decently house at least some of Palm Beach County's 30,000 migrant farmworkers who are now living in airless, heatless, vermin-infested rural slums—and paying through the nose for the privilege.

The city has had no problems in supplying water and sewage to trailer camps and other unincorporated "communities" near its perimeters, but when presented with plans for a well laid out community for migrants and seasonal workers the City Council and Zoning Board turned down the UFWOF application on the grounds that the City's Master Land Use Plan, which sets forth planning guidelines for the city and for part of the unincorporated county, provides that the site UFWOF had applied for be used either as a public park or be developed residentially at a maximum density of six units per acre. The Council, however, not only seemed to have overlooked the fact that the site in question is in the unincorporated section of the county and therefore not subject to the jurisdiction of Delray Beach for planning and zoning purposes, but also the fact that the Master Plan itself was not approved by the Council until months after the plan for UFWOF housing was presented.

The UFWOF housing plan itself was to be funded by a nonprofit housing corporation which had applied to the Farmers Home Administration for a 90% grant and a 10% loan. This application had apparently received high priority from the FmHA. The land involved is a five-acre tract with a water line going right through it and a sewer line some 800 feet distant. The corporation is willing to pay all connection and and use fees which amount to 125% of the city rate for service in the county and has obtained an option on the land for about six months pending the solution of the water and sewage connection problem.

The site in question was selected because the current county zoning for this parcel encourages multi-family development (up to 30 units per acre) and because the site is located near essential public services such as schools, shopping, fire protection, etc. Multi-family zoning is necessary to such efforts as subsidized low-cost rental housing cannot be built on an economically feasible basis in areas zoned for single-family uses. The high costs of land development necessitate a greater density of development only possible under multi-family zoning. Access to public services is a requirement for federal funding, and UFWOF was forced to abandon a previously selected Palm Beach County site when the FmHA advised that the public services in the area were inadequate.

On December 6, the District Court ruled against the proposed project—the date the UFWOF option on the housing site was to expire. The Rural Housing Alliance then recommended strongly that the option be picked up by the farmworker corporation and attorneys for plaintiffs in the case plan to file and immediate appeal in the Fifth Circuit Court in New Orleans. A final verdict is expected sometime in February and Florida Rural Legal Services attorneys are "highly optimistic" about obtaining a verdict which will enable the project to go ahead.

USDA Fights Back Wages for Louisiana Sugar Workers

In U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia, Judge John H. Pratt has barred the U.S. Department of Agriculture from paying any subsidies to Louisiana sugar growers until Secretary Butz orders a retroactive wage increase for 16,500 sugar workers in that state.

Judge Pratt issued a preliminary injunction in response to plaintiffs' requests on the grounds that:

"First, it is our judgment that the Secretary had an obligation under the statute [Sugar Act of 1948] and the regulations not only to hold an annual hearing as to the wage scale applicable to sugar cane workers but also to issue an annual determination. Under the language of the regulations, after a reasonable time, the proposed annual determination is to be issued for immediate approval by the Secretary.

"Taking into account past practice running over a period of 20-some years, this would mean that the annual wage determination should be made on or about the time of the start of the harvest season. So I think there was an abuse of discretion, if the Secretary had any discretion, not to have issued the annual determination prior to the time that he acted effective 7 January 1972. I think the announcement made, namely that because of the Economic Stabilization Act, he would make no wage change, did not amount, in effect, to an annual wage determination. It was not published in the Federal Register, and was nothing more than a statement by him that 1970 wage rates would remain in effect until further notice.

Miss Vera Rony
18 Avery Drive
Atlanta, Georgia 30309

Dear Vera:

I am enclosing the first installment of some of the material I agreed to send you.

Here are the basic documents in the Bogalusa and El Dorado Title VII court actions. For Hicks v. Crown Zellerbach etc., I enclose a complaint and amendment to the complaint, my answer on behalf of the unions and a motion to dismiss filed by the employer. In Dykes v. The Monsanto Company etc., I enclose the amended complaint, the answer of the employer and my answer. In both cases there have been many many more documents filed but these are the principal ones and I believe they will give you an idea of what the actions involve.

I read your Dissent article on the way back from Atlanta. I thought it was very accurate and very good. Your rather optimistic ending was perhaps unjustified, however, especially in view of the court action.

As I told you, I believe that Title VII is actually very weak and in a way I regret when court actions are filed once the issue is raised because they tend to freeze the position of the parties, who then become controlled by cautious lawyerism.

I will be sending you some more things from time to time. Incidentally, I have decided I cannot make the WDL Board meeting but wrote a letter in response to the call giving an opinion that the WDL should continue in its present form if possible.

I enjoyed seeing you again and look forward to future contact.

Sincerely,

James E. Youngdahl

Outline

A Note on the Present Status of the Work in Progress

Some 300 manuscript pages have been completed, 60 of which remain to be finally edited and copied for legibility. This takes the narrative through the economic changes wrought on the region by World War II. It also includes the published studies of the J. P. Stevens, Bogalusa and Lawrenceburg conflicts. Thus the final 100-odd pages of the book will comprise the post-war record of the region's industrial relations and the concluding remarks.

The contents will be organized as follows: The book will open with an account of the J. P. Stevens campaign, which summarizes much of what is wrong with both industry and labor in the South today. This will be followed by the historical evolution of the Southern syndrome, beginning with the present "Sorrow Song" through "The Rise of the South's Second Peculiar Institution--Sections I, II, III and IV--through the final segments still to be written. After this will come the Bogalusa and Lawrenceburg pieces, to illustrate where Southern workers, black and white, find themselves today. The next to last chapter will include a short review of other relevant industrial relations and labor-related political developments in the South today, and a short analysis of present regional economic trends, their significance for the work force, economically and sociologically. The book will conclude with a suggestion of new and healthier directions for Southern labor in particular and the region in general.

Finally, it should be understood that the material presented here is not considered to be in its final, publishable form. Because the scope of this work is demanding in terms of both research and intellectual organization, the writer has thought it better to plow ahead and finish the entire task before reviewing the various chapters for inner balance and proper relation to the whole. Nor did it seem useful to invite criticism of various sections of the manuscript until the entire intellectual framework had been articulated. The time has come, thankfully, where such consultation and review, with attendant criticism, is in order. The writer will be grateful for advice and suggestions.

The Ordeal of the Southern Underclass

The work in progress is a study of the divergent and, in the writer's opinion, destructive pattern of Southern industrial relations-- a pattern which has exerted a baleful influence on the psychology of the white Southerner and on the region's social and political climate. Arising shortly after the Civil War, this regional syndrome has continued unabated, except for the short hiatus of World War II, until the present.

After the Civil War the ordinary Southerner, whether black or white, in the highlands or the low, was a free man. Poor certainly but, say the new historians, not really much poorer than he had been before. The calamitous disruption of the war had hurt the plantation aristocracy far more than it had hurt him. However, the region's poverty, its dependence on agriculture, and its absence of financial resources began to subvert this independence within a decade of Appomattox.

Everyone grew cotton because war-time shortages had so increased its value; in due course, therefore, the price of cotton plummeted. Slowly the white yeoman farmers and the Negroes who never did receive their forty acres and a mule fell victim to the sharecropping system which, in return for credit, supplied poverty and debt, followed by their faithful handmaidens, ignorance, self-doubt, and fear.

When, at the end of the century, the unfortunate farm workers breached the color bar to rebel together under the banner of Populism, the terrified Establishment first gunned

Powers of Governors Wane as Federal Programs Grow

BY HENRY GEMMILL

CLEVELAND—A few days of immersion in a governors' conference can give you the feeling that all state executives are affable, some are able, and none are influential.

Nowadays most governors are Democrats, but is there one of these who could stir excitement here? Apart from the skeleton in their closet, Dixiecrat Wallace, certainly not; for a flurry the Democrats had to await the inexplicable arrival of an express agent from Washington, Pierre Salinger, who so recently went out to California and clobbered Governor Brown's candidate for the Senate.

One newspaper headline said "Republican Governors Steal Spotlight at Conference." In a way, yes—but the light showed pie on their faces: Romney, Rocky and Scranton, each in command of a great industrial state, all alarmed about the junior Senator from little Arizona, and none of them able to do a thing to thwart his march toward the Presidential nomination. Sen. Goldwater ducked in and out of the conference without so much as acceding to the Republican governors' desire that he at least sit down and talk with them. And this is the Senator who stands for states' rights.

It used to be that governors were mighty men, and the White House was filled from the statehouse. When in 1960 the Democrats chose from a field almost exclusively composed of national officeholders—Sens. Kennedy, Johnson, Humphrey, Symington—some considered it just an odd coincidence. But the impotence of state executives is on display again in '64. The chairman of this conference is Gov. John Anderson of Kansas, and he runs the show well, but he failed even to win a seat at the GOP national convention.

As individuals, governors don't appear intrinsically less able or alluring than the people one encounters in Washington; in fact 21 members of the Senate used to be governors. Probably the newspapers and TV are partly to blame for the dwarfing of state politicians. The news folk look all the governors over once a year, but swarm about Washington year 'round. Particularly neglected are Westerners such as Oregon's attractive governor, Mark Hatfield, because the mechanics of news transmission is set up to flow from East to West.

State Activities Buried

But, of course, the chief fact is that state activities have long since gotten buried under Federal programs and spending. Though state budgets balloon, too, Texas Gov. John Connally remarks that more than $10 billion of what the states disburse in the next 12 months will merely be funneled through them—it comes as Federal aid. The governors applauded when Dwight Eisenhower came to town and advised them to resist and reverse all this; some had been making similar speeches at each other. Emotionally, many of them are all turning back the Federal tide, but there is little indication they hope to do it, and practically they want more from Washington rather than less.

Those who are not yet ready to join Gov. Brown in bidding farewell to the old idea of separation of state and Federal government, who would reassert the strength of governors and state legislatures, have difficulty in blueprinting how it can be done.

Assuredly the conference of governors cannot currently be considered a strong tool. Perhaps it never was. This body got started only at the suggestion of Teddy Roosevelt and not when he was a governor but after he had taken over the Federal leadership. But at least the governors used to get together in sort of a trade convention atmosphere, swapping shop secrets on how to run state governments. During the last several years all this has changed radically. Democratic National Chairman John Bailey came on the conference scene; GOP National Chairman Bill Miller joined him. Governors began holding party caucuses. The conference became an organ of political propaganda over issues not of state government but of national legislation—civil rights, medicare and the like.

"It's Politics All the Time"

"The governors used to pay some attention to their agenda at least every second year, when there was no election on, but now it's politics all the time," comments one veteran staff man.

Gen. Eisenhower, confessing that next to nothing came of all his efforts as President to turn back revenues, responsibilities and power to the states, appeared to give this conference some more suggestions—including the startling idea that the states might for the first time in history call a convention to amend the Federal Constitution.

History is no straight line, and it would be foolhardy for any observer of this 1964 gubernatorial outing to conclude that governors are doomed to be perpetually inconsequential or that there will be no resurgence of strength in state government. But it is probably safe to say that if the pendulum swings it will hardly be through the mechanics of Gov. Pat Brown's suggested council or General Ike's suggested convention.

For this, a more fundamental change must occur. Some suspect it may already be under way, under pressure from the Supreme Court. The theory runs thus: Federal action has expanded for lack of state action. The vacuum in state activity has been due to "rotten borough" legislatures, failing to reflect proportionately the growth of urban and suburban populations. Redistricting under the impetus of court decisions will remedy this. So state governments will take over their proper burdens and Federal instructions will dwindle.

That could be. Or maybe, in the words of Gov. Rockefeller when he heard that Gov. Romney was out to stop Goldwater, "it's not too little, but it's too late."

The host of this conference is a conservative Republican, Ohio Gov. James Rhodes. What does he view as the outstanding event of the sessions? "As far as I'm concerned," he said, "it was a breakfast at which Midwestern state executives agreed to gather their Congressional delegations and shove hard to get their region more Federal contracts for research and development from the space agency and other Washington spending outlets."

Barry Goldwater's spokesman at this conference is Arizona's Gov. Paul Fannin. At the opening session on Federal-state relations, what was the one proposal of this conservative Republican? He called for a new program of Federal aid, for highway maintenance. The governor declared he was proud of the highway building program which has mingled so much Federal money with state expenditures, but as the roads get built it would be unfair to expect states such as his to bear the burden of keeping them in good shape.

Connecticut's John Dempsey used this governors' forum to call for Federal construction of "activity centers" and other facilities for old folks; Montana's Tim Babcock thinks it's up to the Federal Government to bolster beef prices by choking off imports; Otto Kerner of Illinois focuses his defense of states' rights on opposition to "any reduction in Federal support for any element of the Army National Guard."

Some Welcome Federal Aid

Some of the governors, including Endicott Peabody of Massachusetts, have no regrets. They seem to feel the future of state executives lies in welcoming new Federal programs, such as the "war" against poverty, and in assisting in their execution. California's Gov. Brown carries to its logical conclusion this idea that state government should be integrated into national government.

A Council of Governors should be formally created, proposes Gov. Brown, and it should be just as much an official part of the Federal Government as is the President's Council of Economic Advisers. The President would select from among the 50 governors just five to sit on this council, with representation for both parties and various sections of the land. The council chairman would be a Federal official, "perhaps the Vice President." And the task of the council would be to have a "direct voice in policymaking at the Federal level."

More States Employ Envoys in Washington To Get Federal Favors

New York Battles to Preserve Navy Yard; Massachusetts Wins Cash for Study of Gulls

By Eric Wentworth
Staff Reporter of The Wall Street Journal

WASHINGTON—Hungry for Federal favors, a growing number of state governments are deploying their own representatives in the nation's capital to quietly sniff out opportunities.

These versatile leg-men range the Federal establishment on countless errands for state officials, business groups and Congressional delegations. Most help their states land defense contracts and Federal aid of many kinds. They angle to win new Government installations for home territory and work against closing or curtailment of existing ones.

California, West Virginia, Pennsylvania and Ohio have all established permanent offices here since early 1961, joining New York State, which has been represented ever since 1942. Massachusetts, which kept one man here for many years, has this year taken on a "public-governmental relations consulting firm" to do its Washington chores. Other states show interest. "I do think it's a wonderful idea," comments New Jersey's Gov. Hughes, "but at this point the state can't afford it."

"Basically we're for procurement," says Pennsylvania's James Van Zandt, whose office has stacks of pamphlets on how to do business with Uncle Sam and large charts showing how the Keystone State compares with others in receipt of Federal dollars. Mr. Van Zandt was appointed by Gov. Scranton after he'd served 11 terms in Congress, reaching high rungs on the House Armed Services and Joint Atomic Energy Committees. While some Pennsylvania Democrats questioned how much a Republican emissary could do during a Democratic Administration, the ex-Congressman insists his "entrees" pay off.

Bringing the Guard Home

One Van Zandt project involved arranging talks between Pennsylvania Congressmen and Army officials that produced a Pentagon commitment to let most of the 28th Division, a Pennsylvania National Guard unit, return to Indiantown Gap military reservation for summer training if the state would increase the reservation's acreage; the outfit had been training outside Pennsylvania. Mr. Van Zandt contends this move will pump $5 million to $6 million each summer into the local economy through increased employment and purchasing.

Daniel Ruge, who heads New York's staff of seven, has helped the state's Congressional steering committee in battling to keep the Brooklyn Naval Shipyard and the Brooklyn Army Terminal in business; both face possible shutdown. The steering committee, of which Mr. Ruge serves as secretary, is striving to impress Defense Secretary McNamara with the shipyard's potential for building nuclear vessels. Mr. Ruge also works to clear bureaucratic bottlenecks, as when he sent a telegram from the steering committee to shake loose a Federal allocation for tree disease eradication which the state's conservation department was awaiting; fifty state conservation workers were about to be laid off. "There was a quick response," he reports.

M. J. MacDonald Associates, Inc., which represents Massachusetts on a $3,000-a-month contract, has helped set up Washington meetings and draft statements for Bay Staters challenging Pentagon plans to shut down most of the Army's Watertown Arsenal. The firm also has lined up meetings with New England lawmakers and with space officials for the Haverhill Industrial Council, which is promoting that community as the site for a space electronics center. Results of these efforts remain to be seen.

Bird Study Pushed

Bernard Moss, the concern's vice president and a former Senate aide, reports he has been "bugging" the Federal Aviation Agency to provide more money for studies of how to keep birds from causing airplane crashes; these efforts began after a Boston airport crackup. The Government has contracted with the Massachusetts Audubon Society, among others, for research on the "population dynamics" of herring gulls; it has cost about $65,000 so far. The society told Massachusetts Gov. Peabody it needed new funds; at Mr. Moss' suggestion, the governor wrote FAA chief Najeeb E. Halaby, and Mr. Moss has been pointedly showing copies of this letter to FAA staffers.

West Virginia's Paul Crabtree, former aide to a Democratic Congressman, mails more than 100 Government procurement notices each month to businesses back home. In addition, he badgers Pentagon officials to boost the number of contracts set aside for small businesses and for any companies in labor surplus areas, which include most of West Virginia's 55 counties. Companies qualifying for a "set-aside" are allowed to share the contract with the original low bidder, usually on a 50-50 basis, if they can match his price.

Mr. Crabtree contends his efforts have contributed to the growth in West Virginia's prime defense contracts from $34 million four years ago to $162 million in the fiscal year ended in mid-1963. The increase in state tax revenues, he contends, has more than paid for maintaining the Washington office.

The state envoys are stationed in Washington primarily because of the ever-greater flow of Federal dollars to public and private enterprise across the nation. Aside from the U.S. Government's spending on its own projects, from dams to missile bases, total Federal aid to state and local governments has more than tripled in the past decade and today exceeds an annual $10 billion. On the business side, defense procurement contracts alone channel some $30 billion a year into private hands. State officials realize the stiff competition to win these prizes can require special efforts.

Every state, of course, has sent delegations on special Washington missions at one time or another, to testify on legislation or plead some cause with agencies. In addition, chambers of commerce, industrial councils, trade associations and other private emissaries here promote all sorts of local and state interests. Dale Miller, a friend of President Johnson, represents that Dallas Chamber of Commerce but speaks for the city's government as well on some occasions. At least two other cities, Philadelphia and San Francisco, have their own men here.

Despite this pork-minded chorus, the idea of a state's spending as much as $80,000 or more yearly for a permanent Washington office has wide support in Government circles. Many hard-pressed Senators and Congressmen welcome the presence of someone with valuable contacts and a pair of good legs, at least when they themselves get adequate credit for the results.

Says one Capitol Hill veteran: "They're the ones who keep in touch, who can do a lot of groundwork and a lot of moving around, and then we move in."

The state envoys prefer to work behind the scenes, and, though part of their time is spent on Capitol Hill, they usually dislike being called lobbyists.

The various state envoys have staffs ranging from a single secretary up to an economist, two business consultants and three secretaries. They feed the statehouse a steady diet of useful Government reports and publications, plus intelligence on executive policy and legislative maneuver, and track down answers to myriad queries from home. They also keep Washington administrators and lawmakers aware of their governors' views on how various decisions would affect their states, and hack away at bureaucratic red tape.

When a Pennsylvania company is among bidders for a Government contract, Mr. Van Zandt makes sure Federal officials get the word: "I don't know about capability and price, but I can tell them the governor's interested." He also passes along tips on contract possibilities, arranges appointments for businessmen at Government agencies, coaches them on how to submit bids or negotiate and helps them resolve disputes over contract terms.

California's Irv Sprague, who formerly worked for a Democratic Congressman, regards himself as primarily "a channel of information and a troubleshooter." He's in touch with the White House, the Budget Bureau, other agencies and Capitol Hill on policy decisions and legislation in fields such as water resources and education where California has a heavy stake.

California already has a generous share of defense and space work, and Gov. Brown is said to have told Secretary McNamara that if the Administration didn't play politics on defense spending, California wouldn't either; the state's Congressional delegation has raised no great cry for more contracts. The governor did have one request, however—and not long afterward the Navy dropped its opposition to bridges the state wanted to build across San Francisco and San Diego Bays.

Such pursuit of mutual advantage is a professed goal of the state representatives in Washington. "Everything's reciprocal," contends one envoy, and when Federal and state governments cooperate, "everybody wins."

Why Federal 'No Strings' Distributions Would Be Unwise

It has recently been proposed that the Federal Government should distribute its surplus revenue among the states. Those whose knowledge of the Federal finances is limited to the facts of the record might well ask "What surplus?" From fiscal year 1930 through fiscal 1965 there have been only seven years with budget surpluses. The aggregate of these surpluses is $27.6 billion. The deficit total for the same period, excluding the war years, is $80.7 billion. Offhand, the proposal is reminiscent of the old recipe for rabbit stew, which is "First, catch a rabbit."

The plan is a product of the optimism generated by the anticipated effects of the combination of tax cut and budget deficit. The Government planners believed that the thrust of this combination would send the economy into orbit and that the rate of economic expansion would shortly be high enough to produce revenues in excess of spending. It was said that a budget surplus would be a tax drag on the economy and the way to avoid the drag would be to cancel out the surplus as it appeared by distributing it to the states. In this way the funds would be kept in the mainstream of spending.

On its face, the proposal would appear to be so preposterous as not to warrant consideration. It has had, however, a certain amount of official recognition and sponsorship, and the following discussion deals with various aspects of the case.

THE PROSPECT OF A SURPLUS. The assumption that a budget surplus is just around the corner ignores the "propensity to spend," an occupational disease that afflicts many members of Congress and of the Executive branch. The President recently reported that the departments and agencies had requested $108 billion of new authority to spend for the budget year 1966. How deeply the Budget Bureau and the appropriations committees will cut these requests remains to be seen. In the same statement the President expressed concern that it might not be possible to hold the budget within the "magic figure" of $100 billion in view of these pressures.

The Defense Department's program for phasing out unneeded installations and facilities has already run into trouble. The application of savings at one point to other "essential needs" has long characterized budget management and there is no indication that this policy has been abandoned. No one in the Government is willing to predict even a balanced budget before 1967 or 1968 and these are by no means firm dates. No date thereafter has been set by anyone for the realization of a surplus large enough to warrant distribution. All talk now about what to do with a budget surplus is a purely academic exercise.

It is worth while, however, to examine the relative worth of this method of disposing of a surplus and the theory of government that would appear to underlie the proposal.

FEDERAL-STATE FISCAL RELATIONS. Federal donations to the states, commonly known as grants in aid, have been made over a long period for an ever-expanding array of purposes. In recent years the states have been bypassed by making grants directly to cities and other local units. The original idea of a grant was that it would motivate and activate the states accepting such offers to embark on programs deemed, by some central planning agency, to be in the national interest. Once launched under the Federal stimulus, it was believed that the states would continue to operate and pay for the programs of their own accord.

This notion was soon dispelled. Using a parallel from our tariff experience, the "infant" programs, like the "infant" industries, never became sufficiently mature to carry on without the Government crutch. In the case of the grants, the Federal Government has been no more willing than the states to terminate them. The Federal grants have become a useful and efficient instrument with which to extend Federal jurisdiction into areas of state and local function and responsibility.

The grants are not a distribution or sharing of surplus revenues. Rather, the grant total has steadily increased, especially since World War II, despite the budget deficits. Indeed, there has never been any thought, as the grant total has risen year after year, of relating either the amount or the purposes of the grants to the budgetary situation. It would be futile to contend that the grants were the cause of the deficit for the same could be said, with no greater validity, of any other expenditure purpose involving a substantial amount.

No Strings Attached

The proposal under discussion differs, in one respect, from the existing grant system. It would be a distribution to the several states with no strings attached. The present grants are made for specific purposes and at least enough Federal inspection and control are exercised to assure state or local compliance. In a large proportion of the present grant programs, some participation in the cost is required from the recipient governmental unit.

Federation

The proposed distribution would be a "block" grant—that is, one with no restrictions on its use. Introduction of a block grant or "no strings" system need not be deferred until there is a budget surplus. It can be substituted for the present system at any time by act of Congress. In support of an unrestricted grant, to be spent at the discretion of the grantee, is the argument that state and local administrators know, better than any Federal official or Congress, what the local needs are and can therefore make better use of the funds if left to their own judgment.

Against the unrestricted grant it is argued (1) that there is a Federal obligation to set rules and conditions for the use of the funds, (2) that the states or localities should not be released from the obligation to provide some part of the cost, and (3) that unconditional grants might be used for purposes that have not been approved by Congress or the courts as a proper application of Federal funds. A case in point is the issue of Federal aid to parochial schools.

These arguments point up the basic weakness of any Federal grant system. The state and local officials do know best what their local problems and needs are. The conditional grants at times force them to divert their own funds into programs which, in their judgment, have a lower priority than others. They are not really forced, but they accept the Federal decision in order to get what is generally regarded as "free" money. This supposedly free money is more likely to be used extravagantly or wastefully than would be the case if the people were more directly aware of the tax cost.

A distribution of "no strings" money would lack even such inducement to prudence as may be provided by the matching requirements of the present system. It is natural that the higher the Federal proportion, the brighter is the aura of free money. Federal public assistance grants are heavily weighted in favor of the low income states and in some of these are correspondingly slack standards of eligibility. The Government provides 90% of interstate highway funds, which may explain the scandals that have broken out in this area. The proposed distribution of surplus revenues, like any other block grant, would be 100% free money.

A Difference in Priorities

Despite the strong entrenchment of the Federal grant system, it would be better in the long run to aim at terminating instead of extending it as the proposal considered here would do, and to reduce the Federal tax load correspondingly. In this way leeway would be provided for the several states to apply their own fiscal resources to local needs without central supervision or dictation. They would not all do the same things. Priorities would differ in different regions, and so would the financing and administrative procedures.

The disposition of surplus revenue in 1836 is not a valid precedent for the present proposal. The public debt had been fully paid off in 1835. The revenue surplus in 1836 was produced by a large increase of customs receipts and a sharp rise in public land sales. There were then the two major sources of Federal revenue. Protectionist sentiment prevented reduction of tariff rates and the Western states opposed restriction of land sales. The money was not legally donated to the states but deposited with them on condition of repayment at the Treasury's call. Meantime, they were privileged to use the funds as they saw fit. None of it was repaid and most of it could not have been for it was lost in unwise loans and state ventures, or applied to current expenses. Maine distributed part of her share on a per capita basis.

Daniel Webster supported the distribution as the only solution of a critical situation, but he said: "There would be insuperable objections to a settled practice of distributing revenue among the states. I cannot reconcile myself to the spectacle of the states receiving their revenue, their means of supporting their own governments, from the Treasury of the United States."

Webster's concern about the effect on our system of government was prophetic. The policy of distributing Federal funds to the states, whether out of surplus or deficit, has profoundly affected our governmental system by upsetting the balance of power and responsibility intended by the Constitution. As the Federal grants expand the states become more dependent on the central Government. To complete the vicious circle, Federal tax collections must be kept at a higher level in order to pay the grants. With increasing state dependence goes greater state vulnerability to Federal coercion. The threat to withhold funds is usually sufficient to assure complete compliance with the Federal will.

OTHER WAYS OF DEALING WITH THE BUDGET SURPLUS. Other courses of action than distribution are obviously available in the remote and somewhat improbable event of a sizable budget surplus. A respectable body of opinion can be mustered in support of paying something on the public debt. This was a fashionable financial policy in the "dear dead days beyond recall." In addition to being entirely out of debt in 1835, the Civil War debt had been redeemed by the 1880s except for small issues maturing in the 20th Century. In fact, there was a flare-up of agitation over the surplus question around 1883.

Between 1920 and 1930 some $10 billion, or roughly two-fifths, of World War I debt was retired. A cynic might say that the saving and sacrifice of debt reduction was in vain because national debts everywhere are higher than ever despite the heroic efforts in the past to reduce them. But the debt payments strengthened national credit so that when other emergencies came their financing was less of a strain on credit resources and on the monetary unit than it otherwise would have been.

Beyond question, debt reduction is an outstanding candidate for the use of any budget surplus that might be realized. Our Federal debt is now so large that, with the best of intention and the best of luck, only a small dent can be made in it by any generation of taxpayers. The most valuable contribution of a policy of debt payment would be a reaffirmation before the world of our respect for the debt obligation, and evidence of our pledge that the bondholder shall not be cheated of his investment in his country's future by inflation and its aftermath of devaluation.

Tax reduction is a solution of the surplus problem that would also have substantial support. The fact of a surplus would be evidence of the suspension of Parkinson's law to the effect that expenditure rises to meet income, in itself a feat of heroic dimensions. With the present incomprehensible tax code, tax reduction could be a slow, dismal process, but under a simpler tax structure rate changes that would adjust revenues to expenses could be made quickly.

There would be occasions when the condition of the economy would give priority to debt reduction and others when tax reduction would have first call. Both steps have merit under the appropriate conditions. Either one would reflect confidence that the private economy can support both the people and the Government. Either one would be a decisive move against the further centralization of power in the Federal Government, and would be, by so much, a correction of the distortion of the Constitution which the plan of distributing surplus revenues to the states would perpetuate.

Dear ~~Mr. Via:~~ Emory

Some time ago, the Field Foundation convened Rashi Fein of Brookings, Eli Ginzberg of Columbia, Paul Sheatsley of National Opinion Research Center, and Sidney Spivack of Princeton to discuss the usefulness and feasibility of a discrimination index. Subsequently Mr. Ginzberg directed a short evaluation of available data, and a memorandum from him is attached. Also available on request is a memorandum from Mr. Sheatsley on the use of field surveys.

We are continuing to examine this question of an index. In the meantime, we are sending the Ginzberg memo to you and a few other students and would be most grateful for your comments. You might specially note his Recommendation 3 on page 17.

Sincerely yours,

Leslie

Household Workers To Receive Training

AN EXPERIMENTAL training program to improve the image and pay of household workers in Washington was announced yesterday by the U.S. Labor Department.

About 96 unemployed or underemployed women here will be selected for the six-week training program, which combines classroom instruction with practice in private homes. The women will receive $40 a week during training, plus transportation costs to homes for practice sessions.

Selection of trainees, who will include some welfare recipients, will be made in cooperation with the U. S. Employment Service, churches, vocational schools and community agencies.

Will-Mart Services Inc., a nonprofit organization, will conduct the training program under a Manpower Training and Development Act grant. The agency will hire the women after training for placement in private homes.

Labor Secretary Willard Wirtz said household work was the third largest occupation group for women but the poorest paid, with full-time workers averaging only $1082 during 1960.

Wirtz also reported grants of $52,135 to train 80 nurses aides and orderlies at Prince George's General Hospital and $39,158 to train 40 automobile body repairmen at Northwood High School in Wheaton.

Miasma of Political Distrust Grows

A few days ago a brief, cryptic report out of Prague, Czechoslovakia, was passed among a handful of top officials in Washington.

It said that an editor of Ramparts magazine had come to Prague and held "a long, secret session" with officers of the Communist-controlled International Union of Students.

Ramparts is the magazine that exposed the fact that the Central Intelligence Agency has been financing the National Students Association, which in turn has worked for several years to prevent the IUS from dominating the youth of the world.

The Prague report aroused deep suspicions here among officials who are privately shocked and dismayed at the damage to the CIA and to U.S. foreign policy interests caused by the endless series of busted intelligence "covers" that has resulted from the Ramparts' expose.

"What, if any, relationship does Ramparts have to the IUS?" "What is the full story of Ramparts' financial backing?" Those are the questions being asked in tight, high-level circles here.

I learned that the Prague visitor was supposed to be Robert Scheer, Ramparts' managing editor. I telephoned him in San Francisco and asked if he had met with IUS officers in Prague a couple of weeks ago.

"Yes," he said. "How did you know?"

I failed to reply, and he went on to volunteer that he had spent two days meeting with representatives of the National Liberation Front, political arm of the Communist Viet Cong in South Vietnam, and with IUS leaders.

Scheer hedged for a while when asked who controls the IUS, but finally said, "It is essentially an organ of the foreign policy of the Soviet Union."

"Look," Scheer continued, "I went to the IUS headquarters strictly for journalistic reasons. I was in Europe doing a piece for Ramparts on Bertrand Russell (the 94-year-old British philosopher who plans a Vietnam 'war crimes trial' of President Johnson), so I just went to Prague to check the international implications of our article on the NSA.

"We don't truck with communism at Ramparts," Scheer went on voluntarily. "We compare the U.S. position in Vietnam with the actions of the Soviet Union in Hungary. Both are intolerable, and we make no bones about it.

"Any attempt to smear us at Ramparts is libelous, and we'll sue. I warned the same thing when there were mutterings about me being a Communist when I ran for Congress."

I report this not to throw a smoke screen over the revelations about the CIA. Ramparts' politics, foreign contacts, financial support or motives do not alter the rightness or wrongness of CIA's involvement in scores of American organizations.

I report it because Scheer's mission to Prague illustrates the hideous degree of guilt by association that permeates the furor over the CIA and the various foundations and organizations that have been labeled "CIA links."

No matter how fragile those "links" may have been, many Americans are disposed to think of the groups as "tainted." They are presumed to have bartered away their integrity for lucre from what, strangely, has come to be regarded as a "dirty" organization, "untouchable" by normal Americans.

And, likewise, some people are prepared to believe the worst about Scheer's activities in Prague.

The miasma of political distrust grows more poisonous in our land every day.

Well, I'm not prepared to assume that the people who run "Crossroads Africa" lost their integrity, or that the American Newspaper Guild "compromised the integrity of journalists" because they got money from foundations with CIA ties.

And until proof of something else is presented, I have to assume that Scheer went to Prague on a journalistic mission.

But Scheer and Ramparts have intensified America's mood of suspicion. Everybody is being asked to "come clean" these days and tell where he gets his money. Before the suspicion fades, Ramparts may find it desirable to reveal in detail who has provided the estimated million and a half dollars the magazine will have lost by the end of this year. And Scheer may have more to say about his mission to Prague.

That might lay to rest the rumors that Ramparts is not only a muckraker, but a muckraker with a malevolent motive.

Court Blocks Report on Survey Of Airline Job Discrimination

Res. Check for EEOC Coverage

By Claude Kropowski
Washington Post Staff Writer

District Court Judge Leonard P. Walsh has issued a preliminary injunction preventing the Equal Employment Opportunities Commission from releasing its findings about sex discrimination practices in the airlines industry.

The injunction may stop a series of lawsuits from being filed by stewardesses who claim that the traditional airline practice of age and marital restrictions on their profession is an example of sex discrimination in employment.

The case was brought to court by ten major airlines who had asked the Employment Commission for a final ruling on whether "sex is a valid occupation qualification for the position of flight attendant." The airlines made the request following a favorable but conditional commission finding two years ago.

At that time the Commission ruled that if sex was a qualification for employment, the airlines could impose age and marital restrictions on stewardesses.

Because membership of the five-man commission has changed considerably since 1965, the airlines were thought to fear that a final ruling would reverse the Commission's previous stand.

The Commission held new hearings last year and was about to vote on the issue Nov. 10, when a spokesman for the Air Transport Association charged senior commissioner Aileen C. Hernandez with prejudice.

ATA attorney Jesse Frieden said Mrs. Hernandez was to vote on the issue one day before taking office as executive vice president of the National Organization of Women. As that organization had already charged the airlines with employment discrimination practices, Mrs. Hernandez could not help but be prejudiced, he said.

When Mrs. Hernandez refused to disqualify herself from voting on the issue, Frieden obtained a temporary restraining order enjoining the Commission from releasing its findings. Walsh's decision Tuesday was a more permanent order.

In a deposition submitted to Walsh, Mrs. Hernandez said she did not disqualify herself from voting on the issue because she had reached her decision six months earlier.

Walsh, however, upheld the airlines. "The law is clear that where a present interest in maintaining an earlier position inhibits the free exercise of the decider's mind . . . disqualification is an appropriate remedy," he said. "The very appearance of complete fairness on the part of Mrs. Hernandez was not present as required by law."

Walsh said the Commission may rehear the issue or refuse to issue the interpretative ruling asked by the airlines.

Threat of Labor Split Laid to CIA Cash

By Drew Pearson and Jack Anderson

Inside reason why the giant AFL-CIO labor combine is on the verge of breaking up is because of Central Intelligence money secretly pumped into its "International Affairs Department."

President George Meany has denied that the AFL-CIO receives CIA money; but it does. Furthermore, part of the money is used to follow foreign policy exactly opposite to that of President Johnson.

Backstage story of the CIA battle inside the labor federation goes back to May 22, when Victor Reuther, brother of the president of the United Automobile Workers and head of the Auto Workers' International Affairs Department, charged that Central Intelligence money was "involved" in the AFL-CIO.

Victor stated that AFL foreign affairs activities "are a vest-pocket operation run by J. Lovestone . . . who seems to have brought into the labor movement the working habits and undercover techniques which he learned when he was in the highest echelons of the Communist Party. I guess it's awfully hard to break those habits."

AFL supporters of Lovestone immediately saw red, especially Joe Beirne, head of the Communications Workers. Beirne wrote a letter to Meany demanding that Victor Reuther be disciplined. Meany referred the matter to the next AFL-CIO Executive Council, and Walter Reuther, brother of Victor, countered by asking for a review of all the Meany-Lovestone foreign policies during recent years, which included opposition to cultural exchanges with East European Communist countries and opposition to trade with Russia.

Reuther Is Slapped

At this point it looked as if there might be a bitter cat-and-dog fight between powerful labor executives just on the eve of a congressional election in which united labor support was needed for the re-election of liberal Congressmen.

So Walter Reuther—reportedly at the suggestion of the White House — approached Meany with a proposition that the review of AFL-CIO foreign policy be postponed until after the November election. Meany agreed. He told Reuther to propose such a resolution at the upcoming Executive Council meeting. "I will second it," he said.

But at the meeting, held Aug. 22, Jay Lovestone proposed a surprise resolution which endorsed Meany's entire foreign policy for the postwar years.

The vote on the Lovestone resolution was 21 to 2, with only Walter Reuther and Joe Curran, president of the Maritime Union, opposing it.

Meanwhile, Joe Beirne had submitted a report to the Executive Council attempting to slap down Victor Reuther's criticism of CIA funds.

Beirne particularly defended the American Institute for Free Labor Development (AIFLD), which has spent tens of millions of dollars in Latin America, most of it from the CIA since it receives only about $200,000 annually from the AFL-CIO and about $280,000 from business executives such as Peter Grace of the Grace steamship lines.

Meany Gets Slapped

Earlier, Meany had tried to withdraw American support from the International Labor Office because the ILO, with headquarters in Geneva, had elected a Polish president—a Communist.

The International Labor Office is the oldest international organization, having been started by the League of Nations 20 years before the founding of the United Nations. For many years Communist nations boycotted it, but they affiliated in 1945 when the U.N. was created. It has been the opinion of David Morse, head of the U.S. delegation to the ILO, and of Jim Carey, former head of the United Electrical Workers, that the Communist labor unions were becoming more independent of their governments and leaning more toward the type of trade unionism existing in the West.

However, Meany called a meeting April 8, 1965, after the ILO had elected a Polish Communist as president, and recommended that the United States not send a delegation to the ILO that year. Carey vigorously disagreed.

In a showdown vote Carey won; one of the few times Meany has been overruled.

One of the gripes which the Reuther brothers have against the Meany-Lovestone-CIA foreign policy is that they swing their weight behind dictatorships in Latin America and use CIA funds to do so.

In the Dominican Republic, Meany was dead opposed to President Juan Bosch, and it was AFL-CIO confederates, backed by CIA money either directly or indirectly, who helped to oust Bosch.

Later, during the 1966 election, Meany and Lovestone again swung their influence, backed by CIA money, to defeat Bosch.

In Brazil, AFL-CIO agents, backed by CIA money, helped overthrow President Joao Goulart in 1964.

Mr. Vernon Jordan

Dear Vernon:

I am sorry to have missed talking to you last week when I called, but I had a good talk with Emory Via. Hal Seiber has been under considerable attack from McDaniel Lewis and other segregationists in the Greensboro area. I should send you a full clipping from the Greensboro Daily News carrying what amounted to virtually a half page attack on the Chamber of Commerce for its social action program. This was a long interview with Lewis, who has been a big investment banker around here for a long time. He is a professional veteran, son of the American Revolution, etc. However, he does express a point of view.

Seiber very much needs $3,500.00 pledged, even if not immediately paid, to carry on the supplementary work which has heretofore been supported by small grants from OEA and the North Carolina Fund (the latterbeing out of business now, according to my information). You and he discussed this matter for some time when you were here. I think that in return he could be a great help in scheduling this sort of retreat with other Chamber executives and this would be good quid pro quo for any grant from SRC or any of its agencies to the local Chamber program.

He has raised more money than anybody else in the Chamber has ever done for this sort of work, but apparently the weekly dialogues and discussion ~~Coll~~s have required additional personnel to be on the telephone to get the good attendance that he has been getting. This is where the extra money goes and the $3,500.00 would carry him for another year. Even if you can't get all of that, a good hunk of it would be a great boost and especially at this time.

Could you give him a call and tell him what your situation is.

Best regards to everyone.

Very truly yours,

Mac

The Other Side of the Tracks

By JOHN MARSHALL STEVENSON

"A Look At The Other Side Of The Coin"

Perhaps the greatest difficulty facing black leaders today who seek to provide some semblance of leadership and direction to the rank and file black citizenry is related to a determination of how they can convince the typical black man and woman that the system under which we live is a workable one.

All too often black people, who have become activists in the struggle for black survival, become disgruntled and disenchanted with the American System of government as it is applied to their problems. These very same black citizens find examples of injustice, indifference, and determined exploitation of the economically downtrodden by educated, affluent members of the business community.

It is for this reason, primarily, that many young blacks have developed a distinct antipathy for owners of private property—a hatred which they demonstrate at every opportunity by smashing windows, burning stores, and stealing merchandise which they often destroy simply because they have little or no use for it once they have gotten it.

There are some agencies in Greensboro which have taken it upon themselves to attempt to address themselves to the criticisms and indictments of young activist blacks against the so-called Capitalistic system. They have tried, often without measurable results, to demonstrate the fact that the capitalistic system can work if only concerned and sensitive members of the business and professional community have a determination to make it work for all racial and economic groups.

has had a rough row to hoe in convincing the black community that its members are "for real." Far too many black businessmen still hang back out of a fear that they will be exploited in a manner which will benefit only "the big dogs."

A recent article in the Daily News pointed out the kind of attitude which black people abhor and fear.

The article was concerned with a local member of the Greensboro Chamber, McDaniel Lewis, who attacked the Board of Directors as "irresponsible" because they seem to be going in many wrong directions."

The "wrong directions" which Mr. Lewis alludes to are based on the fact that the Chamber Board apparently is no longer willing to ride the status-quo until it drops from the sheer weight of citizens' petitions and protests. The fact that the Chamber favors change from the present system of City Government to that of the modified Ward System, and the fact that the Chamber is unwilling to allow itself to get caught up in the rhetoric of reaction by screaming for law and order 'without justice" have both elicited charges from Mr. Lewis, an investment securities broker, that "the Chamber is deteriorating" as a result of its concern for matters outside the scope of making a fast buck.

Mr. Lewis, it seems to us, is an example of the white capitalist, who in his zeal to protect and advance the cause of "unrestricted capitalis m," is instrumental in bringing down the wrath of the "hoi polloi" (common people) upon the very institutions he seeks to promote.

We, here at the Carolina Peacemaker, have been

They have tried, often without measurable results, to demonstrate the fact that the capitalistic system can work if only concerned and sensitive members of the business and professional community have a determination to make it work for all racial and economic groups.

One such agency is the Greensboro Chamber of Commerce which has gone on record in recent years as affirming the principle that every man who wants to advance and improve his condition ought to be able to do so without restrictions of race, creed, or color.

The Greensboro Chamber system of City Government to that of the modified Ward System, and the fact that the Chamber is unwilling to allow itself to get caught up in the rhetoric of reaction by screaming for law and order 'without justice" have both elicited charges from Mr. Lewis, an investment securities broker, that "the Chamber is deteriorating" as a result of its concern for matters outside the scope of making a fast buck.

We, here at the Carolina Peacemaker, have been critical of the Establishment before, but in this instance we believe that the Establishment has an effective advocate pleading its cause in the ghetto. We don't believe that it will listen to the strange melodies emanating from sirens who would lure constructive programs onto the rocks of reaction.

Bits of Life

By ROSCOE BROWN FISHER

Only A Touch

It was a modest home. Making my way back to the kitchen, I found the family seated about the table. With a casual glance I observed the food was no elaborate spread, yet sufficient to feed a family of five.

As the woman talked I noticed the little boy, about three, stumbled over something on the floor as he found his place at the table.

Remembering other responsibilities, I began excusing myself and started to my car parked in front of the humble home. To my surprise, the lad I had seen tripping over the doll on the kitchen floor was out to my car running his fingers slowly over the right front fender. Leaning over, I whispered in his ear so that his mother, who had showed me to the door, would not hear, "Don't rub your hands on the car, Sonny, you might scratch it."

As I opened the door to get in, his mother called to me, "Will you lift Sonny over the ditch, please, sir? He can't see. I expect he made his way out there to feel your car."

I lifted the little fellow across the ditch

As I turned the corner and pulled up into the driveway at my own home, tears slipped into my eyes when I thought of a little boy who did not know what the world looked like.

SOME SIMPLE FACTS
ABOUT THE FAIR LABOR STANDARDS ACT
(MINIMUM WAGE LAW)

Although the federal minimum wage law, like many laws, is somewhat complex, there are a few simple facts about it that everyone can and should understand. This leaflet explains these facts, the background of the law, its regulations in general, how it is enforced.

You can get additional information about the law, how it applies to a particular industry or a particular job, by sending for the free publications of the United States Department of Labor's Wage and Hour Division. Or you can visit the Division's nearest field office or ask questions by telephone or letter. A list of addresses and phone numbers of field offices is included in this kit. Also included is a list of publications.

HOW FEDERAL MINIMUM WAGES BEGAN

The first Fair Labor Standards Act, sometimes called the Minimum Wage Law or the Wage and Hour Law, was passed in 1938, during the New Deal period. It put a "floor" under wages of 25¢ an hour for the first year, rising gradually to 40¢ an hour seven years later. Only 12 to 13 million of the nation's then 55 million workers were covered by this very low minimum. Among the other 40-odd million, employers could legally pay less than 25¢ an hour.

Over the years the minimum wage has been revised upward several times. Also the Act has been amended to include new classes of enterprises and employees, so that many kinds of employment which were not at first covered by the law are covered now.

The latest revision, passed in 1966, took effect in February, 1967. On that date the minimum hourly rate for about 32 million already covered employees was raised from $1.25 to $1.40. Also, over 9 million employees who had not previously been covered had a floor put under their wages of $1.00 per hour. Among these 9 million newly covered employees are many who have been among the lowest paid employees in the nation, and probably also in your community. The floor for both groups will continue to rise. Previously covered employees will be entitled to at least $1.60 in 1968. By 1971 newly covered employees will reach the $1.60 per hour level. Agricultural workers now covered are scheduled to go to a legal minimum of $1.30 per hour in 1969.

Minimum Wage Campaign Kit, Labor Program, Southern Regional Council, Inc.
5 Forsyth Street, N.W., Atlanta, Georgia, 30303. February, 1967.

COVERAGE AND MINIMUM HOURLY RATES AS OF FEBRUARY 1967

Every job falls into one of three categories: (1) it was already covered by the Wage and Hour Law before February, 1967; (2) it was not covered by the Act before February, 1967, but it is covered by the Act after February, 1967; (3) it was not covered by the Act before, and it is still not covered.

Industries and Enterprises Covered before February 1967. Many industries and enterprises have been covered for some time. But since February there is a higher minimum wage for these enterprises.

Beginning in February, 1967, the minimum wage for previously covered jobs is $1.40 an hour. Beginning February, 1968, it will be $1.60 an hour. Also, one and a half times the hourly rate must be paid for all hours over 40 in one week; the time-and-a half provision applies even if the employee is earning more than the minimum. (There are some exceptions to the time-and-a-half provision; consult the closest Wage and Hour Division field office if you need to know them.)

If an enterprise is covered, that means that supporting personnel like porters, watchmen, maids, elevator operators, and so on are all covered. Here are some examples of previously covered enterprises. (This is not the full list of all enterprises covered; there are many more.)

Most companies in communications industries: telephone, telegraph, radio, television

Most companies in these transportation industries: highway building and repair; railroads; airlines; interstate bus; interstate trucking

Almost all factories

Almost all wholesale enterprises

Almost all mining enterprises

Large lumbering enterprises

Large retail stores or smaller stores (doing over $250,000 of business annually) in a chain

Large construction companies

Large gasoline service stations

Most city bus companies

Banks, insurance companies, and most advertising companies.

Industries and Enterprises Covered beginning February, 1967. Beginning in February, 1967, many industries that were never covered before will be covered, and in some industries where previously only large enterprises were covered, now many smaller enterprises will be covered also. But the newly covered jobs will begin by having a lower minimum wage and a longer basic work week than the previously covered jobs.

The minimum wage for newly covered jobs is $1.00 an hour beginning February, 1967. It will go up to $1.15 an hour beginning February, 1968. One and a half times the hourly rate must be paid beginning February, 1967 for all hours over 44 in a week, and beginning February, 1968, for all hours over 42 in a week. The time-and-a-half provision applies even if the employee is earning more than the minimum. But it does not apply to certain exempted jobs and industries, of which farming is one.

Here are some examples of newly covered industries and enterprises. Again if an enterprise is covered, unskilled maintenance employees are included. This is not a full list of all newly covered jobs; there are others.

Industries That Were Never Covered Before

Hospitals and nursing homes
All schools and colleges, public and private
Laundries and dry-cleaning establishments
Farms that employed more than 500 man-days of hired labor in a calendar quarter (about seven full time employees) last year
Large motels, hotels, restaurants
Large automobile, trailer, and farm-implement dealers.

Smaller Enterprises in Previously Covered Industries

Some smaller retail stores (doing more than $250,000 business annually)
All smaller construction companies (that is, all construction companies not previously covered)
Many smaller city bus companies
Many large taxicab companies (drivers are exempt from overtime).

Industries and Jobs Not Previously Covered and Still Not Covered. The Fair Labor Standards Act does not cover employment of the following.

Professional, administrative, and executive employees
Outside Salesmen
Domestic workers
Members of an employer's immediate family
Employees of motion-picture theaters
Fishermen

There are others that are not covered.

SOME SPECIAL PROVISIONS

Equal Pay. All employers covered by the Act, whether before or since February, 1967, must pay women workers the same rate as men workers for the same job, and they may not reduce the men's pay to make it equal to the women's. This applies even if the employees are receiving more than the minimum rate.

Child Labor. All employers covered by the Act are prohibited from employing children under certain conditions. No children under 14 years of age may be employed at all, except in agriculture and then only outside of school hours. Children between 14 and 16 may be employed only outside of school hours, except in agriculture. And children under 18 may not work in certain dangerous occupations. (In addition, many states have special state regulations regarding child labor which occasionally may be stricter than the federal regulations. You also should consult your state department of labor if you believe children are being employed illegally.)

Students and Handicapped Persons. There are special, lower minimums for learners, students and handicapped persons if the employer has a certificate from the Wage and Hour Division.

Contract Services to the Federal Government. Employers who provide goods or services to any branch or agency of the federal government must pay at least the higher minimum for previously covered employees in nearly all cases.

Determining the Hourly Rate. Some workers are paid by the day, the week, the month, or by a piece rate. The hourly rate can be determined by dividing a week's wages before any overtime is added by the number of hours worked. This gives the basic or regular rate. The employee is then entitled to half again as much for each hour worked over 40, or over 44 if he is newly covered. Remember to make this calculation using the employee's gross pay before deductions, not his take-home pay. The employee has a right to know from his employer what his gross pay is.

WARNING: The regulations have been explained in a very general way here. There are many refinements and exceptions. You can find out more specifically whether a particular job in a particular firm is covered by the law by consulting the various publications listed in the booklet or by inquiring at your nearest field office of the Wage and Hour Division of the U.S. Department of Labor.

ENFORCEMENT

The Wage and Hour Division of the United States Department of Labor is responsible for enforcing the law. It acts on its own in uncovering intentional or unintentional violations. It also responds to requests for investigation and complaints.

Who May Lodge a Complaint. Anyone may inform the Division that he believes a particular employee is not being paid in accordance with the law. Complaints are sometimes made by a firm's competitors, by labor unions or by individual employees. The Division never reveals to the employer the name of the individual or group making the complaint. It will also make an investigation on the basis of an anonymous complaint. But, of course, an individual who makes a complaint without revealing his name can't receive an answer from the Division. Besides the fact that the Division will not reveal the name of the person making the complaint, any employer who fires an employee for going to the Wage and Hour Division with an inquiry or complaint can be punished under the law.

Where and How to File a Complaint. If you think an employee is being underpaid according to the law's minimum or is not being paid overtime, or if you think a woman is being paid less than a man for doing the same work you should report the case to the nearest field office of the Wage and Hour Division. If you are not certain whether an employer or an employee is covered by the law, you can still ask the field office to investigate.

You can telephone, visit in person, or write. You should have as much information about the employer's business and about the employee's job as you can get. The white sample information sheet shows some of the kinds of information the Division needs in order to investigate. But do not fail to file just because you can't get all the information, the Division investigator will get it himself.

You may want to mail the postcard in your kit to your nearest office asking for the "Employment Information Form" on which to file a request for an investigation.

What Happens after You File A Complaint. Your complaint should be acknowledged within a few days. After that, it may take several weeks to a few months, depending on how busy the office is, for an investigation to be made.

If the complaint is justified, that is, if the employee or employees are being underpaid according to the law, the Division will order the employer to make up the whole amount the employee lost during the entire time he was underpaid and to pay him in accordance with the law from that time on. In the rare case where the employer does not obey such an order, the Division may take him to court. The burden of enforcing the law is on the government, not on the employee. If the complaint is unjustified, that is if there is no violation of the law, the Division will make a report to the person who filed the complaint explaining why it holds that there is no violation.

If there is no response after a reasonable time or if the response seems unsatisfactory, you may ask the regional office of the Division to review the case.

Detailed reports are not given to organizations or outsiders. If your group wants to act on behalf of one or several employees and you want the Division's responses to come to your organization's address, file in the name of an individual employee, with his consent, with an address in care of your organization.

Problem Areas. The industries and firms that are being covered for the first time are those where there are most likely to be violations or misunderstandings. Therefore, you would do well to be especially sensitive to conditions in the following fields:

Agriculture--If last year a farmer employed six or seven employees more or less regularly, or regularly during the season, he may be covered this year. Many large farmers who have never been covered before will now have to pay at least $1 an hour, and the same piece rate to children as to adults.

Laundries, dry-cleaning establishments, hospitals, nursing homes, schools--These kinds of enterprises have traditionally paid their maintenance and kitchen personnel very low wages for very long hours. Almost all of them will now be covered by the law. The lowest-paid workers will now have to be paid at least $1.00 an hour for hours up to 44 and $1.50 for hours over 44. Most workers will have to be paid time-and-a-half for hours over 44.

Restaurants, motels, hotels--Many large hotels, motels, restaurants will be covered for the first time. Tips may be counted toward earnings, but only up to 50 percent; at least 50 percent must be paid in wages by the employer.

It would also be worthwhile to investigate the situation of any workers who were receiving $1.25 an hour before February, 1967. If they were covered by the law then, they should now receive $1.40 an hour.

REVIEW and OUTLOOK

Short-Sighted Sensibilities

Daniel P. Moynihan, that Diogenes of contemporary liberalism, comes down hard on social welfare professionals in the current issue of The Public Interest. To avoid revealing unpleasant truths about the poor, he charges, welfare workers obscured the emerging crisis in the system they administer.

With his usual astuteness, Mr. Moynihan identifies an important factor in the current welfare crisis, though he strikes us as a bit unfair in singling out social workers. The same short-sighted sensibilities about poverty permeate the entire liberal community to which both they and he belong. And even today they are formidable barriers to meaningful reform.

The crisis in welfare arises, as Mr. Moynihan conscientiously reports, because aid to families of dependent children has changed profoundly in nature over the last decade or so, and also has "commenced growing at a wholly unexpected rate." During 1966 alone, for instance, the number of persons on AFDC rolls increased 6.3% and the national cost of the program grew 17.4%. Recent Federal reports, moreover, indicate a still sharper increase during 1967.

In addition, AFDC has increasingly become a device for aiding a single class, poor urban Negroes. Even more importantly, it has shifted from a program aiding widows and their children to one supporting abandoned families. In 1940, widows and their children accounted for 42% of the rolls. By 1963 this figure had dropped to 6%, and "a good two-thirds of the children were, for practical purposes, simply abandoned."

Social welfare professionals knew these changes were taking place, he says, but befogged them until things got entirely out of hand. "A principal reason that these crises have crept into being is that somewhere along the line the social welfare professionals decided, in effect, to say nothing about them. . . . Finding they could do little to improve the conditions of the welfare population, the social welfare profession opted instead to protect its good name."

Doubtless that impulse was common among welfare workers, but to drop the thought there also conceals important truths. Their attitude was simply one derivative of the general liberal feeling that poverty is entirely —not merely partly—the fault of society. Support for the poor is not charity or even a hardheaded means of improving society, the feeling goes, but a sort of penance society owes the poor because of its all-encompassing guilt.

The translation of those attitudes into national policy resumed with the Democratic Presidential victory in 1960. And to us it comes as no surprise when Mr. Moynihan reports the same year marked a transformation in AFDC trends. Previously, applications tended to rise and shrink in conjunction with unemployment. Now they mount steadily in the face of declines in unemployment, and therefore presumably in the actual incidence of poverty.

The same attitudes block welfare reform today. Mr. Moynihan, for example, points out, "the poor of the United States today enjoy a quite unprecedented de facto freedom to abandon their children in the certain knowledge that society will care for them, and what is more, in a state such as New York, care for them by quite decent standards. Through most of history, a man who deserted his children pretty much ensured that they would starve, or near to it, if he was not brought back and that he would be horsewhipped if he were."

Yet any step to enforce laws against abandonment offends the liberal community. Propose so mild a measure as requiring welfare recipients to cooperate in locating and prosecuting runaway husbands, and the howls will make you think someone wants to go back to horsewhipping.

Last year Congress took some hesitant steps toward reforms to curb soaring welfare dependency, but even so rational a liberal as Mr. Moynihan dismisses them as "purposively punitive." That is, some provisions, while intended to benefit both society and the poor themselves by getting more recipients into the workforce, are unmistakably coercive.

For our part, we do not know if Congress' measures are as reasonable as possible; we do know that liberal spokesmen have generally refused even to discuss alternatives. They talk only about increased gratuities of one sort or another, and instantly dismiss even the hint of the mildest coercion.

No end to dependency seems in sight as long as such sensibilities prevail. They put a taboo on a vital truth: That reform will require not only continued financial support for the poor but also measures designed to reach the only real remedy—the bolstering of individual responsibility.

Note of Candor

'Suicidal' Rural Gap in the Poverty War

By BURT SCHORR

The Government commanders view the cities as the critical battleground and are concentrating their strength there. Some gains have been made, but replacements for the other side continue to pour in from the countryside. For this reason, the outcome of the Government drive is uncertain at this time.

An imaginary communique, to be sure, but it sums up the frustrations that plague a growing number of Washington strategists waging America's "other" war—the war on poverty.

For the sad fact is that, much as the U.S. military is made extra-vulnerable in South Vietnam's cities by unrest in the hamlets, so do the home-front poverty warriors approach another summer showdown in the urban slums with their rural flanks exposed.

"President Johnson wants industry to come up with 500,000 jobs for the hard-core unemployed in the cities," caustically observes one Federal poverty specialist. "But what if the jobs materialize? The Government will have to turn around and find 500,000 more jobs there for new migrants from the rural areas."

What especially embitters poverty campaigners attempting to stem this self-destructive flow is that some entrenched Government programs are actually encouraging it.

Skimpy in the South

Federally aided state welfare benefits, for example, tend to be skimpiest in Southern states from which the largest number of migrants flow, and most generous in the Northern areas now feeling the greatest rural influx. Soon New York City will be spending "more on welfare than on public education," Under Secretary of Commerce Howard J. Samuels recently warned in a speech. "Where there are regional imbalances and wide differences in the welfare rates between countryside and city, there is obvious incentive to migrate to the city."

Yet when the Johnson Administration attempted last year to increase benefits in states where rates now are lowest, the recommendation was swept aside in a general House uprising against bigger welfare spending.

Similar contradictions abound in long-accepted farm policies. Speech after speech by Agriculture Secretary Orville Freeman warns of "the suicidal implications of rural-urban imbalance." Yet, whatever their benefits, programs administered by Mr. Freeman's department are also adding to the very imbalance he speaks of, by increasing rural migration. One example was cited by the President's National Advisory Commission on Rural Poverty in its recent report, aptly titled "The People Left Behind."

Over the past two years, Uncle Sam has handed cotton growers more than $1.8 billion in direct payments. The money was partly inducement to cut acreage to shrivel a mammoth Federal surplus; aided by poor growing conditions and strong market demand, it succeeded beyond expectations.

But it dealt a fresh jolt to cottonfield employment, already hard hit by mechanization. (New minimum wage levels taking effect for agricultural workers last year slashed cotton production jobs still further.) "The magnitude of the acreage change (down more than a third), coupled with the lack of antipoverty programs to take up the slack, brought forth a social cost inadequately considered in the acreage reduction decision," the poverty commission said.

like peanut butter, flour, margarine and nonfat dry milk.

But even where stamps are available some people are too poor to buy them. Not until Senate hearings last year aired embarrassing claims of severe malnutrition in Mississippi did Mr. Freeman cut the price of food stamps —something he had already contemplated but shelved because of a chilly reception by Mr. Whitten. Now a family of six can buy $72 worth of groceries for $3 in cash, down from $12. This plus other liberalizations appears to have expanded the food stamp rolls by over 200,000 persons, or more than 10%, since last summer, with the biggest increases occurring in rural areas, the department says. Further expansions are expected to result from the special anti-hunger funds Congress voted after the Senate hearings.

Agriculture isn't the only Federal agency whose "outreach" to the rural poor appears stunted. In the Labor Department's manpower development and training projects, recruitment has been redirected so that two-thirds of the enrollees now come from "disadvantaged" backgrounds, instead of only one-third; even so, only 20% of those in training today are rural residents.

"There's not much point in locating a training project out in a rural area where equipment, teachers and jobs aren't available," says an administrator.

Office of Economic Opportunity funds have been drawn heavily to the cities. Urban poverty woes obviously are more visible, and city politicians have greater leverage in Washington, while rural areas have often been slow to organize for OEO programs or simply lack the talent. "It's tough to recruit professional staff people for Mississippi or Alabama when there are good jobs in Cleveland," says one rural specialist in the poverty agency. He cites one result:

"Last year, a good many money requests from rural communities for summer Head Start (the OEO's pre-school program) arrived in Washington only a few days before the starting date. The cities, by comparison, had their requests in two and three months in advance. In a situation like that, there's no question about who gets the available funds."

OEO figures illustrate the inequity. Of the 680,000 youngsters in Head Start classes last summer, only 169,000 lived in rural areas. Similarly, OEO jobs programs have trained 243,000 individuals to date. But only 49,000 were from rural communities; its legal assistance program has reached 225,000 poor clients, but only 41,000 them were rural.

Dearth of Meaningful Data

Washington's bureaucratic beehives swarm with statistics like these, yet there's a deplorable dearth of meaningful data about the needs and attitudes of the rural poor. They number more than 14 million, or some 40% of the total deemed to be living in poverty in affluent America. But what may be happening to them can only be glimpsed in estimates like those of the Agriculture Department that some 650,000 persons a year are changing from farm to nonfarm residences, or that between April 1960 and April 1966 the number of nonwhites living on farms dropped 44% to 1,452,000—a "fantastic" decline, in the view of one department demographer.

But where did they go? Did the Mississippi cotton farmer merely move down the highway to Jackson? Or are his children now roaming Chicago's South Side? No one here can say for certain. "We don't even know why some rural residents migrate to cities and others stay where they are," says one Capitol Hill aide often involved in poverty issues.

Uncle Sam has much to learn and much to reorganize before he can close the rural gap in his antipoverty lines.

The Theater: With LaMaMa and Eyen

New York

The road of pot-luck is a bumpy one but more often than not the only one available to the traveler on the Off-Off-Broadway circuit. Quality of writing and performance swings at the end of a disconcertingly long pendulum. The mode is generally experimental (where the one man's experiment can lead to another's torture). Also, given the practice of short runs, guide-sign reviews usually appear after the fact of the feast—or famine.

A less risky approach, of course, can be devised by heavy reliance on the work of individuals or groups that already have an impressive string of successes behind them. A new play by Sam Shepard or Lanford Wilson, for instance, is always a good omen. Most productions at the Judson Church or St. Mark's-in-the-Bouwerie certainly merit special attention. So, this past weekend, could have been found a batch of rewarding theatrical efforts with two more familiar names in the area: Playwright Tom Eyen and LaMaMa E.T.C. (Experimental Theater Club).

Mr. Eyen has been well represented during the past year by "Court" and "Sarah B. Divine," put on, appropriately enough, at LaMaMa among other places. Both plays demonstrated his special talent for wrapping observations on more unpleasant aspects of the human condition in an ostensibly harm-from the other. As the TV chit-chat rolls merrily by with Mrs. President being charmingly wide-eyed and average-American about the wonderful country she "lives in—and partly owns," the family scathingly rips its way to the realization that Johnny won't be coming home at all. What was irreverent, goofy humor leaves an acrid aftertaste—and a fine example of Mr. Eyen's peculiar theatrical intelligence.

The second half of the program is taken up with the several parts of "The Kama Sutra (a Hindu Ritual of Organic Happenings)." Here Mr. Eyen zeroes in on the current fashion for the various exoticisms of the East. Using the famous sex manual as grist enough for his mill, he scatters its techniques to the four corners of Catskill resorts and New Jersey suburbia with devastating and hilarious accuracy. The playwright's own, and by now expert, Theater of the Eye Repertory Company does the acting honors.

Ellen Stewart's Café LaMaMa on Second Avenue is showing two plays by Thomas Murrin. Neither is totally successful, but both indicate a gift for pinning back the brightly colored wings of the familiar "charming loser," the eternal patsy who "could've been a winner if I really wanted to." Moreover Mr. Murrin enjoys the assets of several superb performances.

The Bookshelf

'Elsewhere' of an Artist

Born in Turkish Armenia beside Lake Van, adopting a pseudonym of Russian derivation, Arshile Gorky is nonetheless an American painter. Insufficiently recognized and recompensed in his life, he is now regarded as a master.

A new item in a growing body of studies is "Gorky," a sumptuously handsome volume, 11 by 11½ inches, by current standards a bargain even at its high price. The text is by Julien Levy, the artist's dealer and friend in the most productive final years. There are 208 plates, 40 of which are hand-tipped color plates of outstanding quality.

Gorky, born in 1905, was christened Vosdanig Manoog Adoian. His father deserted the family and came to America to escape Turkish military service. American missions provided the boy's first schooling. His earliest art studies were in Tiflis. After his mother's death, the impoverished 15-year-old managed to come to the U.S. with a sister in 1920. They joined their father in Rhode Island, and later lived with another sister in Massachusetts.

The young man studied art in Boston, Providence and New York. Sometime in the late 1920's he adopted the pseudonym Arshile Gorky. The Russian name means "the bitter one." "Arshile" is apparently his own variation of Achilles, who withdrew and sulked bitterly in his tent.

He produced a large body of work in a life hard because of scanty recognition and cumulative disasters. Many of his paintings were destroyed by a fire in his studio in Sherman, Conn., in 1946. The same year he underwent an operation for cancer. In 1948 he sustained a fractured neck in an automobile accident. Some two months later, on July 21, despondent over these matters and other more personal problems, he hanged himself in the woodshed of his home, at the age of 43.

Hindsight reveals the onset of the impulse to self-destruction. He had been preoccupied for weeks with a story of Chekhov's, a morbid fantasy, "The Black Monk," which ends: "Beneath the balcony the serenade was being played, and the Black Monk whispered to him that he was a genius, and he died only because his feeble, mortal body had lost its balance, and could no longer serve as the covering of genius."

Mr. Levy's text is of broader interest than simply as a biographical sketch and critical appraisal of Gorky. The painter's developing work recapitulated most of the major phases of modern painting, from Impressionism onward, including especially pronounced influences at different stages by Cezanne and Picasso. There is nothing novel about imitativeness as a mode of development. What marks Gorky is the breadth of his recapitulation, together with the fact that something distinctly, forcefully original is present even when he is most imitative. Mr. Levy draws interesting parallels between this fact and the conscious review of styles in the writing of James Joyce, as the author advanced toward his leap into drastic experiment.

This aspect of Gorky enables Mr. Levy's essay to become an intensely concentrated, penetrating comment on the nature, evolution, aims and problems of modern painting.

The vocabulary of classification and critito improve the conditions of the welfare population, the social welfare profession opted instead to protect its good name."

Doubtless that impulse was common among welfare workers, but to drop the thought there also conceals important truths. Their attitude was simply one derivative of the general liberal feeling that poverty is entirely —not merely partly—the fault of society. Support for the poor is not char- [illegible] generally refused even to discuss alternatives. They talk only about increased gratuities of one sort or another, and instantly dismiss even the hint of the mildest coercion.

No end to dependency seems in sight as long as such sensibilities prevail. They put a taboo on a vital truth: That reform will require not only continued financial support for the poor but also measures designed to reach the only real remedy—the bolstering of individual responsibility.

Note of Candor

The Administration has been telling businessmen that controls on foreign investment are merely temporary. But evidently it hasn't told the recruiting people at the Commerce Department.

Anyway, their two-column ad in this paper the other day proclaimed, "The newly created Office of Foreign Direct Investments offers excellent career opportunities in administering the recently instituted program concerned with overseas direct investments by U.S. corporations."

In case anyone missed the point buried in that fine print, there it was again right at the top of the ad in bold italic type, "Career Opportunities."

Makes you wonder, doesn't it?

Postmaster General O'Brien's Band

"The Post Office Department has done it again," begins a nice letter we have just received from a church secretary in the Midwest. She is referring to an editorial appearing in this space a while back about a change in the postal regulations permitting the use of rubber bands, instead of string, to bundle certain classes of mail.

This change in the regulations was goods news to her, writes Miss Church Secretary, because she had been spending many hours a year wrapping string around stacks of third class stamped material before carting it to the post office. If all she had to do was to snap a couple of rubber bands around the mail she could save a lot of time and energy.

What the good lady evidently failed to appreciate is that when the Government moves, it moves in mysterious ways. Dutifully, she inquired of her local post office what kind of rubber band the Post Office Department approves of.

And her post office told her. The hitch was that she could find no stationery store which had that kind of rubber band. The reason for that is, to students of matters governmental, astonishingly simple: Until the Post Office Department revised its regulations, the kind of rubber band it specified did not exist.

We suppose people at post offices are measuring, snapping and pulling at rubber bands to make sure the specifications are being met. But not many. For inquiry discloses that Miss Church Secretary is not alone in clinging to oldfashioned string. At least one major rubber band manufacturer makes no Post Office Bands at all. Others make a few and sales are slow.

"It's a puzzlement," says our correspondent. Not really. It's just that Postmaster General O'Brien's Band has hit another clinker as it supposedly strives to restore a snappier tempo to the mails.

"You'll just have to stop watching the late news, Herbert."

Over the past two years, Uncle Sam has handed cotton growers more than $1.8 billion in direct payments. The money was partly inducement to cut acreage to shrivel a mammoth Federal surplus; aided by poor growing conditions and strong market demand, it succeeded beyond expectations.

But it dealt a fresh jolt to cottonfield employment, already hard hit by mechanization. (New minimum wage levels taking effect for agricultural workers last year slashed cotton production jobs still further.) "The magnitude of the acreage change (down more than a third), coupled with the lack of antipoverty programs to take up the slack, brought forth a social cost inadequately considered in the acreage reduction decision," the poverty commission said.

Retaining Congressional Support

Such concern isn't new. New Deal liberals in the Agriculture Department were arguing the same point in the mid-1930s when the first Federal cotton program cut back production and pushed thousands of sharecroppers off the land. But the liberals were purged by Agriculture Secretary Henry Wallace, and President Roosevelt chose to ignore the plight of the sharecroppers to retain the support of important Southerners in Congress.

Today the names have changed, but the politics are the same. Mississippi Congressman Jamie L. Whitten, for example, is sometimes called "the other Secretary of Agriculture" by Capitol Hill colleagues. In the Senate, the Democratic majority's lineup on the Agriculture Committee starts off, in order of seniority, like a Confederate Army roster: Chairman Allen Ellender (Louisiana), Spessard Holland (Florida), James Eastland (Mississippi) and Herman Talmadge (Georgia).

Antipoverty activists contend Mr. Freeman's fear of reaction from these conservative Southerners is one reason Government food distribution programs, which operate under his department's control, haven't done enough to alleviate hunger and malnutrition among the rural poor. Conceivably, it's argued, a better diet could discourage at least some out-migration from rural areas. As Mr. Freeman sees it, though, his hands are tied by Congressional directives; the food stamp program was "not designed nor developed as a welfare program," he says, but was intended to help the needy "supplement their basic expenditures for food."

More than 200 poverty-ridden counties, most of them Southern and many of them heavily Negro, still refuse to sell Federal food stamps to low-income residents or, alternatively, to distribute free Federal commodities

Notable & Quotable

Manuel S. Cohen, chairman, Securities and Exchange Commission, speaking in New York at a meeting of more than 1,000 professional money managers, renewing his proposal for an SEC study of institutional investors:

More investors are apparently looking for dramatic, short-term growth, high risk, leverage, etc.—in short, they are seeking to live dangerously, and many are doing it through the medium of institutions. I might add that there appears to be no shortage of institutional managers who are prepared to satisfy —and in many cases to foster—that demand.

Rep. Emanuel Celler, New York Democrat, telling the House "in the spirit of levity" a story about French President Charles de Gaulle on a visit to the Louvre with his minister of education:

. . . There in a niche in the wall President de Gaulle looked up and said, "Oh, a Monet," The minister of education said, "No, Mr. President, that is not a Monet, it is a Renoir." They went to another part of the Louvre where the president looked up and said, "Oh, that is a Matisse," whereupon the minister said, "No, Mr. President, that is a Lautrec." The president then looked into another niche and excitedly exclaimed, "This is a Picasso." The minister said, "No, Mr. President, that is not a Picasso, it is a mirror and you are looking at yourself."

Perlman and Bruce Jay Friedman. He is now providing more of the same at 'Ntoni Bastiano's Playwrights' Workshop on Waverly Place.

"November 22nd" is a television interview with a U.S. President's wife who just happens to have a thick—and stunningly accurate—East Texas drawl. "When Johnny Comes Dancing Home Again (a routine for semi-emotional puppets)" revolves about the solipsisms of the family of a soldier serving in Vietnam—a coward, according to his buxom wife; a poet, according to mother, who therefore insists he would be incapable of "marching home" like the ordinary specimen.

In "Hung," a detailed description of a young man's physical and spiritual deterioration on the "morning after" a drunken episode, Kevin O'Connor rants, cajoles and stumbles his way to a sharply sensitive portrait of the type who meets his Armageddon in personnel offices. Mr. O'Connor consistently proves himself among the best of Off-Off-Broadway's—and New York's—actors. And in "Roommates," Karl Schenzer and Michael Miller drain a slew of very funny routines from a war of imaginations to determine who gets to sleep in the single bed.

Both the Eyen and the LaMaMa productions, by the way, are scheduled to run through this weekend. Both make nice alternatives to more on-beat fare.

Travel Taunt

Editor, The Wall Street Journal:

Without considering the matter of whether any travel tax at all should be instituted, I would like to comment on your editorial response to the particular form proposed for this tax ("Europe on $7 a Day," Feb. 7).

You say that it "is intentionally designed to interfere with the liberties of American citizens." Then, in your generous concern for your fellow citizens, you proceed to sneer at the "dirty shirt set, skylarking students and other minimal spenders"—in your best editorial tone. Or does your contemptuousness perhaps betray your prejudices? Do not even the lowly possess the right to travel?

It is your attitude, not that of the Administration, that involves "curious notions of social worth." One suspects that what arouses your sympathy is the case, not of the "modest American," who has saved "$200 a year for five years," but that of the businessman with more than that to spend.

Be that as it may, are you incapable of sympathizing with the would-be traveler whose resources are less than "modest"? Perhaps you prefer that he stay in his place.

Protein Preferred

Editor, The Wall Street Journal:

Filled milk may have "special appeal for people who want to avoid saturated animal fats in their diet" ("Commodities," Feb. 5). But when coconut oil is used to replace butterfat, as you correctly stated it is in most filled milks and substitute creams currently available, the product is just as saturated as before the butterfat was removed, and therefore it makes no contribution to better heart health. Coconut oil is a highly saturated fat.

Polyunsaturated fats are provided by only four vegetable oils of any practical importance—safflower, soya, corn and cottonseed oils. When filled dairy products are made with any of these four oils, particularly the first three, they will be a real contribution to better health.

I am amazed at the number of physicians, to say nothing of the ordinary consumers, who are of the opinion that the present day filled milks and substitute creams with unidentified "vegetable fat" are desirable from the viewpoint of lessening the saturated fats of the diet. They are not.

Dairymen could do so much for their sick industry if they would price milk on the basis of its protein, not butterfat, get the Congress to remove the restrictions on filled dairy products their grandfathers and fathers obtained, and start manufacturing products that are up to date with modern nutritional findings.

Credit Comments

Editor, The Wall Street Journal:

In our opinion your page-one story "Prying for Pay" (Feb. 5) started from the wrong premise. The granting of credit is not a universal right conferred upon anyone who asks for it. Rather, it is a privilege granted to those who use it in a satisfactory manner.

What I object to strenuously is that credit bureaus are, per se, prying institutions. It is obvious that our credit-granting customers must have some information upon which to base the credit-worthiness of their customers. We furnish them with that information but we are not running a detective bureau open to all comers. In fact, a check of our files reveals that government inquiries constituted only .0015% of our work during 1967.

It must be realized that the majority of our information is favorable and permits millions of people to use credit when needed without delay. We respect the individual's right of privacy and want to keep the situation that way.

The vocabulary of classification and criticism in modern art is confusing, even to those inside. How to classify Gorky? Mr. Levy, whose gallery was the showplace for many of the most advanced painters, notably many of the Surrealists, says: "He should really be thought of as a prodigious Abstract Surrealist, although I dislike the term, rather than in his acknowledged but lesser role as a forerunner of Abstract Expressionism." The plates, of course, display the sequence of his many styles, through the derivations to what is uniquely Gorky.

Mr. Levy cites four plates, remarking that "from these paintings alone the whole Abstract Expressionist movement may claim its source." Then he cautions against the risks of trying "to designate the meaning of Gorky in the terms of any 'ism'. . . ."

Perspective far back beyond the "modern" is lent by a passage from Leonardo, among the well-chosen and varied texts that precede sections of the essay. ". . . from a confusion of shapes the spirit is quickened to new inventions" are Leonardo's words, referring to the stimulus to be found even in the stains of dampness on a wall. Mr. Levy points out that Leonardo "proposed his stain as a source and not an end of inspiration. . . ." He cites as "three challenging prospects for the modern mind," whether of painter, writer or other prober, the effort "to celebrate, to placate, or to re-create the secret parts of the human being. . . ."

He concludes: "The rough and craggy transit of the innovators leads to secrets that disquiet us, because we are introduced to an 'elsewhere' which cannot be described or analyzed by critics, but only recognized by affection. But perhaps because of this, the way of art is never lost in movements and fashions. Forgotten from moment to moment, it is remembered for always."

Wilbur J. Cohen, new secretary of health, education and welfare, heads a complex effort to meet basic human needs

Wilbur Cohen Means Welfare in US

By JOHN W. KOLE, Journal Washington Bureau

WASHINGTON, D. C.—Wilbur J. Cohen leaned back in his chair and threw his feet up on his desk. From that informal and comfortable position, he spoke enthusiastically about his hopes and dreams for the American public welfare system, now under severe attack from both conservatives and liberals.

"The welfare system is the end product of all of the mistakes of our society," he said. "But I don't think we have to dismantle the system. That would be like throwing the baby out with the bath. I think we can improve the system and continue to lift millions of people out of poverty."

Cohen, 54, was sworn in last week as the seventh secretary of the 15 year old department of health, education and welfare, HEW for short. No person could take the job with a better background. For Cohen has been toiling in the public welfare vineyards since the day he left the University of Wisconsin in 1934.

He recognizes that the system must undergo substantial changes, but he feels that many gimmicks have been proposed that would not necessarily who served as President Kennedy's first welfare secretary but became frustrated with the administrative nightmares of the sprawling department, noted recently that some state medical societies had opposed Cohen's appointment.

"Mr. Cohen has done more to stave off socialized medicine than any man in America," Ribicoff said. "Many distinguished physicians know and understand this. The Arizona medical society has recently voted in favor of Mr. Cohen's designation."

Cohen also had letters of support from at least two officials of the American Medical association. For lation but says it will not be ready before next year.

Cohen declared that a federal study, now being conducted in New Jersey by UW's Institute for Poverty Research, in which poor people actually are under a negative income tax experiment "won't prove one thing." He contended that the subjects of the experiment would not react typically because they knew they were being studied.

Daniel P. Moynihan, the liberal sociologist who once was an assistant secretary of labor, has proposed a "family allowance" and has complained that "government is a disaster at distributing services." Cohen reacted strenuously in political terms.

"I don't know of a single vote in congress that Pat Moynihan controls," he said. "He is not the chairman of the ways and means committee."

and philosophy of the labor movement as a trail blazer for social legislation."

Since he left UW, he has been associated with virtually every major piece of social welfare legislation that has been enacted in the last 34 years. His only absence from government came from 1956 to 1961 when he was a professor at the University of Michigan. But even there his main contribution was to train graduate students for public welfare careers.

JFK Brain Truster

Never one to shun politics, Cohen joined John F. Kennedy's brain trust in the 1960 campaign and drew up recommendations that he would help push through congress in the next few years. One medical publication has described him as among "the most cooly efficient, pragmatic and persistent innovators Washington has ever seen . . . a man committed to social justice . . . who knows his way through the capital's jungle of politics and bureaucracy."

What Can US Do If Peace Comes?

By JAMES W. McCULLA, of The Journal Staff

THE nation's economists, deeply engaged in a battle to control inflation, have had a refreshingly different worry thrust upon them. As Vietnam negotiators talked in Paris last week, many Americans wondered whether the nation really was ready for peace. Economists now are putting their sophisticated analytical and planning tools to work on such questions as these: If "peace should break out" could a recession and unemployment like that after the Korean war be avoided? Would the inflation problem suddenly give way to one of deflation, or would new inflationary pressures arise as resources were shifted to other national needs? Should wartime taxes be repealed or maintained to support a massive attack on poverty, racial problems and urban ills?

Announcement of North Vietnamese willingness to negotiate buoyed hopes for a larger scale assault on conditions that have caused blood to run and buildings to burn in many American cities.

Martin Talks Crisis

The influential Committee for Economic Development (CED) declared that the "larger part" of federal revenue released by reduced defense spending "should be devoted to alleviating the city, race and poverty problems." Similar sentiment appears to be accumulating rapidly.

President Johnson already has appointed a high level study group to consider post Vietnam priorities and tax policies.

Important as peace preparations are, the intensifying effort to control inflation remains of utmost urgency. Because of inflation and related economic problems, the United States is undergoing its worst financial crisis since 1931," William McChesney Martin, jr., chairman of the federal reserve board, declared recently.

Announcement of the peace talks complicated the job of selling to the public and congress President Johnson's proposed 10% income tax surcharge to control inflation. Economists like Harvard's Otto Eckstein, found themselves arguing that the end of war did not necessarily signal the end of the federal budget crisis or the need for an immediate tax increase.

Eckstein foresaw a continuing American military presence in southeast Asia and continued spending for other military purposes. Economists also pointed to a shift, not a reduction, in federal spending.

port issued in April titled "The National Economy, and the Vietnam War," spending rose at an average annual rate of 7.4% between the start of the build-up and the end of 1967. Output rose only about 4%.

The government, CED charged, was slow to respond to inflationary pressures. Its money and credit restrictions were "of a limited nature and inadequate." It failed to estimate the inflationary impact of the build-up, fell victim to erroneous forecasts that tax increases would not be needed and succumbed to an "excessive tendency to prefer the risks of inflation to the risks of unemployment in the short run."

Now, CED said, America suffers from a rising and unnecessary degree of inflation, a perilous balance of payments situation, a sustained attack on the dollar, a low plant and equipment investment rate, curbs on housing, a growing federal budget deficit and continuing pressures for higher wages and prices.

CED's Prescription

A substantial body of opinion, including CED's, believes that controlling moves, such as tightened credit and restraint on overseas investments, are inadequate. CED recently proposed limiting the money supply growth rate, reducing government expenditures and imposing higher taxes temporarily.

It backs the 10% income tax surcharge because it could be imposed without cumbersome manipulation of the country's complicated tax structure.

CED has recommended, as further countermeasures to the inflationary impact of the war, cuts of about $3 billion in space, agriculture, reclamation, river and harbor and highway programs. However, it gave top priority to programs attacking poverty and urban ills.

Presuming that these moves curbed inflation, what about the postwar period?

"We see no reasons to doubt that the economic readjustment that would product of all of the mistakes of our society," he said. "But I don't think we have to dismantle the system. That would be like throwing the baby out with the bath. I think we can improve the system and continue to lift millions of people out of poverty."

Cohen, 54, was sworn in last week as the seventh secretary of the 15 year old department of health, education and welfare, HEW for short. No person could take the job with a better background. For Cohen has been toiling in the public welfare vineyards since the day he left the University of Wisconsin in 1934.

He recognizes that the system must undergo substantial changes, but he feels that many gimmicks have been proposed that would not necessarily solve basic problems of poor education, housing and health services. Besides, Cohen says, no federal welfare proposal is any good unless it is enacted by congress.

Pushed Landmark Laws

Cohen's political pragmatism has brought some opposition from liberals who do believe the existing welfare structure has to be torn down. As Cohen was sworn in, the first of thousands of protesters were arriving for the "poor people's campaign" to demand their share in the American dream.
